In the motion to instruct for defendant, which was made at the close of the evidence, the reason given for the motion is "that the facts proven are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff, as a matter of law, to recover." The plaintiff now contends that this is defective, in that it is not equivalent to assigning that the evidence is insufficient; but we are not able to see the distinction. The sufficiency of the evidence is to be tested by what it proves, and, if it does not establish sufficient facts to justify a verdict, then the evidence is insufficient. We think that we are called upon by this record to determine whether this evidence was sufficient to support a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and this depends wholly upon whether the plaintiff and the son of defendants were fellow servants. Upon this question the plaintiff has given us no assistance in the brief. The plaintiff alleged and contended upon the trial that it was no part of her duties to bring the coal from the cellar or to direct or superintend the son, and that the defendant undertook to do it himself, or to procure his son to perform this service. These contentions were denied by defendant, but it appears that the jury has decided this contention in favor of the plaintiff. From her testimony it appears that the trapdoor through which she fell is located in the pantry, a small room about 4 feet by 6 feet inside, as she said, opening directly from the kitchen, which was also not large, and in which she had finished her evening's work but a few minutes before the accident occurred. The sitting room also opened from the kitchen, and she says that the coal for the base-burner for the sitting room was kept in the cellar. There was an outside entrance to the cellar which was ordinarily used. The trapdoor in question was only used, according to the plaintiff's testimony, in very cold and stormy weather. The boy testified that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was at work in the kitchen, and that she requested him to get some coal for the evening; that he procured one hodful, which was not sufficient to fill the base-burner, and he left the trapdoor in the pantry open while he went to the base-burner, intending to immediately return for some more coal, and that just as he was returning to the pantry, the accident occurred.

The verdict having been in plaintiff's favor, we will consider her testimony upon this point for the purpose of the present discussion. She testified that both the kitchen and pantry were dark, the gas having been turned off, and another light, which they sometimes used there, having been removed from the kitchen to the sitting room, and that under these circumstances she went into the pantry, not knowing that the boy had left the trapdoor open, and so fell and received her injuries. If the boy and the plaintiff were both the employees of the defendant, and associated together in the same service, and neither was in any manner under control or direction of the other, they must be considered as fellow servants, and each in law must be presumed to take such risk as might follow from the negligence of the other in performing the duties incident to such service. There is nothing in the record to show that it was intended or supposed by anyone that the son, being a boy of only fourteen years of age, should control or direct the plaintiff in performing her duties. It would be more reasonable to suppose that he would be subject to plaintiff's suggestions as to his conduct. No authorities have been cited by plaintiff nor any argument advanced for concluding that, under such circumstances, the "fellow-servant rule," so well established, should not be applied. In Debus v. Armour & Co. 84 Neb. 224, 120 N. W. 1110, the case is made to turn upon the question as to whether the plaintiff was the fellow servant of the employee whose negligence caused the injury, and, under the circumstances in that case, it was held that they were not fellow servants. In Anthony v. Leeret, 105 N. Y. 591, 12 N. E. 561, under somewhat, though not entirely, similar circumstances, the fellow-servant rule was applied. In another case, under somewhat similar circumstances, the court of appeals of Kentucky held the defendant liable. Vandyke v. Memphis, N. O. & C. Packet Co. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1283, 71 S. W. 441.

The defendant was a tenant of the house in which they lived. The plaintiff was familiar with the house, and knew the condition and use of the trapdoor in question. She does not explain why she was performing her services in the pantry in the dark, nor does she satisfactorily explain why the bringing up of the coal, and the use of the trapdoor upon that occasion, and its condition at the time, should be unobserved by her. If the question of her contributory negligence may be said to be settled in her favor by the verdict of the jury, and if her injuries were caused solely by the negligence of this young boy, it must be held, under the law so well established in this state, that he was a fellow servant, and that the defendant is not liable for his negligence in this action.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed and the cause remanded.

Fawcett, J., concurring:

I concur in the judgment of reversal, but not upon the ground stated in the majority opinion. The doctrine of "fellow servant" has been made to "work overtime" during late years by the courts of the country. So much so that even Congress has taken notice and given some relief along that line. While I concede that under some circumstances a minor son will be held to be a servant of his father, it is in my judgment extending the rule beyond the bounds of reason and common experience to hold that a fourteen-year-old son is, in his father's home, a fellow servant of the kitchen girl or housekeeper. Such a theory is to my mind not only unsound, but repulsive.

I think the judgment of the court below should be reversed on the ground of assumption of risk. Plaintiff is a mature woman. She knew all about the trapdoor leading into the cellar, and the use often made of it. She understood fully the construction and dangers of the place where she was required to work. She made no complaint to defendant, nor did she ask for any change of conditions, but continued in her employment. She thereby assumed the risk of her employment and environment. The majority opinion is in error in stating that the brief of defendant is devoted "entirely" to the fellow-servant proposition. In his brief appellant says: "Appellee knew, or was in a position to know, the risk of suffering injury through the carelessness of the son of appellant. It was her privilege to refuse to perform duties which would cause her to run the risk of suffering injuries through the carelessness of appellant's son. By failing to do so, then, she must be held to have assumed the risk attendant upon those duties." In that statement I concur.

Reese, Ch. J., concurs in the first paragraph of the above.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
EX REL. WACLARK REALTY COMPANY, NY, Respt.,

v.

CLARK WILLIAMS, State Comptroller,
Appt.

(198 N. Y. 54, 91 N. E. 266.)

Tax — holding corporation — liability.

A corporation organized for the personal convenience of its largest stockholder, to take and hold title to his real estate, upon one parcel of which a dwelling house is in process of construction, is within the operation of a statute requiring every corporation to pay an annual tax computed upon the basis of the amount of its capital employed in the state, although it transacted no business.

APPEAL by the State Comptroller, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, reversing an assessment against relator of a franchise tax. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward R. O'Malley, Attorney General, and Edward H. Letchworth, for appellant:

A corporation acting as landlord, and collecting rents on properties which it holds, is taxable as employing its capital.

Note. — When is capital of corporation invested in real estate deemed "employed" within meaning of statute taxing amount of capital stock employed within state.

When a franchise tax is imposed upon every corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in a state, based upon the amount of its capital stock "employed" within the state, it is sometimes a difficult matter to determine when its capital stock, when invested in realty, is "employed" within the meaning of the taxing statute.

In People ex rel. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wemple, 150 N. Y. 46, 44 N. E. 789, a foreign manufacturing corporation invested a part of its surplus earnings in real estate in New York, then under lease, and not occupied by it, but the intention was to erect a new building when the existing leases expired, and to use a small portion of it for the offices of the company, and lease the remainder to tenants. It was held that the amount represented by the real estate was no portion of the capital stock employed within the state, within the meaning of such a statute, even if the amount so invested should be considered a part of the capital stock. The court said: "It was an independent investment, and was in no sense employed within this state in the transaction of the ordinary business of the relator."

Where a corporation authorized by its articles to purchase and hold and lease real estate bought an island consisting of unimproved swamp land, giving its stock in payment therefor, and held it for many years, deriving no revenue therefrom except a small sum for the grass crop, such corporation was held not subject to the franchise tax. People ex rel. Niagara River Hydraulic Co. v. Roberts, 30 App. Div. 180, 51 N. Y. Supp. 771, affirmed on opinion below in 157 N. Y. 676, 51 N. E. 1093.

The court said: "If capital can be invested without being employed, the case before us seems to be a fair instance of it." This remark was also quoted with approval in People ex rel. Ft. George Realty Co. v. Miller, infra.

Where all the real estate of a corporation was condemned for public use, which it then ceased to use, and did nothing save to retain its corporate organization until it should receive the price of its condemned land, it was held in People ex rel. Jerome Park Villa Site & Improv. Co. v. Roberts, 41 App. Div. 21, 58 N. Y. Supp. 254, that the corporation did not employ its capital in business, within the meaning of the taxing laws. The court said: "What it did was in the nature of discontinuing business instead of 'doing business' within the meaning of the act. It did not employ its capital in business."

Money invested by a domestic corporation organized for conducting and managing ferries, in a house not used by the corporation in its business, nor in any way connected therewith, was held in People ex rel. Union Ferry Co. v. Roberts, 66 App. Div. 157, 72 N. Y. Supp. 950, not to be a part of its capital employed in business, within the meaning of the tax laws. The court said: "Capital, to be employed within this state, must be actively employed; and a nominal employment or investment of the same was not intended by the statute."

In People ex rel. Ft. George Realty Co. v. Miller, 179 N. Y. 49, 71 N. E. 463, it was held that a corporation which was organized by tenants in common of unimproved city real estate solely for the purpose of transferring title to the property to it, in order to raise money to pay off past-due mortgages, taxes, and assessments thereon, which threatened to cause a loss of the property, and of holding it until it could be advantageously disposed of, was not liable to the tax, since the stock of the corporation was not "employed within this state," within the meaning of the statute. But in People ex rel. Wall & H. Street Realty Co. v. Miller, 181 N. Y. 328, 73 N. E. 1102, where the language of the charter of a corporation was broad enough to authorize unlimited dealing in property of every kind, real or personal, anywhere within the United States, though the immediate object was to take title to a particular tract of land in the financial center of New York city, on which was situated a large office building, owned by thirty-two tenants in common, who became the incorporators, and where all its capital was invested in such building, and it was engaged in leasing the offices, collecting rents, operating elevators, etc., it was held that the corporation was subject to the tax on its capital so invested. This decision was placed on two grounds: first, that the criterion was the use to which the property might be put by the charter of the corporation, and not the use to which it was actually put; and second, that even if the court should look not at the unexercised powers of the corporation, but only at those actually used, there was warrant for the tax, as the capital was being actively used. On the first ground, the court, by Werner, J., said: "And when we appeal to the reason of the thing, it seems plain that the chartered privileges of a corporation, as defined in its certificate of incorporation, which is invariably framed in the language of the corporators, should be the index to its relations to the state, rather than the possibly sporadic and shifting exercise of any one or more of a larger number of the powers delegated to it." Willard Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Waclark Realty Company was incorporated on April 11, 1904, under the business corporations law (Consol. Laws, chap. 4). Its purposes, as set forth in the articles of incorporation, were to acquire, hold, improve, lease, and sell real estate; to erect 250 acres, on 50 acres of which its plant was located, and on part of the remaining 200 acres, thirty-four dwelling houses had been erected and rented, and the vacant part of the 200 acres was divided into lots, and ready for sale, it was held in People ex rel. Steinway & Sons v. Kelsey, 108 App. Div. 138, 96 N. Y. Supp. 42, that the whole of the 200 acres must be deemed to be employed.

On the authority of People ex rel. Wall & H. Street Realty Co. v. Miller, supra, it was held in People ex rel. Hubert Apartment Asso. v. Kelsey, 110 App. Div. 617, 96 N. Y. Supp. 745, affirmed without opinion in 184 N. Y. 573, 97 N. E. 1194, that a corporation whose only business is owning and managing an apartment house is employing its capital stock within the state, within the meaning of such tax law.

People ex rel. Wall & H. Street Realty Co. v. Miller, supra, was also followed in People ex rel. Fourteenth Street Realty Co. v. Kelsey, 110 App. Div. 797, 97 N. Y. Supp. 197, which held that a corporation whose charter authorizes it to acquire by purchase, exchange, lease, or otherwise, to hold, improve, develop, operate, sell, lease, mortgage, or exchange real estate, chattels real, mortgages, and any interest in real property, to erect buildings, deal in bonds, etc., was liable to the franchise tax, although all its property was invested in one building, leased to a single tenant, and the corporation was formed by the original owners of the property, to take title to the property, to avoid complications due to numerous dower rights, etc.

Where a corporation purchased from four owners in common the real estate which it was organized to acquire, and issued stock to the vendors in payment therefor, and the property was occupied as coal, brick, and lumber yards by tenants who paid large rentals therefor, which were used in paying dividends, it was held in People ex rel. Vandervoort Realty Co. v. Glynn, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and repair buildings of all kinds; to carry on the business of builders, general contractors, and dealers in building materials; to take, purchase, and hold bonds and mortgages; to lend money on bond and mortgage; to lay out for public use, roads, streets, avenues, and highways through its lands, and, if unable to agree with the owners of property required therefor, to acquire title thereto by condemnation; to manufacture, buy, and sell bricks, stone, building materials and supplies; and, finally, to mine, quarry, buy, and sell ores, minerals, oil, and other valuable substances found in any of its lands.

According to the report of the corporation, made to the comptroller for the year ending October 31, 1905, the total authorized capital stock of the company was $1,500,000, represented by 15,000 shares, of which 14,-

194 N. Y. 387, 87 N. E. 434, that its capital stock was employed rather than invested, within the meaning of the taxing law. The court said: "The capital stock has been applied to the very use contemplated by the incorporators as the object of the organization. If this is not the employment of the capital stock, then it is impossible to conceive how the capital stock of such a corporation can ever be regarded as being employed at all."

A corporation authorized to purchase lands and erect buildings thereon employs its capital stock within the state when it purchases a tract of land for the purpose of erecting a store and office building thereon, and begins the erection of the building, though it is not far enough advanced to receive rents and profits therefrom. People ex rel. Fifth Ave. Bldg. Co. v. Williams, 198 N. Y. 238, 91 N. E. 638. Referring to People ex rel. Vandervoort Realty Co. v. Glynn and People ex rel. Wall & H. Street Realty Co. v. Miller, supra, the court said: "There is nothing to distinguish these cases from the case at bar, except that there the corporations purchased properties which were immediately productive of rentals, while here there was no prospect of income until the new structure would be rented. That is a mere detail, however, which cannot affect the principle that the latter, no less than the former, was employing its capital within this state in the conduct of the only business for which it was organized."

Capital stock of a foreign corporation, though invested in structures on leased lands in the taxing state, which may become the property of the landlord, is nevertheless capital employed within the state, within the meaning of the taxing laws. People ex rel. Long Dock Mills & Elevator v. Wilson, 121 App. Div. 376, 106 N. Y. Supp. 1, affirmed without opinion in 193 N. Y. 671, 87 N. E. 1125.

000 had been issued for real estate situated in the borough of Manhattan, in New York county, at Ravenswood, in Queens county, and at Mt. Vernon. The report further stated that the company was organized merely for the purpose of holding title to certain real estate, and not with the object of transacting any business for profit. "Since its organization it has received deed to, and holds in its name title to, seven plots of land, five being within the state of New York, transferred to it by Hon. William A. Clark, and stock has been issued to him for said properties." In the application for the revision of the franchise tax, made by the corporation to the comptroller, it was stated that "said William A. Clark is the owner of nearly all of the shares of stock of said company, and that the same was organized for his personal convenience, and to take over said properties owned by him individually, which, for matters of convenience, he preferred to have held by a corporation." Among the lands thus held was a plot on the corner of Seventy-Seventh street and Fifth avenue, in the borough of Manhattan, with an unfinished dwelling house thereon, the assessed value of which is $2,200,000. The premises at Ravenswood, in Queens county, were used for the storage and preparation of materials for the house in course of erection upon this Fifth avenue plot. The secretary and treasurer of the corporation, in his testimony before the second deputy comptroller, stated that the object of the incorporation was to promote the personal convenience of Mr. W. A. Clark; that the company had no offices, employees, clerks, or servants of any kind; that it paid no wages or salaries to anybody, and was not in the receipt of any moneys of any kind; that it expended no moneys, and had no bank account; and that the only connection with the real estate mentioned had been to hold the title to the property. Mr. Clark paid the taxes on the real estate owned by the company, and the witness repeated, what appears over and over again in the papers in this proceeding, that "Senator Clark preferred to have these enormous properties owned by him in New York and elsewhere held by a corporation."

The tax under review was levied for the year ending October 31, 1905, at which time the tax law provided as follows: "Every corporation, joint-stock company or association, incorporated, organized, or formed under, by, or pursuant to law in this state, shall pay to the state treasurer annually, an annual tax, to be computed upon the basis of the amount of its capital stock employed within this state, and upon each dollar of such amount." Laws 1896, chap. 908, § 182.

It will be noted that the statute as then in force did not require that the capital stock of a corporation should be employed in business in order to render it liable to taxation. It was sufficient if the capital stock was employed at all. Under the circumstances disclosed by this record we think that the capital stock of the Waclark Realty Company, which was represented, as has been stated, by the several pieces of real estate belonging to the corporation, with the structures thereon, must be deemed to have been employed within the meaning of that expression in the tax law as it then existed. The relator was really a holding corporation for Senator Clark. It employed its capital in the precise way contemplated by the incorporators, in holding the title to a large quantity of real property which it had acquired from its principal stockholder to promote the personal convenience of that gentleman. Where a corporation devotes its capital stock to the very purpose for which it was formed, it will hardly do to say that such stock is not employed. The cases in which a distinction has been made between capital employed and capital invested have no application here. If a corporation were formed for the sole purpose of the investment of capital, such investment would clearly be an employment of its capital. It is only where the organization has been for a different purpose that the mere investment or passive use of capital has not been deemed an employment thereof.

It is argued that the statute should be construed so as to exempt the relator from this tax, because, if we look behind the corporation to the owner, Senator Clark, he has received no advantage for which the tax might be said to be due. He has personally paid the tax upon the real estate, and also the organization tax for the corporation, and it is contended that it is inequitable and unjust to require him to pay any more, inasmuch as he has received no equivalent from the state. The obvious answer to this argument is that he has chosen, for some undisclosed reason which he denominates his personal convenience, to transfer his property to a corporation which appears to be employing that property just as he would employ it if the title remained in himself; and that when capital is thus employed, the legislature of the state has commanded that it shall be taxed in this manner. There is no apparent hardship in compelling a person to pay for employing his capital through the agency of a corporation, if he sees fit to organize one for his own convenience. Even if there were, this would be a matter for the consideration of the legislature, and not for the courts.

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed, and the determination of the state comptroller confirmed, with costs to the appellant in both courts.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

CITY OF NEW YORK, Resp.,
v.

ISAAC L. RICE et al., Appts.

Municipal corporation — structure on street — power to authorize.

1. A municipal corporation which owns the fee of its streets has no implied authority to permit the erection by an abutting owner of a solid wall of masonry extending 6 or 7 feet onto the sidewalk, for the convenience of its building and in keeping with its architectural design, although by reason of its decorative and artistic appearance it enhances the attractiveness of the street.

Same — revocation of permit — notice.

2. A demand by a municipal corporation which has given an illegal permit to maintain a structure on the sidewalk, that it be removed, is sufficient notice of revocation of the permit.

Equity — structures in street — removal.

3. Equity has jurisdiction of a suit to compel the removal of a structure from a sidewalk, which the owner claims the right to maintain under the authority of the municipality.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term, Part 3, for New York County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to compel the removal of a certain masonry wall which extended upon a public sidewalk. Affirmed.

Statement by Gray, J.:

The city of New York brought this action to restrain the defendant Rice from maintaining, and to compel him to remove, a masonry wall about his property, at the southeast corner of Eighty-Ninth street and Riverside Drive, which had been constructed beyond the house or building line and upon the public streets aforesaid. From the findings made by the trial court it appears that Rice, being the owner of a plat of land, which he had terraced up from the street level, in 1899, constructed about it a solid masonry wall, over 7 feet in height. It was supported on the outside by six stone piers, or pillars, about 15 feet in height, and upon the wall was a stone coping a foot and a half in width. This wall, with its piers, or pillars, on Eighty-Ninth street, extended 6 feet into the street, beyond the house or building line, and on Riverside Drive 7 feet. Rice obtained the following permission, by a resolution of the municipal assembly of the city of New York: "Resolved, that permission be and the same hereby is given to Isaac L. Rice, of Number 400 West End avenue, borough of Manhattan, and city of New York, who is about to build a residence at the southeast corner of Eighty-Ninth street and Riverside Drive, in the said borough and city, to erect up to and upon the stoop line

Note. — Power of municipality to permit abutting owners to extend structures into street.

This note is confined to cases of encroachments by permanent structures. It does not cover the power to permit the erection of signs, awnings, overhead bridges or arches, area ways, or the right to permit merchants to use the streets for the purpose of business.

It is a general rule that a municipal corporation cannot, in the absence of express authority from the legislature, permit abutting owners to extend their buildings, and parts thereof, into the street.

Thus it was held in First Nat. Bank v. Tyson, 133 Ala. 459, 59 L.R.A. 399, 91 Am. St. Rep. 46, 32 So. 144, that a municipal corporation had no power to authorize the erection of pillars of a bank building 26 inches beyond the property line. The court said: "It is again well settled that a municipal corporation cannot license the erection or commission of a nuisance in or on a public street. 'A building,' says Dillon, 'or other structure of like nature, erected upon a street without the sanction of the legislature, is a nuisance, and the local corporate authorities of a place cannot give a valid permission thus to occupy streets, without express power to this end conferred on them by the charter or statute. The usual power to regulate and control streets has even been held not to authorize the municipal authorities to allow them to be encroached upon by the adjoining owner, by erections made for his exclusive use and advantage, such as porches extending into the streets, or flights of stairs leading from the ground to the upper stories of buildings, standing on the line of the streets. The person erecting or maintaining a nuisance upon a public street, alley, or place is liable to the adjoining owner or other person who suffers special damages therefrom.'"

And the rule that a municipality has, in the absence of express legislative authority, no power to authorize abutting owners to extend buildings or structures into the of the said premises at Eighty-Ninth street and Riverside Drive, a terrace wall, approximately 8 feet high, to be composed of rough stone faced with marble or limestone, such terrace wall to constitute a part of the architectural motive of the stoop and entrance leading to the said contemplated residence." Thereafter, and about the time of the completion of the wall, he further obtained from the commissioner of parks, of the borough of Manhattan, the following consent: "Consent is hereby given to the maintenance of a terrace wall by Isaac L. Rice, New York city, in front of his premises, on the stoop line, at the southeast corner of Riverside Drive and Eighty-Ninth street, as shown on plan filed with this department, by Henry B. Hertz, architect. This consent is not to be considered a precedent for favorable action upon application for permits to erect similar walls upon the stoop line. In this case, a confusion in the provisions of the charter, and the fact that the street front and park front are both in-street, was approved and applied in the following cases, where the authority attempted to be conferred was held invalid: John Anisfield Co. v. Edward B. Grossman & Co. 98 Ill. App. 180; People ex rel. Faulkner v. Harris, 203 Ill. 272, 96 Am. St. Rep. 304, 67 N. E. 785 (bay windows); Chicago Cold Storage Warehouse Co. v. People, 224 Ill. 287, 79 N. E. 692 (platform higher than sidewalk erected to facilitate the loading of wagons); Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. People, 120 Ill. App. 306, affirmed in 222 Ill. 427, 78 N. E. 790 (depot, sheds, and platforms); Pettis v. Johnson, 56 Ind. 139 (authority to lessor, in lease of building for purpose of city offices, to erect and permanently maintain stairway for reaching upper stories, invalid); Caldwell v. George (Miss.) 50 So. 631 (erecting warehouse on sidewalk, where no walk had actually been constructed).

And in People ex rel. Mark Cross Co. v. Ahearn, 124 App. Div. 844, 109 N. Y. Supp. 249, where it was claimed that a platform and portico extending into an avenue over 15 feet, erected substantially on the space formerly occupied by a courtyard, was a nuisance, the court said that such structures were unlawful, and that it was beyond the power of the legislature or the common council to authorize them.

And a city not specially authorized by the legislature has no power to permit the erection of a depot which extends across a street. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 158 Ala. 208, 48 So. 391.

And an ordinance attempting to legalize the erection of a building extending into the street 4 feet beyond the building line, and which enhances the value of the builder's property alone, and withdraws a portion of the street from public use, and diminishes the easements of an adjoining owner, and imposes an additional burden upon the street, is void as an invasion of private property rights without compensation. McMillan v. Klaw & E. Constr. Co. 107 App. Div. 407, 95 N. Y. Supp. 365.

In People v. Carpenter, 1 Mich. 273, where a stairway within the limits of a street was claimed to be a nuisance, the court said that the city council had no power or authority to grant the exclusive use of any of the streets or alleys to individuals.

But under certain charter or statutory provisions, municipalities have the power to authorize erections of this kind.

Thus, under a section of the consolidation act, conferring power on the common council to regulate the use of streets for sidewalks, signs, signposts, awnings, etc., "and other purposes," the council may authorize the building of a bay window and stoop. Broadbelt v. Loew, 15 App. Div. 343, 44 N. Y. Supp. 159, affirmed in 162 N. Y. 642, 57 N. E. 1114.

And a subsequent subdivision of the same act, providing that the city council shall have no power to authorize the placing or continuing of any encroachment or obstruction upon any street or sidewalk, except for temporary occupation, does not prevent the operation of the first express provision. Ibid.

And under a section of the consolidation act, providing in substance that certain parts of streets shall be subject to such rules and regulations in respect to the uses thereof, and erections and projections thereon, as the department of public works shall authorize, that department has power to issue a permit for a bay window extending over the building line into the street. Wormser v. Brown, 149 N. Y. 163, 43 N. E. 524.

And columns of a building extending into the street 24 inches are not nuisances where it appears that the street was originally a state road, and that the abutting owners own only to the street line, and that the city council, acting under a provision of the city charter authorizing it to permit columns, pilasters, etc., to encroach upon any street, passed an act permitting the erection of the columns in question, stating that they would not interfere with the reasonable and substantial use of the streets. Sautter v. Utica City Nat. Bank, 119 App. Div. 898, 104 N. Y. Supp. 1139, affirmed in 193 N. Y. 661, 87 N. E. 1126.

The charter of Baltimore gives the board of estimates power to grant permits for the erection of bow or bay windows, hitching posts, area ways, steps, and other minor privileges, upon service of notice upon adjoining property owners, and such board may permit a fence to extend 3 inches into an alley. Fralinger v. Cooke, 108 Md. 682, 71 Atl. 529.

And in Garrett v. Janes, 65 Md. 260, 3 Atl. 597, where an act conferred power on the mayor and council to regulate the limits within which it should be lawful to erect steps, porticos, porches, etc., an entrance to a house taking up a portion of a highway was held lawful.

In Livingston v. Wolf, 136 Pa. 519, 20

volved, led to the construction of the wall in good faith under the provisions of an ordinance of the municipal assembly." The wall was erected in substantial compliance with the permission, at considerable cost, and was ornamental, and not utilitarian, in its character. Both Eighty-Ninth street and Riverside Drive are public streets of the city, in the borough of Manhattan, and the ownership of the fee of the bed of each is in the city. They are of a prescribed width between the house lines, and the wall in question is substantially upon what is known as the stoop line in either street. The permits obtained from the municipal assembly and from the park commissioner were not formally recalled or otherwise revoked than through the demand of the plaintiff, prior to this action, for the removal of the wall with its piers and pillars; which demand was alleged in the complaint and is found to have been made, as a fact. It was also found that the portions of Eighty-Ninth street and of Riverside Drive affected

Am. St. Rep. 936, 20 Atl. 551, it was held that an ordinance providing that a bulk or jut window should not project over a certain distance into the street implied that one might be built which did not exceed that limit, and that one so built did not constitute an unlawful obstruction to the street.

And it was held in Dannenberg v. Macon, 114 Ga. 174, 39 S. E. 880, that the charter of Macon conferred power upon the corporate authorities, in their discretion, to grant encroachments upon its streets. It does not appear in the case what the encroachment involved was.

Where the legislature has authorized cities "to close and vacate any street or alley or any portion thereof," and to regulate depots and depot grounds, a city may vacate part of a street and authorize the erection of a depot thereon, stipulating that the depot company shall purchase a strip of land near by and dedicate it for a street. Leavenworth v. Douglass, 59 Kan. 416, 53 Pac. 123.

It has been held, under some charter and statutory provisions, that no power to authorize such encroachments was conferred.

Thus, under a charter provision that the municipal assembly shall have no power to authorize the placing or continuing of any encroachment upon a street, except of a temporary nature, it has been held that a wall of a permanent structure which extends over 3 feet into the street cannot be authorized, nor can it be authorized under the act giving park commissioners power to authorize and regulate projections, since such provision must be taken in connection with the other provisions of the charter relating to the inalienability of streets. Ackerman v. True, 175 N. Y. 353, 67 N. E. 629.

And the board of aldermen and park commissioners have no power, under such acts, to authorize the building of a bay window and portico which extend beyond a set-back line agreed to by the abutting owners to widen the sidewalk. Williams v. Robert M. Silverman Realty & Constr. Co. 111 App. Div. 679, 97 N. Y. Supp. 945.

So, a city council has no authority to authorize the erection of an outside stairway occupying a position on the sidewalk, although the charter gives full power to lay out, open, widen, alter, close, fill in, grade, vacate, or abolish streets, where it further 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

provides that the council shall not grant exclusive privileges to use the streets or public grounds of the city. McCormick v. Weaver, 144 Mich. 6, 107 N. W. 314.

And power to grant the right to use the streets for bay windows, area ways, steps, etc., does not give the municipality power to grant permission to erect a platform along the sidewalk, and remove the curb, so that wagons may be more easily loaded. Brauer v. Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Co. 99 Md. 367, 66 L.R.A. 403, 105 Am. St. Rep. 304, 58 Atl. 21.

And the power conferred upon the city council of Philadelphia to make and establish general rules for the regulation of bay windows does not authorize them to authorize the building of a bay window extending beyond the street line, in one particular house only. Reimer's Appeal, 100 Pa. 182, 45 Am. Rep. 373; to the same effect is Com. v. Harris, 10 W. N. C. 10.

And a charter provision giving a city power to regulate the use of streets for any other purpose than public travel does not empower it to confer the right upon a railroad to erect a freight platform and roof occupying exclusively 12 or more feet of a sidewalk. State, Traphagen, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 52 N. J. L. 65, 18 Atl. 586, 696.

In Storek v. Baltimore, 101 Md. 476, 61 Atl. 330, an act empowering the city to regulate the obstructions of streets was held void for uncertainty and because of arbitrary and unreasonable classification, and the city was impliedly held not to have power to allow the erection of steps extending out onto the sidewalk.

In New York v. Heft, 13 Daly, 301, the court said that the common council of New York was forbidden to permit any encroachment, except the temporary occupation of the street for construction purposes, and an ordinance providing that no one should be sued for placing an encumbrance in the street, unless he persisted in maintaining it for ten days after notice to remove, was held invalid.

As to the power of municipalities to grant or lease space on street or sidewalk for business purposes, see note to Chapman v. Lincoln, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 400, and as to the liability of municipalities for permitting obstructions to be placed in the street, see note to McKim v. Philadelphia, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 506.

were within the jurisdiction of the commissioner of parks. The trial court reached the conclusion that the construction and maintenance of the wall were illegal, and constituted a continuing trespass and a public nuisance; that the resolution of the municipal assembly and the consent of the commissioner of parks were illegal and void; and that the plaintiff should have judgment enjoining the further maintenance of the structure, and directing its removal and the restoration of the sidewalk to the condition in which it would be without the same.

The judgment entered upon the decision of the trial court was unanimously affirmed by the justices of the appellate division, in the first department, and, from the order of affirmance, the defendants have further appealed to this court.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants concede that the permits granted by the municipal assembly and by the commissioner of parks, under which the wall in question was constructed beyond the house, and within the street, lines, were revocable; but they insist that, for want of a revocation by appropriate action, the permits remain in full force. Their contention is, and necessarily must be, that there was authority, under the provisions of the city charter, in the governing body, or in this department of the municipality, to authorize a structure of this purely ornamental or decorative character. I think the appeal must fail. It is not a question of discretion, within the exercise of which that which is actually an occupation or obstruction of the street by an abutting property owner might, nevertheless, because of its decorative or artistic construction, as enhancing the attractiveness of the streets or park thoroughfares, be permitted. It is a question, simply, of the existence of any power in the municipality to consent to a permanent use of any part of a street for private purposes. That the construction of this wall was for the private purposes of the owner of the property inclosed by it is indisputable, and it cannot be material how far it was a decorative feature of the neighborhood, if neither municipal assembly nor park department was vested with authority to sanction its maintenance. The ownership by the city of the fee of land in the streets is impressed with a trust to keep the same open and for use as such. The trust is publici juris,—that is, for the whole people of the state,—and is under the absolute control of the legislature; in which body, as representing the people, is vested power to govern and to regulate the use of the streets. There is no right in the city to use its property therein, as it might corporate property, nor otherwise than as the legislature may authorize for some public use or benefit. People v. Kerr, 27 N. Y. 188; Kellinger v. Forty-second Street & G. Street Ferry R. Co. 50 N. Y. 206; Deshong v. New York, 176 N. Y. 475, 483, 68 N. E. 880. It follows, from the nature of its title, that the city cannot dispose of the streets for, nor divert them to, private uses. Whatever the power of control or of regulation possessed by the legislature, it is restricted in the direction of what may be deemed to be a public use, having in view, of course, the demands of a progressive civilization. See People v. Kerr, supra, and Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146. The streets were opened for the unrestricted use of the public, and the assessments for the costs were levied upon the properties benefited, and were paid upon the implied promise that they should be maintained, in all their integrity, as public highways. Any erection of permanent and substantial structures thereon, not for a public use, would constitute an encroachment or obstruction, and would therefore be a public nuisance. Oxford v. Willoughby, 181 N. Y. 155, 73 N. E. 677. Not only, therefore, does the nature of the title, by which the municipality holds the streets, forbid the inference of any implied power to grant the permission relied upon in this case, but such a power was, in express terms, withdrawn by a provision of the charter in force at the time. It contains the provision that the municipal assembly should have power to regulate the use of the streets and highways; "but they shall have no power to authorize the placing or continuing of any encroachment or obstruction upon any street or sidewalk, except the temporary occupation thereof during the erection or repairing of a building on a lot opposite the same." Charter of 1897 (Laws 1897, chap. 378) § 49, subd. 3. This provision, as construed by this court, denies to the municipal authorities any power to consent to the private use of any part of the street as laid out. The provision, as well as other statutory provisions relating to the jurisdiction and powers of the department of parks, upon which the appellants lay stress, as confirming, through the permit of the commissioner, their right to maintain the wall, have received very definite construction in Ackerman v. True, 175 N. Y. 353, 67 N. E. 629. In that case, the defendant had built his house over the line of the street to the extent of 31-2 feet, and the action was brought to compel him to remove so much of the building. The complainant was an adjoining property owner; but, necessarily, the right to the equitable relief, and to the compensatory damages sought, depended upon its being established that there had been such an interference with public and common rights as to create a public nuisance. It was held that the encroachment upon the street was a public nuisance, being an obstruction of the highway. The premises were on Riverside Drive, not far from these defendants' property, and the defendant there attempted to justify his acts under a permit issued by the commissioner of parks, who, as he claimed, was invested with power to permit such encroachments on streets within the jurisdiction of the park board. The statutes relied upon were held to be lacking in authority to the park board, or any member thereof, to grant to abutting property owners "a permit, or right, to extend the main wall of a permanent and substantial structure 3 feet and 6 inches into and beyond the line of the street." If such power was possessed, it was observed, it was unlimited, and the purpose for which streets were laid out might be impaired or defeated. The charter of 1897 was then in force, and it was said that any other construction would "result in practically annulling that portion of the charter of Greater New York which provides that streets and other public places in the city shall be inalienable. . . . Although it is true that the title of the streets in the city of New York is in the municipality, that title is held by it in trust for public use, and not even the municipal assembly has authority to permit permanent encroachments thereon." Citation is then made in the opinion of the inhibitory provision of the charter, already given above. Further provisions of the charter relating to the jurisdiction of the park board, under the Revision of 1901, were not considered to have extended it so as to confer a right "to permit an abutting owner upon any of the streets of the city, . . . to encroach upon the street by the erection of permanent and substantial structures thereon." It was thought that the constitutionality of the statute, if construed to confer the power to permit such, would be very doubtful. The case of Wormser v. Brown, 149 N. Y. 163, 43 N. E. 524, was held to be inapplicable as an authority for the defendant's case. In that case, a bay window was constructed under a permit of the park department, and an adjoining property owner, who complained of it as an illegal interference with the street, from which he suffered injury, was defeated upon two grounds. He was in pari delicto, in that there was an erection upon his own property, extending into the street a greater distance, and he had failed to show any material injury. The two cases were held to be distinguishable, and the doctrine of the Wormser Case was considered to be insufficient to sustain the plaintiff's contention. It may be further observed that, in the present case, it is the city which is invoking the aid of the courts in undoing that which has been illegally done. Our decision of Ackerman v. True has been followed in several well-considered opinions by the appellate division of the supreme court, and its authority should not now be questioned. See New York v. Knickerbocker Trust Co. 104 App. Div. 223, 93 N. Y. Supp. 937; McMillan v. Klaw & E. Constr. Co. 107 App. Div. 407, 95 N. Y. Supp. 365; Williams v. Robert M. Silverman Realty & Constr. Co. 111 App. Div. 679, 97 N. Y. Supp. 945; Hatfield v. Straus, 117 App. Div. 671, 102 N. Y. Supp. 934; People ex rel. Mark Cross Co. v. Ahearn, 124 App. Div. 840, 109 N. Y. Supp. 249.

Cases which relate to the right to construct and to maintain vaults or cellars under sidewalks of streets are inapplicable, inasmuch as by the charter of Greater New York, and by statute for many years theretofore, authority had been expressly conferred upon municipal authorities to make and to repeal ordinances in relation to the construction and use of vaults. In Deshong v. New York, 176 N. Y. 475, 68 N. E. 880, that subject is quite fully discussed. I think it to be fairly clear that there is a distinction between the right to permit the use of the subsoil of a city street by an abutting owner and the right to permit a permanent encroachment upon the street, by which the absolute right of the people to the uninterrupted use thereof may be diminished. So, too, with respect to street awnings, which have been held to be within the power of the city authorities to authorize, the legislature has classified them with signs, horse troughs, telegraph posts, and such like purposes, as legitimate street uses. See consolidation act of 1882, chap. 410, § 86, and city charters, in § 49 of act of 1897, and § 50 in act of 1901 (Laws 1901, chap. 466); Hoey v. Gilroy, 129 N. Y. 132, 29 N. E. 85. They are, within common-law rules, encroachments and obstructions; but the most that could be said is that, if the legislature has stretched its power in delegating to the governing body of the municipality the right to authorize the erection of awnings, such an encroachment is of too unsubstantial a nature to be seriously considered as a public nuisance.

I think that there is no force in the objection that an action in equity is not maintainable. Oxford v. Willoughby, 181 N. Y. 155, 73 N. E. 677. If it could be assumed that some revocation of the permission given was necessary, on the part of the city, its demand for the removal of the wall was sufficient notice to the defendant Rice of the revocation. Upon his neglect or refusal to comply with the city's demand, and in view of his claim to be legally entitled to maintain his wall, the appropriate, as indeed the most considerate, way to proceed to try out the question whether he could be compelled to remove the structure as a continuing nuisance was to bring the controversy before a court of equity, where it could be finally and completely determined.

For these reasons, I advise the affirmance of the judgment appealed from.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the City of Richmond to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. R. Pollard and G. W. Anderson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John A. Lamb and S. A. Anderson for defendant in error.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by Lambert against the city of Richmond, to recover damages for an injury which was received by him from a fall, due, as he contends, to the negligence of the city of Richmond in failing to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition. The particular ground of complaint stated in the declaration is that there was a step on Williamsburg avenue, one of the streets of the city, between Louisiana and Graham streets, in front of the building known as "No. 3822," over which the plaintiff stumbled and fell, and received the injury of which he complains. In obedience to a provision of the charter of the city of Richmond, Segar Waters, Orelia Waters, and A. Anderson, who were the "owners, users, or lessees of the property" in front of which the step was situated, were made parties defendant, and such proceedings were had as resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $2,000, and the case is before us upon a writ of error.

During the progress of the trial there were many exceptions taken to the rulings of the court; but in the view which we take of the case, we deem it necessary to consider but one of them, a decision of which will be conclusive of the controversy.

The court was asked to instruct the jury as follows: "The court instructs the jury that though they believe from the evidence that the step in the declaration mentioned was an encroachment upon the street, and that the plaintiff received injury by coming in contact therewith, as in the declaration alleged, and that the same was the proximate cause of the accident, yet, inasmuch as the evidence in the case as to the nature, size, character, and use of the said step is clear, and is without conflict, the court instructs the jury that, as a question of law, the said step was not such an obstruction in the street as to render the city of Richmond liable for the injury resulting therefrom, and they should find a verdict for the defendant the city of Richmond."

The step in question was 4½ inches high and 10½ inches wide, was close up to the building in front of which it was placed, and was used as a means of access to it. We are of opinion that such a step, in such a place, did not constitute an unlawful obstruction in the street, and did not interfere to an appreciable or unreasonable extent with the use of the sidewalk.

In Parrish v. Huntington, 57 W. Va. 286, 50 S. E. 416, it is said: "A municipal corporation is not an insurer against accidents upon streets or sidewalks. Nor is every defect therein, though it may cause the injury sued for, actionable. It is sufficient if the street is in a reasonably safe condition for travel in the ordinary modes, with ordinary care, by day or night; and whether so or not is a practical question, to be determined in each case by its particular circumstances. Where the evidence is without conflict, and it is clear and conclusive therefrom that a particular obstruction existed upon the sidewalk of the street of a municipal corporation, it is a question of law as to whether or not the obstruction was such as to render the sidewalk not in a reasonably safe condition, and thereby make the corporation liable in damages to a person injured by reason thereof."

In Robert v. Powell, 168 N. Y. 411, 55 L.R.A. 775, 85 Am. St. Rep. 673, 61 N. E. 699, it was held that a stepping-stone to facilitate access to carriages, placed near the edge of the sidewalk, which does not interfere in the least with the use of the roadway, or to an appreciable extent with the use of the sidewalk, is not a nuisance, so as to give a foot passenger, injured by stumbling over it in attempting to cross the street at a time when it is plainly visible, a right of action against the owner. In the course of the opinion the court said: "The stepping-stone in this case, located upon the sidewalk in front of a private house, was a reasonable and necessary use of the street, not only for the convenience of the owner of the house, but for other persons who desired to visit or enter the house for business or other lawful purpose. It did not interfere in the least with the use of the roadway or bed of the street, nor did it interfere to any appreciable or unreasonable extent with the use of the sidewalk. There was 8 feet of a clear open space upon the sidewalk for the use of travelers; and the fact that the plaintiff, while hurrying in the nighttime to take a cab, stumbled over the stone, when the place was well lighted and the object plainly visible, does not prove, or tend to prove, that the defendant was guilty of any wrong or breach of duty in maintaining the stepping-stone in front of her house. It is true that the plaintiff was injured; but that was the result of an accident, due, possibly, to his own fault, but, at all events, not to any fault on the part of the defendant, or to any unlawful obstruction by the defendant of the street."

In Dubois v. Kingston, 102 N. Y. 219, 55 Am. Rep. 804, 6 N. E. 273, a stepping-stone 3 feet, 4 inches in length, and 20 inches wide, was placed on the edge of the sidewalk. The court observed that the stone was not of unusual size, or located in an improper place, and that it would be extending the liability of cities too far to hold them liable for permitting stepping-stones on the edge of sidewalks.

In Wolff v. District of Columbia, 196 U. S. 152, 49 L. ed. 426, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 967, the court said: "There are objects which subserve the use of streets, and cannot be considered obstructions to them, although some portion of their space may be occupied."

"It would be adding to the corporate liability beyond reasonable limits," said Mr. Justice Miller in Dubois v. Kingston, supra, "to hold that stepping-stones, which are almost a necessity in providing for the interest, comfort, and convenience of the public in the maintenance of walks, avenues, and streets, constitute a nuisance or obstruction, and that corporations are liable for damages by reason of accidents caused thereby."

The cases we have cited have dealt specifically with objects such as hydrants, hitching posts, telegraph poles, awning posts, and stepping-stones in the sidewalk next to the street or curb, and they have been held not to constitute a nuisance, but to be a reasonable and necessary use of the street. In the case before us the stepping-stone was equally useful and equally necessary to the enjoyment of the premises in front of which it was placed; indeed, it subserved the convenience of a greater number of persons than a horse-block would have done. The number of such steps in this city is very great. To compel their removal would be a great hardship, and we think it may safely be left to the city to determine when their removal should be required.

This case is to be differentiated from that of Richmond v. Gentry (Va.) 68 S. E. 274, by the fact that the stone in that case was 10 inches from the building in front of which it was placed, and therefore in the midst of the sidewalk.

We are of opinion that the court erred in 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

refusing to grant instruction G, and that for this error its judgment must be reversed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

JULIA ANSPACH

v.

PHILADELPHIA & READING RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

Railroad crossing — accident — stranger — duty to listen.

1. A railroad company cannot be held liable for the death of one who drives on the track upon a railroad crossing without looking or listening for approaching trains, because he was unfamiliar with the country, where it omits the performance of no duty which it owes him.

Evidence — negative — weight.

2. Evidence of witnesses that they did not hear signals given by a railroad train for a street crossing will not establish negligence on the part of the railroad company where the train operatives testify positively that they were given.

Note. — Liability for killing or injuring at railroad crossing one who went on crossing without knowledge of its existence.

The fact that a traveler approaching a crossing is ignorant of its existence obviously, as a general proposition, imposes no greater duty upon the railroad company in operating its trains over the crossing than if he were aware of its existence. But the company may, by its omission of some duties, subject itself to a liability for injury to one ignorant of a crossing, where it would not be liable if he knew thereof. For example, where an injury at a crossing is caused by a disregard of the statutory requirement to maintain an adequate signboard at a crossing, such omission would constitute negligence which would justify a recovery on the part of one who was a stranger to the locality and wholly ignorant of the existence of the crossing, or the presence of any signboard; and such was the conclusion reached in Lewis v. Long Island R. Co. 162 N. Y. 52, 56 N. E. 548; Henn v. Long Island R. Co. 51 App. Div. 292, 65 N. Y. Supp. 21; Stewart v. Long Island R. Co. 54 App. Div. 623, 66 N. Y. Supp. 436, affirmed without opinion in 156 N. Y. 604, 59 N. E. 1130 (all of the cases arose from the same accident).

So, where the company has been negligent in operating its trains over the crossing, the defense of contributory negligence will not be established by showing that the APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Schuylkill County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John F. Whalen, for appellant:

It was the duty of the deceased to stop, look, and listen for approaching trains before attempting to cross the track, irrespective of his knowledge of the country.

On the other hand, in Allyn v. Boston & A. R. Co. 105 Mass. 77, the defense of contributory negligence was held to be established where it was shown that the plaintiff, who was ignorant of the existence of the crossing at which he was injured, was

The testimony of three witnesses that they were listening for some signal by bell or whistle of the approach of the train, and heard none, constituted more than a scintilla of evidence, and was of a higher grade than merely negative testimony, and was sufficient to warrant submission to the jury of the question as to whether or not proper signals were given.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action Julia Anspach seeks to recover damages for the death of her husband, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff's husband, John Anspach, resided at New Philadelphia, Schuylkill county. He was a miner by occupation, and was also constable of the borough. On the morning of November 19, 1903, at an early hour, he left his home to join two neighbors, for the purpose of going on a hunting trip to the eastern part of the county. They rode in a buggy, Anspach and one of his companions upon the seat, and the other, who was driving, seated on their laps. On the way they were joined by four other men, who rode behind them in another conveyance. In order to reach the hunting grounds, they passed through the borough of New Ringgold, about 10 miles southeast of New Philadelphia. At this point the road upon which they were driving along a highway which ran for a mile or more nearly parallel with the railroad, and was for the most of the distance in sight of it, and which, as the crossing was approached, bent a little and began to rise, the railroad track and the usual signboard over the highway being visible for several rods before the crossing was reached, but the plaintiff having failed to look up at the foot of the ascent.

In Doyle v. Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. 139 N. Y. 637, 34 N. E. 1063, recovery was allowed for injuries received at a crossing by an active and intelligent woman who, while walking at night along a street with which she was unfamiliar, and after crossing twenty-four tracks, was struck at an isolated track crossing the same street, by the defendant's train, which was running very fast and upon which no bell was rung nor whistle sounded, she supposing that the train was upon another track.

traveling crossed at grade, and at right angles, the track of the Little Schuylkill Railroad, a branch of the Philadelphia & Reading, which runs from Port Clinton to Tamaqua; the crossing being 70 feet south of a railroad station, and being that of an ordinary country road. According to the testimony of the companions of Anspach, they were not aware of the location of the railroad, and were not on the lookout, but drove straight to the crossing, without stopping or looking or listening for the approach of a train. Just as the horse reached the track, a freight train going south reached the crossing. The horse was turned by the driver, or veered to one side of its own accord, and sustained little injury; but the buggy was struck and demolished, its occupants were thrown out, and Anspach fell under the wheels of the train, and received injuries from which he died in a few hours. The train was made up of an engine and forty-two freight cars, and was running down grade, by gravity, at a speed, according to the engineer, of 10 or 12 miles an hour. It carried a burning headlight, and two other lights on the engine, and approached the crossing on a straight track from a point 2,000 feet distant. There is ample evidence to show that the whistle was blown several times before the train reached the crossing, and that the bell was rung continuously from a point about 1,200 feet above the crossing down to the moment of the collision. The usual station equipment of lamps for a country station was in place and burning, such as a large lamp in front, semaphore lights a short distance from, and opposite, the station, and a light in the operator's office. Yet Anspach and his companions apparently neither heard nor saw anything to indicate danger to them, until they drove almost into the approaching engine. The accident occurred about 6 o'clock in the morning of a November day, while it was yet dark. Not so dark, however, but that the travelers could, as they testified, distinguish teams and vehicles which they met upon the road.

The first question which arises in the consideration of this case is whether there is any evidence of any neglect by the defendant company of any duty which it owed Anspach. Whether or not he was acquainted with the locality was not definitely shown. His companions testified that they did not know the location of the railroad, and for that reason they did not stop, look, or listen as they approached the track. But the defendant company was not to blame for any ignorance in this respect upon the part of Anspach. It was not its duty to hunt him up and inform him of the location of its line. Had the approach of these parties been made in daylight, no excuse could have been offered for their failure to observe the railroad and take the usual precautions against danger. Nor can anything be fairly predicated in favor of Anspach and his companions because they were traveling in the darkness. If they chose to use the highway at night, they incurred the risk of encountering such obstacles as might lawfully be found along the line of travel. The railroad was where it had the lawful right to be, either by day or by night. It is plainly the duty of parties wishing to travel over an unknown road at night to inform themselves in advance of possible dangers that may beset their way. Certainly in the present case the defendant company cannot justly be held responsible for the results of the ignorance of Anspach and his companions. The increased risk of traveling by night was one which they assumed, and it is not to be cast upon the defendant company.

Undoubtedly, it is the duty of a railroad company in approaching a crossing in a rural community to run at a reasonable rate of speed, and to give proper warning by means of signal or the blowing of a whistle or the ringing of the bell. In this respect the evidence is clear and convincing that every reasonable requirement was met. The evidence of the train crew is that the whistle was blown several times, and at three distinct places, as the train slowly approached the station and the crossing. The bell was also rung continuously for quite a distance, and for some time before the collision. There was no testimony on the part of the plaintiff that the whistle was not blown or the bell rung. The witnesses on that point for plaintiff merely said they did not hear the whistle or bell. Negative testimony of this character by those who did not hear, as against the positive, affirmative testimony of witnesses who did hear, and who were in a position to know, is not enough to make out a charge of negligence. Hauser v. Central R. Co. 147 Pa. 440, 23 Atl. 766. We held in Newhard v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 153 Pa. 417, 19 L.R.A. 563, 26 Atl. 105, where eleven witnesses testified that they heard the whistle, as against plaintiff's testimony that he did not hear it, that the court must treat the allegation that the whistle was blown as a fact, "because of proof that convinces an unprejudiced mind beyond a reasonable doubt." In Knox v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 202 Pa. 504, 52 Atl. 90, we held, as set forth in the syllabus, that "the testimony of one witness, a passenger, that a train approached a crossing without ringing a bell or sounding a whistle, contradicted by the engineer, fireman, conductor, and brakeman, is insufficient to carry a case to the jury on the question of the railroad company's neg ligence." And in Keiser v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 212 Pa. 409, 108 Am. St. Rep. 872, 61 Atl. 903, we again held as summed up in the syllabus that, "in a railroad grade crossing accident case, the negative testimony of nine witnesses that they did not hear the whistle blown nor the bell rung on a stormy and windy night, amounting only to a scintilla, cannot prevail against the overwhelming and positive testimony of fourteen witnesses, which conclusively established the fact that these duties were performed. In such a case the trial judge is warranted in giving binding instructions to the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant." It further appears definitely that the train was not running at a rate of more than 12 miles per hour, and was under such good control that it was brought to a standstill at the crossing, when not more than half of the train had passed. So that in none of these things does it appear from the evidence that there was any neglect of duty upon the part of the defendant company. The trial judge would have been justified in taking the case from the jury for want of sufficient evidence to justify a verdict against the defendant.

In addition to this, we can find nothing in the evidence to show any reasonable excuse for the neglect of Anspach and his companions to take notice of the approach of the train as they drove to meet it at the crossing. If they did not see the signal lights at the station, the headlight of the approaching locomotive, and one upon an engine standing near by, nor hear the repeated blasts of the whistle, and the ringing of the bell, and the rumbling of a long train of freight cars, then indeed must they have made but little use of their senses.

A careful examination of the evidence in this case leads us to the irresistible conclusion that no negligence upon the part of the defendant company was shown, and that the unfortunate accident which occurred resulted from the heedlessness of the parties who suffered from it. The responsibility for disposing of this case should have been assumed by the court.

The assignments of error are sustained, and the judgment is reversed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plff. in Err.,

v.

(217 U. S. 333, 54 L. ed. 787, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527.)

Eminent domain — taking — easement.

The owner of a farm, a part of which is permanently flooded by a government dam, must be compensated, in addition to the value of the land taken, for the lessened value of the farm, caused by the consequent cutting off of a private way across the lands of others, which is the only practicable outlet from the farm to the county road.

Note. — Interference with access to highway from the part of parcel not taken by the taking of another part as element of damages in condemnation.

This note is confined to cases involving the question of the interference of access to property as an element of damages, where a part of the property has been taken in eminent domain proceedings. The cases involving the question of cutting off access to the highway as a taking, where no part of the property was actually taken, as where a railroad or other improvement was constructed in a street or where the highway was vacated, etc., are collected in a note in 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49.

For cases involving the question as to cutting off access to navigable waters, see note in 40 L.R.A. 604.

The general rule that the owner is entitled to compensation not only for the part of the land actually taken in condemnation proceedings, but also to damages caused to the remainder of the tract, includes, inter alia, interference with access to the highway as an element of the damages to be taken into consideration in arriving at the amount of compensation to be awarded. But while the inconvenience arising from increased difficulty of access owing to the particular location of the improvement is a proper matter for consideration in estimating the damages, it must be considered only as it affects the market value of the land, and not as a distinct item of damages. In other words, the damages awarded must be the difference in the market value as it existed before the taking, and after the appropriation; but, in arriving at the conclusion as to the depreciation in the market value, it is within the province of the jury to inquire whether the interference with the access caused a depreciation, and, if any, its extent, in the market value.

Thus, where land was rendered inaccessible by the construction of a railroad embankment, the difference in the value of the land just before and just after the construction of the road was the measure of damages, and not the cost of constructing a road from the land to existing highways. Red River, T. & S. R. Co. v. Hughes, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 472, 81 S. W. 1235.

And so, also, in the following cases, in-ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Kentucky to review a judgment awarding damages to the owner of property permanently flooded by a government dam. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Q. Thompson, A. C. Campbell, and Percy C. Cox, for plaintiff in error:

If private property is merely lessened in value by the erection of a public improvement, and is not invaded or encroached upon, there is no implied contract to make compensation therefor.

S. 635, 642, 25 L. ed. 336, 339; United States v. Lynah, 188 U. S. 445, 465, 47 L. ed. 539, 546, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; Mills v. United States, 12 L.R.A. 673, 46 Fed. 742.

To constitute a taking of private property such as is inhibited by the 5th Amendment to the Constitution, unless just compensation is made, it must be shown that the owner thereof has been wholly deprived of the use of the same. If it has been merely injured or its use impaired, there is no taking such as is contemplated by said Amendment.

Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, supra; Bedford v. United States, 192 U. S. 217, 223-terference with access to a highway has been held to be an element of damages to be considered in arriving at the conclusion as to the amount of depreciation in the market value caused by the improvement: Hooper v. Savannah & M. R. Co. 69 Ala. 529; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Allen, 41 Ark. 431; Rock Island & E. I. R. Co. v. Gordon, 184 Ill. 456, 56 S. E. 810; Union R. Transfer & Stock Yard Co. v. Moore, 80 Ind. 458; Cincinnati, R. & M. R. Co. v. Miller, 36 Ind. App. 36, 72 N. E. 827, 73 N. E. 1001; Elizabethtown, L. & B. S. R. Co. v. Catlettsburg Water Co. 110 Ky. 175, 61 S. W. 47; Kansas City, St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Farrell, 76 Mo. 183; Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. Miller, 106 Mo. 458, 17 S. W. 499; Hatch v. Cincinnati & I. R. Co. 18 Ohio St. 92; Watson v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. 37 Pa. 469.

The destruction of a lot owner's easement of ingress and egress over a private street, by the building of a county bridge, is such a taking of his property as entitles him to recover damages against the county. Frater v. Hamilton County, 90 Tenn. 661, 19 S. W. 233.

Where the taking of a part of the land increases the expense of moving freight to and from the remainder, and thereby affects a business conducted thereon, that fact should be regarded in estimating the damages. Richmond, P. & C. R. Co. v. Chamblin, 100 Va. 401, 41 S. E. 750.

And the right of way to a public highway, across the land of another connected with land sought to be condemned, is such an interest that it should be taken into consideration in determining the value of the land, and estimating the compensation to be paid. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. Ward, 128 Ill. 349, 18 N. E. 828, 21 N. E. 562.

But in assessing damages for the location and construction of a railroad through a farm, the owner is not entitled to an allowance for interference with his access, by means of a public highway, to a watering place thereon, but within the bounds of another's land, arising from the manner in which the highway is crossed by the railroad. Gorgas v. Philadelphia, H. & P. R. Co. 144 Pa. 1, 22 Atl. 715. The court said the plaintiff had no right to the water nor of access to it, which was special to him- 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

self or to his land, or which was not common to the public, and was merely deprived of what did not belong to him.

And the rule is the same where the injury done to the landowner is by destroying all communication between the parts of his land lying on opposite sides of the improvement for which a part of the land has been taken. Mason v. Kennebec & P. R. Co. 31 Me. 215.

So, inconvenience caused by embankments, excavations, ditches, and other obstructions, in going from one part of the land to another, which has been separated by the taking of a part, must be considered as an element of damage arising from the improvement. Omaha Southern R. Co. v. Todd, 39 Neb. 818, 58 N. W. 289; Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. Bates, 40 Neb. 381, 58 N. W. 959; Somerville & E. R. Co. v. Doughty, 22 N. J. L. 495.

And so, also, the following cases support the rule as applied to interference with communication between different parts of the land. No attempt, however, has been made to exhaust the authorities upon this point. Peoria A. & D. R. Co. v. Sawyer, 71 Ill. 361; Keithsburg & E. R. Co. v. Henry, 79 Ill. 292; Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 90 Ill. 316; Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. v. Greiney, 137 Ill. 628, 25 N. E. 798; Bell v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 343, 37 N. W. 768; Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dillard, 35 La. 1045; New Orleans P. R. Co. v. Murrell, 36 La. 344; Grand Rapids, L. & D. R. Co. v. Chesbro, 74 Mich. 466, 42 N. W. 66; Re Utica, C. & S. Valley R. Co. 56 Barb. 456; Pittsburgh, V. & C. R. Co. v. Vance, 115 Pa. 325, 8 Atl. 764; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Durrett, 57 Tex. 48; Lyons v. United States, 26 Ct. Cl. 31.

So, the measure of damages for overflowing land by the construction of a milldam was held in Harding v. Funk, 8 Kan. 315, to be the difference in the value of the land before and after its erection, but the landowner had the right to show to the jury the additional expense in making a crossing over the stream on his own land, to put the remaining part in condition to be used after the milldam had been erected and the stream raised in consequence thereof. To the same effect is Bates v. Ray, 102 Mass. 458.

Where ingress and egress to and from private property is rendered more difficult by reason of the erection of a public improvement, and the value of the property is thereby lessened, there is not a taking such as is contemplated by said Amendment.

A claim for damages against the government which arises out of the construction of a lock and dam to improve the navigable capacity of a river, whereby a private road has been destroyed, which afforded to the owners of the farm convenient access to and from a public highway, is not a claim founded upon the Constitution, even though the destruction of the private road has lessened the value of the farm.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding under the act of March 3, 1887, chap. 359, § 2, 24 Stat. at L. 505, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 753, to recover the value of land taken by the United States. It is admitted that a strip of about 3 acres of land lying along the side of Four Mile creek, and running east and west, was taken, and is to be paid for. It was permanently flooded by a dam on the Kentucky river, into which Four Mile creek flows. United States v. Lynah, 188 U. S. 445, 47 L. ed. 539, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; Manigault v. Springs, 199 U. S. 473, 484, 50 L. ed. 274, 280, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 127. The plaintiffs owned other land south of and adjoining the strip taken, and had a private right of way at right angles to the creek, northerly, across land of other parties, to the Ford county road, which ran parallel to the creek and at some distance from it. This was the only practical outlet from the plaintiff's farm to the county road. The taking of the intervening strip of course cut off the use of the way, and the judge who tried the case found that it lessened the value of the farm $1,700. He allowed this sum in addition to $300 for the land taken. The United States took a writ of error on the ground that the former item was merely for collateral damage not amounting to a taking and of a kind that cannot be allowed; that at most it was only a tort. The case is likened to the depreciation in value of a neighboring but distinct tract by reason of the use to which the government intends to put that which it takes. Sharp v. United States, 191 U. S. 341, 355, 48 L. ed. 211, 216, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 114.

The petition, like the form of the finding, lends some countenance to this contention, by laying emphasis on the damage to the farm, although it is to be noted that, even in this aspect, the damage is to the tract of which a part is taken. 191 U. S. 354. But both petition and finding in substance show clearly that the way has been permanently cut off. A private right of way is an easement and is land. We perceive no reason why it should not be held to be acquired by the United States as incident to the fee for which it admits that it must pay. But if it were only destroyed and ended, a destruction for public purposes may as well be a taking as would be an appropriation for the same end. Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 547, 10 L.R.A. 116, 23 Am. St. Rep. 850, 26 N. E. 100. The same reasoning that allows a recovery for the taking of land by permanent occupation allows it for a right of way taken in the same manner; and the value of the easement cannot be ascertained without reference to the dominant estate to which it was attached. The argument is only confused by reference to cases like Gibson v. United States, 166 U. S. 269, 41 L. ed. 996, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578; Harvard College v. Stearns, 15 Gray, 1; Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254, where it was held, although there are decisions the other way, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that a landowner cannot recover for the obstruction of a public water course, the discontinuance of a public way, or the like. The ground of such decisions is that the plaintiff's rights are subject to superior public rights, or that he has no private right, and that his damage, though greater in degree than that of the rest of the public, is the same in kind. Here there is no question of the plaintiff's private right. Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice Harlan concurs in the judgment only so far as it allows the item of $300.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

V. E. SAYRE, Plff. in Err.,
v.

R. H. WOODYARD, Admr., etc., of E. R. Woodyard, Deceased.

(66 W. Va. 288, 66 S. E. 320.)

Appeal — exclusion of evidence — prejudicial error — necessity of showing.

1. Although a question propounded a witness, objection to which was sustained below, shows on its face the relevancy and materiality of the evidence called for, error in the ruling thereon will not be available here, unless it appears what the answers

Headnotes by MILLER, P.

Note. — Competency of original debtor to testify to payment made to decedent, in action by third person against the estate to recover amount so paid.

It was held in McBrien v. Martin, 87 Tenn. 13, 9 S. W. 201, which was an action against an administrator to recover money paid his decedent for the plaintiff's benefit, that the person who made the payment was not rendered incompetent as a witness to prove such fact, by a statute which prohibited either party to an action by or against an executor or administrator, to testify to transactions with the decedent, since such witness, although interested in the result of the litigation, was not a party to the action.

But, on the other hand, it was held in McClanahan v. McClanahan, 129 Iowa, 411, 105 N. W. 833, an action against an estate to enforce a trust in money received by decedent, that the one making the payment to the decedent was rendered incompetent to prove such fact, by a statute declaring that the parties interested in the result of an action or proceeding, as well as parties to the action itself, shall not be examined as witnesses in regard to any personal transaction had with a decedent. The court said that "it is manifest that whatever rights the claimant had arose out of the trust re-would have been, or what was proposed to be proven thereby; the test here being whether the error complained of was prejudicial to the complaining party.

Evidence — suppressed deposition — contents — hearsay.

2. Alleged admission to the opposite party of the same facts testified to by a witness whose deposition has been suppressed at the trial cannot be shown in evidence on the cross-examination of such opposite party, to supply the loss of the deposition suppressed.

Witness — account — leading question — admissibility of evidence.

3. A question propounded plaintiff as to whether two items in an account previously rendered defendant and offered in evidence by him, viz., "September 4, 1898. To notes I gave him to collect, $470.50." "March 15, 1900. To notes I gave him to collect, $438.55,"—represented or were intended to represent the notes sued on, was rightfully rejected as being leading, and otherwise improper.

lation and the alleged payment by the witness to the deceased. The witness was then a person through whom the claimant derived an interest. It is not necessary that the interest shall be derived by transfer or assignment. It may be 'otherwise,' and as used that word is one of broad significance. It means that if the right asserted by a claimant depends for its existence and validity upon a transaction between the deceased and a third person, the evidence of such third person shall not be allowed to prove the transaction."

So, a defendant in an execution who has paid money thereon to an attorney is not competent at common law to prove such fact in an action brought by the plaintiff in the execution against the deceased attorney's estate to recover it, as the witness was liable upon the judgment, and was therefore interested in placing the liability on the deceased attorney so as to relieve himself. Daniel v. Burts, 72 Ga. 143.

Nor is the competency of such person established by a statute relieving interested parties of disability as witnesses, which prohibits one of the original parties to a contract or cause of action in issue or on trial to testify in his own favor after the death of the other party thereto. Ibid.

Attention is called to the following case which, while not within the scope of this note, presents a state of facts closely analogous to the preceding cases:

A statute declaring that where any party to a thing or contract in action is dead, and his right thereto has passed, either by his own act or the act of law, to a party on the record who represents his interest in the subject in controversy, no surviving or remaining party to such thing or contract, or any other person whose interests shall be adverse to the right of such deceased, shall be a competent witness to any matter occurring before the death of said party, does not render a guarantor of a promissory note

Same — action on note — death of payee — proof of payment — competency of maker.

4. After the assignment of a promissory note and death of the assignor or payee, the maker is a competent witness, in an action by the assignee against the administrator of the assignor, to prove assignment and payment of the note to the latter, as agent of the former, in his lifetime.

Evidence — deposition — suppression — ground.

5. If a deposition contain competent evidence on matters in issue at the time it was taken, the fact that the amended declaration, on which the trial was had, put in issue additional matters, is not good ground of objection to the evidence therein pertaining to the matters in issue when taken; and is not good ground for suppressing the deposition, in whole or in part, after trial begun on such amended declaration.

incompetent to testify in an action by the executor of the payee against the maker of the instrument, that it had been paid during the payee's lifetime, as no liability could be imposed upon the guarantor in such action, his liability being separate and distinct from that of the maker of the note, and one which could only be enforced in a separate action. Pattison v. Cobb, 212 Pa. 572, 61 Atl. 1108, reversing 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 72. The court said that the contract which was the subject of litigation was one between the payee and the maker of the note, the effect of which was to make the latter pay his obligation, while the contract to which the witness was a party was not involved in the controversy, and though indorsed on the one executed by the maker, it was as separate from and as independent thereto as though it had been written on another piece of paper, and they were not only separate and independent but entirely different in their nature, that of the maker of the note being an unconditional promise to pay, while that of the guarantor was that he would pay if the maker could not,—not that he would pay if the maker would not. But, said the court, "If at the time . . . [the guarantor] was called as a witness there was a liability on his contract of guaranty, his interest was adverse to the right of the deceased in the contract with . . . [the maker of the note], and for that reason he would have been properly excluded" as a witness.

However, if, before being presented as a witness, the guarantor had been discharged in bankruptcy, his contract of guaranty, if his liability thereon had become fixed, would be included thereunder, and therefore he would be a competent witness to prove such payment, as from the date of his discharge he was not a party to "the thing or contract in action," nor had any interests in it adverse to the rights of the deceased. Ibid.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wirt County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action for an accounting for certain promissory notes delivered to defendant's intestate for collection. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. A. Brown, for plaintiff in error:

The maker of the note was a competent witness.

The trial court erred in excluding the Rathbone deposition because it was taken before the filing of the amended declaration.

Messrs. D. C. Casto and H. A. Somerville for defendant in error.

Miller, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's amended declaration in assumpsit contained the common counts, and a special count upon three notes made by S. B. Rathbone, Jr.,—the first, May 9, 1898, payable twenty-one months after date, to the order of Nimrod Wiseman, for $68.74; the second, November 15, 1899, payable ninety days after date, to E. R. Woodyard, for $219; the third, May 9, 1898, payable twenty-one months after date, to the order of Nimrod Wiseman, for $106.51; and charged that the first and third of said notes, for a valuable consideration, had been indorsed, transferred, and turned over by Wiseman to Woodyard, and by him, for a good and valuable consideration, together with said second note, indorsed in blank, and delivered to plaintiff, and that she, on the ——— day of February, 1900, had redelivered said notes to the said Woodyard for collection and accounting of the proceeds to her; that Woodyard had received and accepted said notes from her in that behalf, and then and there promised plaintiff to collect the same, and, when collected, to pay over the proceeds thereof to her; that Woodyard had in his lifetime in fact collected said notes, but had converted the proceeds to his own use, and had not in his lifetime, nor had his administrator after his death, paid or accounted therefor, or for any part thereof, to plaintiff. The amended declaration is substantially the same as the original, except that the third note counted upon is not called for in the original, and the amount demanded upon said notes in the original declaration is $369.02, while in the amended declaration the amount demanded is $454.25, principal, with interest to January ———, 1904, aggregating $563.27. On the trial below the verdict and judgment was for the defendant. The points relied on are errors alleged to have been committed in the trial, and saved by numerous bills of exceptions.

Harry Sayre, a son of and witness for plaintiff, was asked a number of questions relating to a note which plaintiff claimed had been executed by Mrs. Rathbone to Woodyard by way of security for the notes sued on. The court below sustained objections to these questions, and would not permit them to be answered. The record fails to show what the answers would have been, or what was intended to be proven by them. A rule many times declared by this court, lastly perhaps in Delmar Oil Co. v. Bartlett, 62 W. Va. 700, 708, 59 S. E. 634, is that the refusal of the court below to permit a witness to answer such questions will not, on a motion for a new trial, be available as prejudicial error, unless the expected answer be disclosed before the time of the ruling. Counsel, mindful of this rule, nevertheless insists that these questions show upon their face that the answers must have been material to the issues involved, and are therefore brought within some supposed exception to the general rule. No authority establishing such an exception is cited, however, and we know of none. Even if the questions did indicate the materiality of their answers, materiality is not the test. The test is whether the answers would have aided the complaining party, and their rejection was consequently prejudicial to his interests. We cannot, in reviewing a judgment on writ of error, assume that answers favorable to the exceptor would have been given. Delmar Oil Co. v. Bartlett, supra, point five of the syllabus.

Another question propounded to the same witness was: "Harry, what effort do you know, if any, has been made to get the original note executed by Mrs. Rathbone to E. R. Woodyard?" He answered: "Well, my mother, she promised my mother, I heard her promise my mother, she would look for it, and send it to her if she could possibly find it." The plaintiff complains that this question and answer were ruled out. It is doubtful whether this note was material. It was not one of the notes sued upon. The plaintiff did not claim this note. There was no controversy about it. The most that plaintiff did claim was that it had been taken by Woodyard as security for the notes assigned to her. The failure of the plaintiff to procure Mrs. Rathbone's testimony, and to produce the original note in evidence, could not have been cured in this way.

Complaint is made that answers were not permitted to a number of questions objected to, propounded to R. H. Woodyard, administrator, on cross-examination. The evident object of these questions was to cover the loss of the deposition of S. B. Rathbone, Jr., suppressed, by showing certain supposed admissions or declarations by Rathbone to the witness of facts testified to by him in his deposition. Answers to these questions would clearly have been hearsay, and the evidence objectionable on this ground, if no other. Rathbone was not a party to the suit. What he may have said or admitted to the witness would not have bound the estate of E. R. Woodyard.

Another point is the refusal of the court to permit the witness Woodyard to testify as to what, if anything, was shown by a record book kept by his father with reference to the note of Mrs. Rathbone referred to. This clearly would have been error. The book was the best evidence, was in existence, and, if it contained material evidence and the plaintiff desired it, the proper process of the court should have been employed to produce it. Its contents could not be proven in the way proposed.

Another point relates to the admission in evidence by defendant of two notes executed by the plaintiff in favor of E. R. Woodyard in October and November, 1901, subsequent to the date of the alleged assignment by Woodyard to her of the notes sued upon and discounted in bank by him, and paid by her. The purpose of defendant in introducing these notes evidently was to discredit the plaintiff's evidence as to the fact of the assignment to her of the notes sued on, and for this purpose we think there was no error in admitting the notes in evidence.

Another point made is that the court below erred in not permitting Mrs. Sayre to answer a question propounded to her respecting items in a statement of account rendered by her to the administrator prior to the institution of the suit, offered and admitted in evidence by defendant, as follows: "September 4, 1898. To notes I gave him to collect, $470.50." "March 15, 1900. To notes I gave him to collect, $438.55." She was asked whether there was an item in that statement representing or intending to represent the notes sued upon. Neither of the items represents the aggregate of the notes described in either the original or amended declaration. The first item could not have included the second note described in the amended declaration, for that item antedates the date of the note. But the question was objectionable, if for no other reason, because it was leading. It suggested the answer. It had not even the virtue of words, "whether or not," sometimes employed by counsel in an endeavor to render leading questions unobjectionable. State v. Taylor, 57 W. Va. 228, 50 S. E. 247; 5 Words & Phrases, 4040; 1 Wigmore, Ev. § 768. If the witness had been permitted to answer, how would her answer have enlightened the jury? The question of her intent was not material. It was a question for the court, or for the jury instructed by the court, to determine whether the declaration or any of the items in the account were supported by the evidence. We see no error in this ruling of the court.

The next, and the only meritorious, point of error argued, is that the court struck out the deposition of S. B. Rathbone, Jr., after it had been read to the jury, excepting certain parts objected to and excluded. We must first determine whether the evidence of the deponent was competent; for, if incompetent, the objection may be availed of here whether or not made in, and acted upon by, the court below. Woodville v. Woodville, 63 W. Va. 286, 60 S. E. 140. If competent, the objections thereto, at least upon the ground on which it was rejected, must have been first made in the court below.

The plaintiff affirms and the defendant denies the competency of the witness. Section 3945, Code 1906, provides that "no party to any action, suit, or proceeding, nor any person interested in the event thereof, nor any person from, through, or under whom any such party or interested person derives any interest or title by assignment or otherwise, shall be examined as a witness in regard to any personal transaction or communication between such witness and a person, at the time of such examination, deceased, insane, or lunatic, against the executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor of such person, or the assignee or committee of such insane person or lunatic." The witness was not a party. Is he cut out then because of interest, or because plaintiff derived any interest or title by assignment or otherwise from him, or because his testimony relates wholly to personal transactions or communications had between him and the decedent? First, is he interested? Plaintiff's evidence shows conclusively that deceased had authority to collect the notes from Rathbone. By the admission of the decedent, proven by Harry, Sayre, Rathbone, through his wife, had fully paid the notes; and the testimony of Rathbone, excluded, was not only that he had paid his notes by the substitution of that of his wife, but that the latter note had been fully paid off and discharged to deceased in his lifetime. This left him without the slightest interest in the suit or in the event thereof. Having fully paid the notes to Woodyard, no action could thereafter be brought against him. Competency as to intestate is tested, not by the time when a deposition is actually taken, but by the time when it is offered in evidence. Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 412; Vanscoy v. Stinchcomb, 29 W. Va. 263, 11 S. E. 927; 1 Wigmore, Ev. § 583. But, suppose he had not paid the notes, Rathbone was nevertheless competent. The test as to interest is not whether the witness may be interested in the question in issue, or may entertain wishes on the subject, or may even have occasion to test the same question in a future suit, but whether the proceeding can be used as evidence for him in some pending or future suit. He must have an interest to be affected by the result of the suit or by force of the adjudication. This was the common-law rule, which prevails in this state. An early law writer on Evidence, Chief Baron Gilbert, as quoted by Chief Justice Tindal, in Doe ex dem. Teynham v. Tyler, 6 Bing. 390, says: "The law looks upon a witness as interested when there is a certain benefit or disadvantage to the witness attending the consequence of the cause one way." And in the same case it is also said: "Now, this benefit may arise to the witness in two cases: First, where he has a direct and immediate benefit from the event of the suit itself; and, secondly, where he may avail himself of the benefit of the verdict in support of his claim in a future action." The common-law rule is stated in the same way in 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. Appx. II., § 390, p. 883. See also Rich v. Topping, Peake, N. P. Cas. 293; Brard v. Ackerman, 5 Esp. 119; and Burgess v. Merrill, 4 Taunt. 468. These cases have special application to this case at bar. This rule of test as to interest has thus come down to us from the common law, and from thence through the judicial decisions of the old state, and has been several times declared in our own decisions. Baring v. Reeder, 1 Hen. & M. 154; Stevens v. Bransford, 6 Leigh, 253; Black v. Campbell, 6 W. Va. 63; Gilmer v. Baker, 24 W. Va. 84; Hooper v. Hooper, 32 W. Va. 526, 528, 529, 9 S. E. 937; Crothers v. Crothers, 40 W. Va. 169, 176, 20 S. E. 927. The best statement of the rule in our cases, perhaps, is that of Judge Snyder, in Gilmer v. Baker, supra, as follows: "By the common law a person is a competent witness in a cause, if the proceedings therein cannot be used as evidence for him, although he may be interested in the question in issue and entertain wishes on the subject, and even have occasion to contest the same question in his own case in a future suit. This rule has not been affected or changed by our statute (Code 1906, chap. 130, § 23), as to the competency of a person to testify against the representatives of a deceased person, in relation to transactions had personally by the witness with such deceased person." Tested by this rule, the maker of a note, after assignment thereof and death of the assignor or payee, is a competent witness in an action by the assignee against the administrator of the assignor, to prove not only the assignment, but payment by him to the assignor. He has no interest to be affected by the result of the suit or by force of the adjudication, and the proceedings cannot be used as evidence for him in any future suit or proceeding.

Was he competent as a person from, through, or under whom the plaintiff derived any interest or title by assignment or otherwise? The notes involved were the notes of the witness, but the plaintiff derived no interest or title thereto by assignment or otherwise from him. Plaintiff claimed the notes by title derived, not from Rathbone, but through Wiseman, and by assignment from deceased. Rathbone's notes represented property, but plaintiff could not be said to have acquired any interest or title by assignment or otherwise from him. Rank v. Grote, 110 N. Y. 12, 17 N. E. 665; Hooper v. Hooper, supra. We do not think, therefore, that his testimony was rightfully excluded on this ground.

But was the deposition rightfully suppressed because taken after the amended declaration was filed? This was the ground of defendant's motion; and, so far as it related to matters not in issue at the time it was taken, it should have been excluded, if objection had been made at the proper time. But the amended declaration as to two of the notes is the same as the original. Was it proper then to exclude the deposition as a whole? We think not. The court had already admitted the deposition in evidence, except as to that portion of it objected to, and defendant had gone to trial without objection to the deposition, except as noted at the time it was taken, and had permitted it to be read without other exception before interposing his motion to suppress. The motion was then too late. Electric Supply & Contracting Co. v. Consolidated Light & R. Co. 42 W. Va. 583, 26 S. E. 188; Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, 46 W. Va. 426, 33 S. E. 266; Edgell v. Smith, 50 W. Va. 349-354, 40 S. E. 402.

We are of opinion that the testimony was competent, so far as it related to the notes in issue, at the time it was taken, was erroneously suppressed, and that the judgment below should be reversed, and plaintiff awarded a new trial.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

JAMES J. SINGLETON, Admr., etc., of Parthenia Singleton, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

DEWANNA CASTLEMAN et al.

(— W. Va. —, 68 S. E. 34.)

Judicial sale — deficiency — abatement.

1. If commissioners authorized by a court decree to make sale of land decreed to be sold undertake, without specific authority given, to sell the land by the acre, and the sale is so reported to and confirmed by the court, such confirmation will cure any irregularities of the commissioners in making such sale, and if, by mistake resulting from the actions of court and commissioners, less land be sold than was bid for and supposed to be sold, the purchaser will be entitled to a proportionate abatement of the purchase money.

Same — purchaser's remedies.

2. Such relief may be obtained by the purchaser upon petition filed in the cause, by way of defense on a rule to show cause why the land should not be resold to pay the balance of purchase money, or by way of defense when sued on the purchase-money notes, or by any other appropriate remedy.

Same — caveat emptor.

3. The rule caveat emptor does not apply

Headnotes by MILLER, J.

Note. — Right of purchaser of land at judicial sale to abatement of purchase price for deficiency in quantity.

The purchaser of land at a judicial sale is entitled to an abatement of the purchase price where there is a material deficiency in the number of acres sold, without qualifying expression as to quantity, although the purchase was made for a lump sum. Cooper v. Hargis, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 41, 45 S. W. 112; Marbury v. Stonestreet, 1 Md. 147; Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 698.

In Hall v. Nevill, 3 La. Ann. 326, a judicial sale of land was of a certain tract "containing 400 acres," and it was held that for a deficiency in quantity the purchaser was entitled to a proportional diminution of the price.

One who purchases land at a judicial sale at so much per acre is entitled to recover a pro rata amount of the price paid upon ascertaining that there is a deficiency in the number of acres. Peacock v. Barnes, 139 N. C. 196, 51 S. E. 926; Strodes v. Patton, 1 Brock, 228, Fed. Cas. No. 13,538; Myers v. Lindsay, 5 Lea, 331.

The rule that a sale of land by the acre justifies an allowance to the purchaser where there is a deficiency is approved in Brown v. Wallace, 4 Gill & J. 479, but it was held that the testimony relied on did not satisfactorily prove a deficiency, and it appeared 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to mistakes in the quantity of land sold by the acre at a judicial sale, as it does to defects of title.

Same — laches.

4. Nor, as a general rule, will the rule of laches be applied to a purchaser at such judicial sale, if no equities have intervened and the rights of no one will be injuriously affected by a proportionate abatement of the purchase money, so long, at least, as the purchaser still retains in his hands, unpaid, sufficient of the purchase money out of which such abatement can be made.

Real estate — sale — allowance for errors — rule.

5. The arbitrary rule of allowing 5 per cent to cover inaccuracies reasonably imputable to variations of instruments and small errors in surveys, referred to in Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406, 437, and recognized in Pratt v. Bowman, 37 W. Va. 715, 721, 17 S. E. 210, is inapplicable to sale by the acre of valuable farming lands. In such cases only such allowance should be made as, considering the inequality of the ground and other obstacles hindering an accurate survey, may reasonably be imputable to such variations of instruments and small errors in surveys.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in defendants' favor in an action brought to that there had been a delay of six years in making the claim.

It was held in Carmody v. Brooks, 40 Md. 240, that an abatement from the price of a city lot purchased at a judicial sale, described as being 50 feet wide, was properly allowed where the rear of the lot proved to be but 44 feet in width.

But in Shields v. Thompson, 4 Baxt. 227, where a city lot was the subject of a judicial sale, it was held that the property having been sold in gross, and not by the foot, there could be no abatement of the purchase price because the frontage advertised and sold as being 62 feet actually measured but 60 feet and 3 inches.

A claim for an abatement of the price paid for a city lot upon a judicial sale, upon the ground of deficiency in quantity, was denied in Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Goodin, 10 Ohio St. 557, although the sale was at so much per foot frontage, and there was a shortage of 3 feet. This decision is based upon the ground that the building standing upon the lot covered the entire frontage, and that, in determining the value, appraisers who were on the ground viewed the property,—ground and improvement as a whole,—and based their estimate on what they saw, merely dividing the entire amount they believed it to be worth by the number of feet which they understood the frontage contained.

It should be noted that the appraisement abate the purchase price of certain lands for alleged deficiency of acres sold and purchased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Forrest W. Brown, for appellant:

The mistake can be rectified and compensation made to the plaintiff by allowing for the ascertained deficiency a proper abatement of the balance of purchase money still owing by him.

Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 698; Hickson v. Rucker, 77 Va. 135; Berlin v. Melhorn, 75 Va. 639; Redd v. Dyer, 83 Va. 331, 5 Am. St. Rep. 272, 2 S. E. 283.

Mr. R. T. Barton for appellees.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court, pronounced February 18, 1908, denying to a purchaser abatement of purchase money on account of alleged deficiency of acres sold and purchased.

By decree of August 8, 1887, and another supplementing it of October 14, 1892, special commissioners appointed were authorized to make sale, upon the terms prescribed, of "396 acres, 1 rood, and 26 perches, home tract, and the 419 acres mountain tract of land in the bill and proceedings mentioned." By the latter decree the commissioners thereby appointed in place of those appointed by the former decree were directed to proceed to execute the same with such further powers as were given thereby, to wit: To "make sale as a whole or in parcel of all the real estate in the bill and proceedings mentioned, free from the widow's dower, on terms of one third cash, one third in one year, and one third payable six months after the death of Dewanna Castleman, both of said deferred payments to bear interest from date, and on the latter the interest is to be paid annually to the said Dewanna Castleman during her life, and both of said deferred payments to be evidenced by bonds of the purchaser, and secured by the retention of the title to the property until paid: or, at the option of the purchaser, a deed will be made to said property, and a deed of trust taken to secure the deferred payments."

The report of the commissioners to whom the cause was referred, on August 3, 1887, reported the home farm as "containing 396 acres, 1 rood, and 26 perches, value $55 per described the lot as being "30 feet front, more or less," and placed the value at so much per foot "for ground and improvement," and also that the sheriff's return described the frontage as 30 feet, "more or less," and that the sale was made for a certain sum "per front foot."

An abatement from the price of land purchased at a judicial sale was denied in Jones v. Tatum, 19 Gratt. 720, where the sale was in gross, and not by the acre, and the deficiency amounted to but 1 acre in a tract sold as containing 90 acres.

Where land purchased at a judicial sale is correctly described by boundaries, and there is no stipulation as to quantity, although the number of acres supposed to be contained in the boundaries be mentioned, there can be no deduction in the price because of a deficiency in the quantity, unless the sale is fraudulent. Foster v. Bradford, 1 Tenn. Ch. 400; Close v. Brown (N. J.) 20 Atl. 674.

An abatement in the price of certain land bought at a judicial sale for a deficiency in acreage was denied in Lyles v. Haskell, 35 S. C. 391, 14 S. E. 829, where the chief value of the land was in its granite quarries, the sale being of the "Anderson quarry tract," the number of acres being merely mentioned as a part of the description, and there was no evidence of fraud, nor that the deficiency affected the value of the tract in respect of its quarries.

Where a purchaser at a judicial sale buys lands of a certain acreage, "more or less," the quantity does not enter into the essence of the contract, and, in the absence of fraud, no abatement of the price will be allowed him for a deficiency in the number of acres. Slothower v. Gordon, 23 Md. 1. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

When a purchaser of land at a sale made under the direction of the court is shown the land in question and its boundaries, he is not entitled to any abatement of the price paid because he came into possession of less land than the boundaries in his deed called for, where he actually acquired all that was pointed out to him at the time of the sale. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438.

A purchaser of land at judicial sale is not entitled as a matter of right to have credit for a deficiency in the quantity of land purchased, and where he refuses to consent to a rescission of the sale, on equitable principles he is not entitled to relief in the way of an abatement from the purchase price. Trig: v. Jones, 102 Ky. 44, 42 S. W. 848.

Where a purchaser at a judicial sale bought a certain quantity of land by the acre, according to a plat showing a river through the land, it was held that he was not entitled to a deduction from the price for the number of acres covered by the river. Shands v. Triplet, 5 Rich. Eq. 76.

See also Blakemore v. Roller (Va.) 67 S. E. 377, holding there was no liability on the part of a purchaser at a judicial sale of certain land, described as a 10-acre tract, for a lump sum, because a subsequent survey showed that it contained 13 acres, there having been no fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake, and the sale having been confirmed. In the course of the opinion, the court said: "It seems to be settled law in this state that an increase or an abatement of the purchase price of land sold at a judicial sale will not be permitted for excess or deficiency in quantity after a confirmation of such sale, except in cases of after-discovered fraud, misrepresentation, or mutual mistake."

acre;" but the report of the commissioner appointed to assign dower to the widow, returned June 7, 1892, with accompanying plat and survey made by T. G. Baylor, surveyor, shows the home tract by metes and bounds to contain 409.65 acres.

The commissioners, in their published notice of sale, set for November 15, 1892, described the home tract as composed of three several tracts as follows: (1) 250 $\frac{2}{10}$ acres of fine farming land, with some woodland, but no improvements, lying south of the river road; (2) 152 $\frac{5}{10}$ acres of No. 1 land, with the improvements, lying north of the river road; (3) 6 acres of land with grist and sawmill and dwelling, lying on both sides of turnpike, aggregating 408 $\frac{7}{10}$ acres. They also gave notice that, in making sale, the first two tracts would be offered together, then all three tracts together, the choice of bids to be accepted, and referred prospective purchasers to plats of the land in their possession at Charles Town.

Parthenia Singleton became the purchaser, and the commissioners, on the day of sale, entered into a contract in writing with her, made a part of and returned along with their report to the court of said sale.

In their report to the court, the commissioners say that they offered the land in the bill and proceedings mentioned in accordance with said decrees, as shown by the attached advertisement, and that said "Parthenia Singleton's bid was the best obtained, which was \$40.25 per acre for the home farm and \$4 per acre for the mountain land, as shown by her agreement," which was in writing, and therewith submitted. The contract says that the "home tract of 409.65 acres was knocked down to said Parthenia Singleton at the bid of \$40 $\frac{25}{100}$ dollars per acre (\$40 $\frac{1}{4}$) and the mountain tract of 419 acres was knocked down to said Singleton at four dollars (\$4) per acre, the amount for both tracts amounting to the sum of \$18,172.66."

The decree confirming said sale, December 2, 1892, recites the sale and purchase by said purchaser "of the land in the proceedings mentioned, to wit: a tract of four hundred and nine acres and eighty-five hundredths, at the price of forty dollars and twenty-five cents per acre, and the mountain tract of four hundred and nineteen acres at four dollars per acre." This decree also directs the commissioner to "at once proceed to complete said sale by making and delivering to the purchaser a deed for said lands, and taking from her her bonds for the deferred payments, secured by a deed of trust upon said lands."

Boyd should be paid $1,000, with interest thereon, and Marshall McCormick be paid the like sum of $1,000, with interest thereon, being in addition to sums previously decreed to be paid them, and then provides how the residue of the purchase money, including the last payment, to be made on the death of the widow, should be distributed, first to creditors, and then to the heirs and distributees of the decedent.

The deed made, executed, and delivered by said special commissioners to Mrs. Singleton, the purchaser, December 23, 1892, recorded in Jefferson county, April 29, 1893, recites the sale of said lands "according to the terms and conditions required by said decrees, at which sale the said Singleton became the purchaser for the sum of eighteen thousand one hundred and seventy-two 66-100 dollars," the confirmation thereof by the subsequent decrees of December 2 and 14, 1892, and describes said home tract by metes and bounds as containing 409 $\frac{65}{100}$ acres, and the mountain tract as containing 419 acres, and also recites that the said first tract is according to the survey of said T. G. Baylor, in 1892, and that the bounds of the mountain land were according to a survey of Jas. M. Brown, in 1847.

The first order relating to the original petition of Mrs. Singleton, praying for an abatement of purchase money, entered in the cause March 2, 1894, is as follows: "This, the 2d day of March, 1894, came Parthenia Singleton, and asked leave, which was granted, to file her petition in the above-entitled cause." No order is found in the record formally filing said petition, but it is copied into the record by the clerk, following this order; on November 26, 1901, the following order was entered: "This cause coming on to be heard this 26th day of November, 1901, upon papers formerly read and the petition of Parthenia Singleton, filed at a former term, it is ordered that the clerk of this court issue process to all parties interested in said petition, returnable to next term of court, and an order of publications may issue against nonresident parties." So far as the record shows, process never issued on this petition. Parthenia Singleton died March 25, 1902, a little more than three months after the entry of the last order. No further proceedings appear to have been taken upon said petition until October 19, 1906, when James J. Singleton, administrator, intervened by filing his petition, in which he refers to the former petition of his decedent, makes the same part of his petition, reaffirms each and every allegation of her petition as if in his petition again set out in full, prays that said proceedings be revived in his name, and makes parties thereto those appearing from said proceedings to be creditors, administrators, and heirs at law of H. W. Castleman, deceased, and the personal representatives of those who had died pending said proceedings. He also makes the prayer of her petition the prayer of his petition, and prays for process and general relief. On the day he presented this petition, an order was entered filing the same, and reviving the cause in his name as administrator, and remanding the same to rules for process. Process was sued out thereon November 12, returnable to December rules, 1906, was duly accepted or served upon all resident defendants, and there was order of publication published and posted against all nonresident defendants, and the case regularly matured and set for hearing.

After setting forth the interests of the defendants, as disclosed by the record, and the several orders, decrees, and proceedings aforesaid, the petition specifically charged that about January 1, 1893, information was first brought to her attention, which led the purchaser to believe that an error had been made in the acreage of the home farm, as sold to her; that she employed S. Howell Brown, county surveyor, to make a survey thereof, who ascertained and reported to her that the same contained only 398½ acres, and which she alleged was a true and accurate survey, showing a shortage or deficiency of 11.60 acres in the number of acres sold to and purchased by her. Petitioner filed with her petition, as a part thereof, the survey and plat of said land, so made by the county surveyor, with his affidavit thereto, that he believed his survey to be correct. Defendants did not plead to or answer the petition.

Thus is presented the question whether the purchaser, upon the petitions filed, is entitled, as prayed for, to credit upon the last purchase-money bond of $6,057.55, with the sum of $466.90, the price of 11.60 acres at the rate of $40.25 per acre, with interest.

Clearly, the sale was a sale by the acre, not in gross. True, as argued, the original decrees of sale did not specifically authorize a sale by the acre, but the special commissioners assumed to make a sale of the land in that way. They so reported the sale to the court, and it was so confirmed as a sale by the acre. This would entitle the purchaser to an abatement of purchase money if there is a deficiency. 24 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 54 E, note 7. This authority, supported by court decisions cited in the note, says: "When, by mistake resulting from the actions of the court or the misrepresentations of its agents, less land is sold than was bid for and supposed to have been sold, the purchaser will be allowed a proportionate abatement of the purchase price when the property was sold by the quantity, but not when it was sold in gross as a specific tract." When the court confirmed the action of its commissioners in making sale by the acre, it thereby adopted and approved their act. In all judicial sales the court is the vendor and contracting party, on the one hand, and the purchaser, on the other. The commissioners are merely the creatures of the court, and the sale is never complete until it is reported to and confirmed by the court. Core v. Strickler, 24 W. Va. 689, 696, citing Blair v. Core, 20 W. Va. 265, and Kable v. Mitchell 9 W. Va. 492. Confirmation cures irregularities, and gives the sale the same validity and effect as if made upon the precise terms of the decree. Rorer Judicial Sales, §§ 122, 127; Robertson v. Smith, 94 Va. 250, 64 Am. St. Rep. 723, 26 S. E. 579; Langyher v. Patterson, 77 Va. 470.

It is the universal rule, and many cases in this state and in Virginia so decide, that if a deficiency in quantity is found, where the sale has been by the acre, the purchaser will be entitled to an abatement; and that a court of equity will, even after deed made, abate the deficiency from the unpaid purchase money. See cases collated in 13 Cyclopedic Dig. 525, 9a. And this rule is applicable alike to sales by the court and under court decrees, as to sales by individuals. Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 698, Va. Rep. Anno. 220, and note; Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438; Cooper v. Hargis, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 41, 45 S. W. 112; Carmody v. Brooks, 40 Md. 240; Brown v. Wallace, 4 Gill & J. 479, 508; Marbury v. Stonestreet, 1 Md. 147; Strodes v. Patton, 1 Brock. 228, Fed. Cas. No. 13,538; Myers v. Lindsay, 5 Lea, 331; Trigg v. Jones, 102 Ky. 44, 42 S. W. 848.

But it is said that although the purchaser, in 1894, obtained leave to do so, she never in fact filed her petition; that the order of November 26, 1901, treating it as having been filed at a former term, and directing process thereon, was a misrecital, and that no process having been in fact issued thereon, defendants were not bound thereby, and that not only these proceedings, but the proceedings upon the amended petition filed by the administrator in 1906, the purchaser in her petition admitting knowledge of the alleged deficiency as early as January, 1893, came too late, and that relief was rightfully denied under the rule caecat emptor, and because of laches, and because the decrees confirming the sale, and distributing the proceeds thereof to creditors and distributees, being final, were not reviewable, except upon bill of review filed in time and with proper averments.

The authorities do not support the position of counsel. A purchaser at a judicial sale is not precluded by such decree from obtaining relief from such mistake. Relief may be obtained in such cases by defense to a rule against the purchaser to show cause why the land should not be resold to pay the balance of purchase money (Jones v. Tatum, 19 Gratt. 720; Crislip v. Cain, supra); also by petition filed in the cause by the purchaser (Watson v. Hoy; Marbury v. Stone-street, and Brown v. Wallace,—supra). While the rule caveat emptor is applicable to all judicial sales so far as title is concerned, it has never been applied, either in Virginia or in this state, so far as we can find, to cases of deficiencies in quantity of land where sold by the acre. Watson v. Hoy, supra, page 710 of 28 Gratt. In the case just cited, the court below appears to have been of a different opinion, but Judge Burks, referring thereto, says: "I cannot agree to this. It is true that in Virginia the general rule would seem to be that objections by purchasers to judicial sales for defect of title must be made before the sale is confirmed by the court, and that such objections, afterwards made, come too late," citing cases. "But," says he, "I apprehend the rule has no application to the equity of a purchaser arising from after-discovered mistake, fraud, or other like matter. Courts of equity are always ready to relieve innocent injured parties in such cases, unless, by reason of acquiescence, laches, or other special circumstances, relief would be inequitable. There are no such circumstances precluding relief in this case." And, at page 711 of 28 Gratt., he further says: "The mistake can be rectified and compensation made to the appellant by allowing for the ascertained deficiency a proper abatement of the balance of purchase money still owing by him; and thus, while doing justice to him, no harm will be done to others. It would be singular indeed if this could not be done by a court of equity which, by its agents, is a party to a mistake it is called upon to relieve against."

Nor do we think the rule respecting laches applicable. No one can be injuriously affected by the abatement. At least, no equities appear, and none are alleged by way of defense. The last payment of purchase money is still in the hands of the purchaser, or her representative. She is not suing to recover back money paid. Within a year after sale and confirmation thereof, and after discovering the mistake, she presented and obtained leave to file her petition, setting up the mistake and praying for an abatement, thus making a record in the cause of her claim; and though she afterwards delayed suing out process and bringing the matter to an issue, the last payment was not due and did not become due. except 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the interest, until the death of the widow. No one has been prejudiced or injured by the delay, so far as appears, and if a mistake was actually made, there is nothing to preclude the court in granting the relief prayed for. In a general creditors' suit, the filing of a petition by a creditor in a pending suit stops the running of the statute of limitations. Jackson v. Hull, 21 W. Va. 601. In Ewing v. Ferguson, 33 Gratt. 548, it was decided that the first action taken by a party for the assertion of his claim by legal process, whether that be by the issuing of process commencing suit, or the filing of a petition in a suit already commenced, is treated as the institution of a suit, and from that time the statute of limitations ceases to run against him. These cases, it is true, were creditors' suits, and the petitions were creditors' petitions filed therein, and are not strictly applicable to cases like the one we have here. However, when the purchaser asked and was given leave to file her petition in the cause, that was a step which she had the right to take, was the assertion of her right, negating abandonment thereof or acquiescence therein, and gave notice to the court, her vendor, of her claim to abatement of purchase money, and of which the court took notice by giving her leave to file it, and by afterwards treating her petition as filed, and directing process thereon. The petition thus became a part of the record. Park v. Petroleum Co. 25 W. Va. 108. But the petitioner was not bound to have filed any petition. She might have waited until sued on her bond, or was proceeded against by rule to resell the property. So long as she had the money in her hands, time did not run against her right to defend the collection of the purchase money. Smith v. Ward (W. Va.) 66 S. E. 234.

It is further contended, in support of the decree below, that petitioner did not make out a case for relief, that the petition was not sworn to as it is claimed a bill of review or petition to rehear, based on after-discovered evidence, is required to be. The petition is not a bill of review, nor a petition to rehear the decrees, and the rules applicable thereto are inapplicable. The petition charged a mistake, a shortage in the land sold. No plea or answer of the defendants denied it. It must be treated as taken for confessed.

Another question presented by the record, but not by counsel, has given us some trouble. The shortage of 11.60 acres is less than 3 per cent of the total acreage sold. Should the arbitrary rule of 5 per cent, first announced by this court in Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. 8 W. Va. 406, 437, and recognized in Pratt

v. Bowman, 37 W. Va. 715, 721, 17 S. E. 210, be applied here? If it should, the shortage being less than 5 per cent, petitioner did not make out a case for relief. One answer to this question, suggested in council, was that the rule was inapplicable to cases of sales by the acre, but only where land is sold as containing a definite number of acres, "more or less," or "estimated to contain" a certain number of acres, or with like descriptive words. But as this allowance of 5 per cent is intended to cover inaccuracies reasonably imputable to variation of instruments and small errors in surveys (Pratt v. Bowman, supra, p. 721), we do not see why, upon principle, it should not be applied in cases of sales by the acre; for in either case parties must necessarily be deemed to contract with reference to all such inaccuracies. Hilliard, Vendors, 2d ed. p. 329. This writer says: "But, in general, on a sale of land by the acre, relief is to be granted for all deficiencies not reasonably imputable to the variation of instruments and small errors in surveys, whether the purchaser has expressly retained an election to have the tract surveyed or not." Citing therefor Nelson v. Carrington, 4 Munf. 332, 6 Am. Dec. 519. But where and how did this arbitrary rule of 5 per cent originate? Judge Hoffman in Western Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co. supra, at page 437 of 8 W. Va., says: "It is settled in Virginia and West Virginia that when a person has sold and conveyed a tract of land, described as containing a definite quantity, at a specified price, it is presumed that the estimated quantity was believed to be substantially correct,—within 5 per cent of exact accuracy; that it constituted a material element in the determination of the price; and that, unless it appear that considerable uncertainty or actual risk as to the quantity was contemplated or intended; if in fact the quantity is afterwards ascertained to be materially less, and the purchaser properly asserts his right in a reasonable time and under reasonable circumstances, a court of equity will grant him relief. Though the sale be not by the acre, but by the tract in gross, this nevertheless is now the rule of decision. But in many—perhaps most—cases of sales by trustees and other fiduciaries or officers, it may be different. This, however, it is not necessary now to determine." No cases, however, are cited by Judge Hoffman declaring this arbitrary rule. He likely deduced it from the decided cases in which relief has generally been denied where the deficiency has been less than 5 per cent. But we do not think that in this day of improved methods and instruments, such an arbitrary rule should be applied, especially when involving valuable lands like those involved here. A shortage of more than 11 acres of very valuable farm lands, practically level, in a survey of 409 acres, or 398, as the case may be, is entirely too much of a discrepancy to reasonably impute to variations of instruments or small errors in surveys. Certainly, lands of the character of these lands can and should be surveyed with more accuracy than that. The deficiency here we do not think can reasonably be imputed to such inaccuracies, and if not, the relief ought to be granted. Hilliard, Vendors, supra; Young v. Craig, 2 Bibb, 270; Grundy v. Grundy, 12 B. Mon. 269.

In the absence of any showing to the contrary, we think the petitioner was entitled to the relief prayed for. The decree below will therefore be reversed, and such decree as the Circuit Court should have entered will be entered here.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Latah County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property through the alleged wrongful removal of a building therefrom. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William E. Stillinger for appellant.

Mr. Stewart S. Denning for respondent.

Allshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by George Steltz, as administrator of the estate of Gray Sterling, deceased, for the purpose of recovering from defendant the sum of $2,000 damages for a trespass on real estate. Plaintiff alleges that he is the duly appointed and acting administrator of the estate of Gray Sterling, deceased, and that at the time of the death of Gray Sterling she was in the actual and peaceable possession of lot 2 of block 24 of the town of Genesee, and that ever since her death the plaintiff, as administrator, has been in the actual, peaceable, and quiet possession of that property. It is further alleged that in January, 1908, the defendant forcibly, wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously entered and trespassed upon this property, and pulled down and destroyed one building thereon of the value of $500, and, by reason thereof, the estate has been injured and damaged in the sum of $1,500. Defendant denied specifically all the material allegations of the complaint, except the taking down and removing of the house and the official character of the plaintiff as administrator of the estate of Gray Sterling, deceased. Defendant further answered, and alleged that in the year 1902 the lot in question belonged to one Maggie Anderson, and that in September of that year she conveyed and transferred the property to Gray Sterling; that Gray Sterling died about the month of October, 1902, and that thereafter the plaintiff was appointed administrator of her estate; that the property in question, lot 2 of block 24 of the town of Genesee, was duly and regularly assessed for taxation for the year 1902 to Maggie Anderson, and the taxes so assessed were not paid, and thereafter became delinquent; that the property was duly and regularly advertised for sale for nonpayment of the taxes, and at the sale, no buyer appearing, the property was struck off to Latah county; that after the expiration of the time for redemption, the assessor made, executed, and delivered to the county of Latah a tax deed, in conformity with law; that thereafter the county of Latah sold the property at public auction, as provided by law, to one John Thompson; that Thompson thereafter sold and transferred the property to one Joseph Hasfurther; and that the latter thereafter sold the house standing on this lot to the defendant Morgan. Morgan alleges that subsequent to the purchase of the house, he entered upon the premises and tore down the building and removed it, and that the property so removed was his own property.

The plaintiff made no attempt at the trial to show title to the property, but rested upon possession alone. The defendant introduced his evidence showing chain of title through tax deed for taxes assessed for the year 1902. Plaintiff did not question the regularity of the tax sale nor of the tax title. Plaintiff's position is perhaps best illustrated by the objection that was interposed by his counsel to the introduction of tax deed and other records establishing defendant's chain of title, which objection is as follows: "Objected to on the ground that even supposing the parties had purchased a tax title, and were acting under this tax title, and though the tax title may show prima facie evidence of title, still the parties holding such tax title cannot proceed summarily and take possession of the property without due process of law; second, that the defendant has neither pleaded justification or any fact in mitigation of damages which this only could go to." As we understand it, the foregoing objection really embodies the contention of the respondent in this court. The evidence in the case is brief and simple, and there is no substantial conflict in any material fact. The plaintiff had been renting this property from time to time as occasion offered, but the property had not been occupied for from three to six weeks prior to defendant's entry and removal of the building. This building is described by most of the witnesses as a small board building that had been intermittently occupied during the last six or eight years by sporting women for purposes of prostitution. The house, at the time Morgan entered and tore it down, and, in fact, for some weeks prior thereto, had been in a dilapidated condition, one door being gone entirely, and the other standing open. The windows were all out and gone. The floor was broken through, and the roof was also broken through. The house was untenanted, and no one was in actual possession of the house or of any part of the lot at the time Morgan entered. The two following propositions are fully established by the record: First, that plaintiff, who is respondent here, did not rely upon or attempt to establish title to the property, or question defendant's title; second, that he was not in actual possession of the property at the time of the alleged trespass. In order, therefore, to determine whether or not the respondent was entitled to recover in the court below, it is necessary to determine what the law really is as applied to the foregoing state of facts.

The action of trespass, as we received it from the common law, and, in fact, as it still exists in this country, was that of "trespass quare clausum fregit" and "trespass on the case." The former was the remedy resorted to by one in the possession of real estate, as against one who wrongfully and forcibly entered upon the premises. The latter was the remedy given to the owner of the fee for a trespass where the damage was peculiar to the land itself. While these forms of action have been abolished by our Constitution and statutes, the right of action itself, as it existed at the common law, still exists under the Code. The distinction between these two rights of action is very clearly considered in Casey v. Mason, 8 Okla. 665, 59 Pac. 252. In the case at bar, respondent relies on his possession. Since he was not in actual possession of the property at the time of the entry by appellant, he is bound to rely on a constructive possession. The question then arises as to whether the original owner of the property, not in the actual possession thereof, can assert a constructive possession for the purpose of maintaining his action in trespass, as against the true owner, who deraigns his title through a tax deed.

It is argued by counsel for respondent that a tax deed does not and cannot operate as a writ of assistance to put the purchaser into possession of the property. That contention must at once be conceded as sound and correct. It is equally true that the holder of a valid deed to real estate, whether it be a tax deed or a deed from the owner himself, impliedly and constructively has the possession of the property described in the deed. Of course, such constructive possession as a justification for an entry is not equal or paramount to an actual possession by another, but it is abundant warrant for the grantee therein named to take possession of the property where it is vacant or not actually occupied by another. In other words, the grantee named in a valid tax deed is entitled to take possession of the property described in the deed if he can do so peaceably and quietly. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Taxation (vol. 2, p. 1056, 3d ed.), speaking of the right of possession under tax deed, says: "The purchaser, if he finds the land occupied, may bring ejectment in the common-law courts to obtain possession; and if, on the other hand, he finds the land unoccupied, and takes possession without suit, the original owner may have the like remedy against him." In the footnote to the foregoing passage, the author makes the following quotation from Martin v. Langenstein, 43 La. Ann. 789, 9 So. 507: "The law does not require, to perfect a tax title, that the divested owner shall voluntarily place the purchaser in possession, or that the purchaser shall, in the absence of resistance, institute judicial proceedings and be put in possession by the sheriff, but the purchaser may himself take possession whenever he can do so without difficulty." The supreme court of Iowa in Moingona Coal Co. v. Blair, 51 Iowa, 447, 1 N. W. 768, held that "the holder of a tax deed will be deemed to be in possession of unoccupied land, and, if such possession is uninterrupted during five years from the date of execution and recording of the tax deed, the title acquired thereby becomes perfect and complete." That case was followed and approved in Rice v. Haddock, 70 Iowa, 318, 30 N. W. 579, the court saying: "The holder of a tax deed to unoccupied lands has constructive possession thereof." In Casey v. Mason, supra, the court said: "A plaintiff may maintain trespass for injury to his possession only when he is in the actual possession, and so alleges, or where he is the owner of the fee, and further shows by his petition that the land is unoccupied, and the plaintiff has the constructive possession thereof. He may also maintain an action in the nature of trespass on the case where he alleges that he owns the legal title, and further sets out such a state of facts as will show that the injury is an injury to the real estate. These rules are fundamental, because if one has no possession of a certain tract of land, either actual or constructive, no right of his can be invaded by going thereon; and one having no legal title to real estate, either in whole or a reversionary interest therein, cannot be damaged by the destruction of buildings or trees, or any of the appurtenances thereon or thereunto belonging, because he has no interest in the land. Where there is no right, there can be no remedy." As we understand the authorities, as well as the reason and justice of the matter, the rule is this: If one who was the original owner of real estate lost his title through taxation and a tax deed, and still would maintain an action of trespass against the holder of the tax deed for entering into possession, he must maintain actual possession of the premises. The constructive possession which ownership of real estate usually confers upon the owner is not a sufficient possession as against the owner and holder of a tax title who takes actual possession of such property. Morgan's grantor was the owner of the title to this property, so far as the record shows in this case. He was therefore entitled to the possession. He consequently had a right to sell the building to Morgan, and the sale of the building carried with it the right to enter and remove the building. That title and right would not have justified either Morgan or his grantor in committing a breach of the peace, or using force or violence in entering upon the premises. On the other hand, it was sufficient warrant and authority for his entry and removal of the property when he found it unoccupied.

Under the law as applicable to this case, it was the duty of the trial court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant. A new trial must therefore be granted, and it is so ordered, and the cause is remanded. Costs awarded in favor of appellant.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

FRANK WILMERTON, Appt.,

v.

WILLIAM W. WILMERTON, Exr., etc., of William Wilmerton, Deceased, et al.

(100 C. C. A. 366, 176 Fed. 896.)

Will — ademption of legacy — act of testator's conservator.

The conservator of the estate of one who becomes insane after executing a will which bequeathed money and securities of a certain amount to specified legatees, subject to a contract by which he had placed that amount with a bank, to be managed, the income to be paid to testator on demand, and the property accounted for to testator's estate after his death, has no authority to demand the income, so as to adeem the legacies, if it is not necessary, either for the conservation of the estate or the support of the ward.

Note. — Power of guardian or conservator to adeem legacy.

The few cases bearing upon the question here considered are not entirely in harmony. The reasoning of the court in WILMERTON v. WILMERTON, that legacies should be adeemed only when such an intention appears on the part of the testator, seems to be the only one which can be safely followed, since if the power to adeem is conceded to guardians and conservators, the testator's intentions may be entirely defeated after he becomes non compos mentis, and the above case is not without some support.

Thus, in Jenkins v. Jones, L. R. 2 Eq. 323, where farming stock was bequeathed to testator's son, and the testator then became insane, and the property was converted into money during the life of the testator, by the son, who was named as executor, acting with the consent of his mother, who was designated executrix, it was held that there was no ademption, since it was not the act of the testator, and since he never intended any conversion.

So, where a testator bequeathed his house and shop and his stock in trade to his wife, and disposed of the residue of his estate otherwise, and subsequently, when he became insane, no commission of lunacy being appointed, his wife joined with those named as executors and with the residuary legatees in an agreement for the sale of the house, shop, and stock, and subsequently, after testator's death, this agreement was approved by the court, it was held that none of the parties having had authority from the testator to make the sale, no conversion which worked an ademption occurred. Taylor v. Taylor, 10 Hare, 475.

And in Basan v. Brandon, 8 Sim. 171, where part of a sum of money in an agent's hands was bequeathed, and the whole sum was subsequently invested by testator's agents, acting of their own accord, in stocks, it was held that there was no ademption of the legacy, notwithstanding the fact that the testator had written a letter, which was not received until after the agent's act, authorizing an investment of a part of the money in stocks.

These cases, however, are distinguishable from others here included, on the ground that the persons bringing about the conversion were not duly authorized to act for the testator. While this fact detracts from their force as authorities for the decision in WILMERTON v. WILMERTON, they are nevertheless entitled to considerable weight, since those APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern Division of the Southern District of Illinois, dismissing a bill filed to recover a one-half share in a certain sum which was alleged to be due under the will of William Wilmerton, deceased. Reversed.

Statement by Grosscup, Circuit Judge:

The bill was by appellant, a citizen of Iowa, against appellees, citizens of Illinois, the appellee William W. Wilmerton being made defendant both in his own right and as executor of the will of William Wilmerton, deceased; and was to recover complainant's one-half share in $12,442.03, together with interest thereon, said to be due to appellant under the will of William Wilmerton, deceased, and wrongfully withheld by appellee William W. Wilmerton, as executor of such will. A demurrer to the bill having been sustained, the bill was dismissed for want of equity.

The salient facts, stated in the bill, are as follows: On January 12, 1904, William Wilmerton, deceased, executed his will, wherein there was bequeathed to the appellee Louisa Little, and to appellant, Frank Wilmerton, daughter and son, respectively, of the testator, "notes and moneys to the amount of $75,000, as per contract to be managed by said bank [the Central Trust & Savings Bank of Rock Island] for the benefit of my estate." The remainder of the estate, after three other specific bequests, went to William W. Wilmerton, appellee, amounting, after the deduction of the other bequests, to considerably more than $75,000 in value. The trust, recited in the contract with the bank, was as follows:

"The said party of the first part [the bank] shall collect and receive the interest and principal of the said notes and securities at maturity, pay the income thereof to said party of the second part, William Wilmerton, on demand, and reinvest the principal thereof as speedily as it is able to, after the receipt of the same, and upon the death of the said party of the second part, to account for all said property to the estate of the said party of the second part. The said party of the first part, in and about the said collecting of interest, principal, and reinvestment, to be held to the exercise of the same degree of care as it would of its own property. . . ."

At the date this contract was entered into, William Wilmerton was about eighty years of age, and at the date the will was executed was a little past eighty-one years of age; but on both dates was of sound and disposing mind and memory. Subsequently Wilmerton became insane, and on the 12th day of June, 1906, one Thomas J. Medill was duly appointed conservator of his estate, and forthwith took possession and control of the estate, except so much thereof as was, at the time, in the care, custody, and control of the trustee above mentioned. Wilmerton, up to the time of his death, November 26th, 1907, did not recover his reason.

The bill shows that during the entire period of the conservation, Wilmerton's estate was worth something like $200,000; no need is shown for the taking of any portion of the $75,000, embodied in the trust agreement, either for the conservation of the estate or the support of the ward; nor any occasion for the change of securities. Notwithstanding this, the conservator, considering himself entitled to act upon that provision of the trust agreement under which, "on demand," it was provided that the trustee should pay the income to Wilmerton (and apart from any need arising from the conservation of the estate or the maintenance of the ward), on the 3d day of October, 1906, demanded of the trustee that it should pay over to him the accrued interest or income that had accumulated in its hands; and thereupon there was paid to him such accumulation to the amount of $12,442.03; which sum, appellee William W. Wilmerton, as executor, has treated as a part, not of the specific trust, but as a part of the residuary estate,—refusing to pay over the same to appellant, Frank Wilmerton, and appellee Louisa W. Little, as a part of the specific trust fund bequeathed to them. The further facts are stated in the opinion.

acting for the testator, in the first two cases, at least, did so in good faith, and had been named by him to administer his estate.

A result opposed to that in WILMERTON v. WILMERTON was reached in Jones v. Green, L. R. 5 Eq. 555, where the income of certain shares of stock was bequeathed, and subsequently the testator became a lunatic, and, by an order in lunacy, the shares were invested in consols, and it was held that the conversion adeemed the legacy. The court said: "All the authorities show that the conversion must be treated as a lawful conversion, exactly as if the testator had himself converted the shares into consols. Such an act on his part would clearly have adeemed the gift."

In Re Larking, L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 310, where a testator bequeathed a policy in trust to pay two debts, and the balance to his daughter, and he paid one and became a lunatic, and his committee paid the other debt from funds of the estate, without authority from the justices, the sum so paid was recouped from the insurance policy at the testator's death, he still being a lunatic.

Argued before Grosscup, Baker, and Seaman, Circuit Judges.

Mr. S. S. Gregory, with Messrs. George T. Page, C. H. Poppenhusen, and Joseph L. McNab, for appellant:

A specific legacy is a legacy of specific property, which lapses if the subject of such legacy has been sold, lost, or destroyed.

Updike v. Tompkins, 100 Ill. 406; Snyder's Estate, 217 Pa. 71, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49, 118 Am. St. Rep. 900, 66 Atl. 157, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 488; Ives v. Canby, 48 Fed. 718.

A demonstrative legacy is a gift of money or other tangible goods, charged on a particular fund in such a way as not to amount to a gift of the corpus of the fund, or to evince an intent to relieve the general estate from liability in case the fund fails.

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 721; Kenaday v. Sinnott, 179 U. S. 606, 45 L. ed. 339, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 233; Tanton v. Keller, 167 Ill. 129, 47 N. E. 376.

A specific legacy is subject to ademption, while a demonstrative legacy is not; but here, even assuming the legacy to be specific, there has been no ademption.

Hoitt v. Hoitt, 63 N. H. 475, 56 Am. Rep. 530, 3 Atl. 604; Clements v. Horn, 44 N. J. Eq. 595, 18 Atl. 71; Nooe v. Vannoy, 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 185; Jenkins v. Jones, L. R. 2 Eq. 323; Walton v. Walton, 7 Johns. Ch. 258, 11 Am. Dec. 456; Gardner v. Printup, 2 Barb. 83; Connecticut Trust & S. D. Co. v. Chase, 75 Conn. 683, 55 Atl. 171; Basan v. Brandon, 8 Sim. 171.

The intention of the testator in making such disposition of the subject of a specific legacy as is claimed to be ademption is material.

Coleman v. Coleman, 2 Ves. Jr. 640; Beall v. Blake, 16 Ga. 119; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 625; Walton v. Walton and Gardner v. Printup, supra; Re Slater [1907] 1 Ch. 665, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 141.

An inquiry as to the intent of the testator is admissible and necessary.

Mr. H. A. Weld for appellees.

Grosscup, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The argument of appellee William W. Wilmerton is that under the law of Illinois, the conservator succeeded to the right of the beneficiary in the trust agreement "to demand" the income accumulating and that had accumulated upon the securities embodied in the trust; that such demand having been complied with, the income thus paid over became at once segregated from the trust fund,—was no longer a part of the trust fund in fact, but became a part of the general property of the conservator's ward; from which it follows, that the will, acting as of the testator's death, a date subsequent to this act of segregation, acted only, so far as the bequest to appellant and Louisa W. Little went, upon the securities remaining; the test of the testator's intention being, not what, aside from the will, he may be shown to have said or done in relation to the specific bequest involved, but what property was, in fact, included in and acted upon by the specific bequest at the date of his death.

We accept this as the true test of the testator's intention. It does not follow, however, that intention is thereby shown in the will that the power of the testator to take down "on demand" the income of the securities mentioned in the specific bequest should go over to his conservator in case of his subsequent mental incapacity. No such intention is affirmatively shown in the will. Nor does it follow that such power of the testator to take down the income goes by operation of law to the conservator, to the end that the special fund acted upon in the specific bequest, shall be by that amount diminished. That, indeed, is the real question in this case.

Counsel for appellee have brought to our attention two cases, one an English, the other a Pennsylvania case, the former, at least, supporting his contention, viz.: In Re Freer, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 622, and Hoke v. Herman, 21 Pa. 301. The Freer Case was that of a testator who bequeathed "all his first preference bonds" in a certain railroad to one of his sons, the residuary estate to a son and daughter. Subsequently, but before the testator's death, and while he was of unsound mind, a conservator, under an order of the lord justices, transferred these bonds, on the ground that they were an unsafe investment, into consols, and this was held by Chitty, Justice, to have been an "ademption" or "extinguishment" of the legacy,—the learned justice finding that he need make no distinction between those two terms in their application to the question before him.

In the Pennsylvania case, Herman held a note against Hoke, which was the subject of a bequest to Hoke by Herman, in his will, made subsequently, as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my said nephew, Herman Hoke, and his heirs, a promissory note of $600, with interest, which I hold against him at this time."

Subsequently Herman became insane, a committee of his person and estate was appointed, and this committee, settling with Hoke for certain services rendered by him to Herman after the date of the will (the bequest above mentioned being known neither to Hoke nor to the committee), credited $178.63 on the interest on the note, and a receipt was given by Hoke to the committee in full of his claim. Upon the death of Herman, the note, thus in part paid and indorsed, was delivered to Hoke; but Hoke demanded the return of the $178.63, with interest, debited against him in his settlement with the committee, there being assets of the estate sufficient to pay the demand if he were entitled to recover. The court, Black, Ch. J., delivering the opinion, held: "That if a thing bequeathed in a will by such a description as to distinguish it from all other things be disposed of, so that it does not remain at the death of the testator, or if it be so changed that it cannot be called the same thing, the bequest is gone. If such a legacy be of a debt, payment necessarily makes an end of it. The legatee is entitled to the very thing bequeathed, if it be possible for the executor to give it to him; but if not, he cannot have money in place of it. This results from an inflexible rule of law applied to the mere fact that the thing bequeathed does not exist, and it is not founded on any presumed intention of the testator."

In the English case, the ruling is made to turn upon the proposition that if the testator himself, not being a lunatic, had sold the stock and placed the proceeds to a separate account on his books, there would have been an ademption or extinguishment of the specific legacy, notwithstanding a memorandum placed there by the testator to the effect that, for all purposes, the proceeds were to stand in place of the stock,—a proposition that is as true here as in England, for the stock having been voluntarily taken down by the testator from the specific bequest, and the memorandum not having been attested according to the wills act, there stood at the date of the testator's death (the date when the will took effect), no disposition by special bequest of the stock thus involved. But is that proposition a true criterion of the question before the court in the Freer Case, or the question before us now? Had the testator in the Freer Case sold the specific preference bonds, so that they no longer, in specie, were a part of his property, or had the testator in this case taken down the interest, or any portion of the principal (provided he had power, under the trust agreement, to take down the principal), the act would have been one performed by him in view of his then-existing will, and, therefore a voluntary and conscious extinguishment or diminution of the corpus of the specific thing upon which the specific bequest was intended to act. In other words, the will and the subsequent act, considered together,

But how can that be said to be the case where the diminution or extinguishment of the thing upon which the specific bequest acts is not the subsequent voluntary or conscious act of the testator himself? The conservation of an estate under the lunacy laws, both here and in England, is purely an administrative function. Is it contemplated that an administrator may, at his will, change the testator's will? The testator, lunacy committed on, is, so far, at least, as a disposing mind is concerned, civilly dead. Does the disposing mind, along with the ward's effects, go over to the conservator? Is the conservator anything more than a mere custodian and administrator of the ward's estate, with no power, either directly or by indirection, to change the ward's duly expressed purposes respecting the disposition of that estate until the ward recovers his reason, or the administration after death begins?

The Pennsylvania case is expressly founded on Blackstone v. Blackstone, 3 Watts, 338, 27 Am. Dec. 359, an early Pennsylvania decision, holding that where a specific bequest of bank stock, after the date of the will, was exchanged for a bond, the bequest was adeemed, notwithstanding the declared intention of the testator to keep the bond for the legatee in lieu of the stock,—a ruling that again is founded upon the fact that the so-called "declared intention" was not attested according to the laws of Pennsylvania relating to wills; and the change, having been made voluntarily and consciously by the testator, in view of his will, must, in the absence of any duly attested further intention, be held to have been an intentional and conscious change in his testamentary disposition. Nor is Hoke v. Herman exactly in point; for the voluntary payment of interest on a note by the intended legatee, even though the testator was not in a mental condition to determine whether he would accept or reject it, is not the case of a stranger to the bequest changing, at his own will, the carrying out of the bequest.

In the Am. & Eng. Encyclopædia of Law, 2d ed. vol. 1, p. 625, it is said: "There is some early English authority for the view that the question whether or not a legacy has been adeemed does not depend upon the supposed intention of the testator, but is to be determined solely according to the strict rule requiring the property bequeathed to remain in specie and a part of the testator's estate. There are, however, English cases to the contrary." Citing Jenkins v. Jones, L. R. 2 Eq. 323.

"In the United States, the doctrine of the latter line of cases has been generally followed; and in deciding questions of ademp-tion, the courts here have been disposed to observe the same rule which prevails elsewhere in the construction of wills and testaments, and to hold legacies adeemed only where the testator apparently so intended."

Though none of the cases cited precisely support this statement of the rule, there are no cases, other than the ones above mentioned, that are contrary thereto. Upon sound reason, we think that the English and Pennsylvania cases cited ought not to be followed, and upon what appears to us to be sound reason, we think that the rule that legacies are adeemed only where such an intention appears on the part of the testator himself ought to be followed. The question, in our judgment, is not whether, as a mere matter of accident, or of purpose outside of the testator's purpose, the thing set apart as the corpus of a special bequest has been changed in specie. The real question is whether, all things considered, the testator's testamentary disposition did, or did not, remain, with reference to the particular thing embodied in the specific bequest or its proceeds, the same as it was the last moment he was able to exercise a testamentary disposition. In that way, and in that way only, we think, can the right of the man to dispose of his property according to his own wishes, exempt from the interference, caprice, or interest of others, be fully carried out. In that way only can his intention, as embodied in his will, be truly administered.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the bill, and to proceed further in accordance with this opinion.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

MARY J. BAKER, Appt.,
v.

MARY KELLEY LANE et al.

Quietting title — tax deed to deceased person — right of heir to maintain action.

1. A party whose only title to land is under a tax deed made to a grantee who was dead when it was executed, which was delivered to such party as the heir of the deceased person, who caused the deed to be recorded, and paid the taxes on the land, but who never took actual possession, cannot maintain an action to quiet title, or for an injunction against one who holds under the government title, and who is in actual possession of the land.

Deed — to deceased person and his heirs — validity.

2. The words "his heirs and assigns," following the name of the deceased person so designated as grantee in the deed, did not operate to vest title in such heir, and the deed is void as a conveyance.

Reformation of instrument — tax deed to deceased person — substitution of grantees.

3. A person who, as heir of the deceased

Note. — Effect of deed to a deceased person.

A deed to a dead man is a nullity, and though made to one deceased "and his heirs," it is inoperative, the word "heir" not being a word of purchase, carrying title, but merely qualifying the title of the grantee. Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 363, 73 Am. Dec. 543; Neal v. Nelson, 117 N. C. 393, 53 Am. St. Rep. 590, 23 S. E. 428; Morgan v. Hazlehurst Lodge, 53 Miss. 665.

Nor is a deed to a grantee after his death of any validity for the purpose of correcting a former deed to the same grantee, in the absence of the consent of all the parties to the original deed, or their heirs. Bartlett v. Brown, 121 Mo. 353, 25 S. W. 1108.

A deed to "Abner Dunn, deceased, estate," was held void in McInerney v. Beck, 10 Wash. 515, 39 Pac. 130.

But a deed to a named grantee "or his heirs" has been upheld as a valid conveyance to the heirs, if the grantee was dead at the time it was made. Ready v. Kearsley, 14 Mich. 215.

A deed to a deceased grantee was upheld in City Bank v. Plank, 141 Wis. 653, 124 N. W. 1000, where it appeared that all the parties knew the grantee to be dead, and that it was the desire and intention to convey to the executor of the deceased grantee, in his official capacity, so that the land in question might be subject to a charge in favor of the widow and other claimants.

In Northern Lake Ice Co. v. Orr, 102 Ky. 586, 44 S. W. 216, under a statutory provision, a deed to a deceased person was held to vest her children with whatever title would have passed to the mother had she been living when the deed was made.

Naming as grantee in a deed of real estate a partnership the members of which have died, but the name of which has been perpetuated and the property kept together by consent of all parties interested, after a sale of the business to strangers, for the purpose of collecting the accounts and settling up the partnership affairs, does not render the conveyance void. Walker v. Miller, 139 N. C. 448, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 157, 111 Am. St. Rep. 805, 52 S. E. 125, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 601.

Cases upon the validity of a grant or patent by a state where the patentee was dead at the date of the grant have not been included in this note.

owner of a tax sale certificate, took out a tax deed thereon, wherein the name of the deceased person was inserted as grantee, cannot maintain an equitable action to have the deed reformed by a decree substituting her own name as grantee therein; she might, upon due application to the county clerk, have obtained a deed made to herself as grantee, notwithstanding the issuance of the former instrument.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Seward County sustaining a demurrer to the petition in an action brought to reform a certain tax deed, to quiet title thereunder, to restrain defendants from entering upon or injuring the land embraced therein. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. L. Billings for appellant.

Mr. Thomas A. Scates and Albert Watkins for appellees.

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to reform a tax deed, to quiet title under it, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from entering or trespassing upon the land or injuring it. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and the plaintiff appeals.

The petition shows that the defendant Mary Kelley Lane is the owner in fee simple of the land in question, unless her title has been divested by a tax deed under which the plaintiff, Mary J. Baker, claims to own it. The title to this land became vested in Mary Kelley Lane in the year 1888. It was then vacant and unoccupied, and so remained until April 10, 1908, when possession was taken by the defendants, who still hold it. The taxes of 1889, due upon this land, were delinquent, and it was sold at the tax sale of 1890, and a certificate was issued thereon which was afterward assigned to J. W. Baker, the plaintiff's husband at that time, but who died on April 3, 1892. On March 7, 1894, the plaintiff, now the sole surviving heir of the decedent, presented the tax certificate to the county clerk, and requested that a tax deed be made to J. W. Baker, which was accordingly done, and the deed was delivered to her. This tax deed purports to convey the land to "J. H. Baker, his heirs and assigns;" but the initial "H." was inserted by clerical error, instead of the initial "W.," as directed. It is dated March 7, 1894, and was recorded that day. On the same date the plaintiff redeemed the land from a tax sale made in 1891, and paid all taxes to and including the taxes of 1893. In April, 1908, finding that the defendants, Mary Kelley Lane and H. W. Lane, her husband, had entered upon the land, and had erected a small house, and had broken out about 5 acres, the plaintiff caused a notice to be given to them that they were considered as trespassers; that an action to quiet title and for an injunction would be commenced against them. Before this notice was given, the defendants had offered to pay the tax lien, which was refused. The petition is very voluminous. Exhibits are attached containing correspondence of the defendants with the county clerk and county treasurer and between the parties. It contains an allegation that the plaintiff took possession under the tax deed upon its delivery; but as it is also alleged that the land was vacant and unoccupied until the defendants' entry, and as this fact is also stated in the exhibits, it is understood that the possession referred to in the petition is constructive only; and this is the claim as stated in the plaintiff's brief. The entry of the defendants is characterized as wrongful and a trespass, and made to harass, annoy, and extort money; but these and other like charges add nothing to the legal effect of the facts pleaded, the substance of which is given above. The case presented, then, is that of one party in possession of land, claiming title thereto in fee simple, and another party, out of possession, asserting a superior title and right of possession under a tax deed.

The plaintiff contends as matter of law that the tax deed to Baker and his heirs and assigns vested the title in Baker's heirs, and cites Rynearson v. Conn, 77 Kan. 160, 94 Pac. 205. The cases are easily distinguishable. There the deed was to "the heirs of D. C. Rynearson, deceased,"—a designation sufficiently definite to pass the title to whoever were in fact such heirs. Here the deed was to "J. H. Baker, his heirs and assigns." The words "heirs and assigns" are found in the statutory form of a tax deed, and the word "heirs" is usual in other conveyances, although not necessary under our statute, and implies a title in fee simple in the grantee named, which may descend to his heirs. A deed to a person not living and his heirs is void, there being no person to take under it. 1 Jones, Real Prop. in Conveyancing, § 223; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 6th ed. § 2121; Devlin Deeds, 2d ed. § 123; Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 363, 73 Am. Dec. 543; Miller v. Chittenden, 2 Iowa, 315; Neal v. Nelson, 117 N. C. 393, 53 Am. St. Rep. 590, 23 S. E. 428.

The argument is made that the words, "J. H. Baker, his heirs and assigns," are equivalent to "J. H. Baker's heirs" but this construction is unwarranted, as it omits the grantee expressly named. The plaintiff, having failed to prove title in herself, cannot maintain her action to quiet title, or for an injunction against the defendants, who were in actual possession when the suit was begun. Other objections urged against granting that relief need not be discussed.

The cause of action to reform the tax deed cannot be maintained. A party desiring to obtain affirmative relief in court, based upon tax proceedings, should pursue such proceedings before the proper officers to a conclusion which will give at least prima facie right to the relief sought. The holder of the tax certificate had a right to a tax deed made to the proper grantee, and a proper deed could have been obtained by application to the county clerk, notwithstanding the previous execution of a void or imperfect one. Clippinger v. Tuller, 10 Kan. 377; Young v. Gibson, 80 Kan. 264, 105 Pac. 3; Douglass v. Nuzum, 16 Kan. 515; see also Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jefferson County, 12 Kan. 127.

No good reason is shown why the court should exercise its chancery powers to accomplish for the plaintiff what might have been obtained long ago by an application to the county clerk. Whether the period in which the right to obtain such a deed, or to enforce rights under it, has elapsed, is not decided, as the record does not present that question, and it has not been discussed.

The plaintiff, by this equitable action, seeks to accomplish the substantial purpose of an action in ejectment. The petition and exhibits show that defendants are in possession of the land, and if they should be restrained, as the plaintiff prays, they would, to that extent at least, be ousted from the possession, which they have taken peaceably, under a title which is perfect unless overthrown by the tax deed. In this situation, even if the deed were reformed, or had been made in the first instance to the proper grantee, an action to recover possession would have been the appropriate proceeding. Atkinson v. J. R. Crowe Coal & Min. Co. 80 Kan. 161, —L.R.A.(N.S.)—, 102 Pac. 50, 106 Pac. 1052.

In the assignment of the tax certificate to J. W. Baker, the initial "H." was by mistake inserted instead of "W.," and following this mistake, the county clerk used the same initial in writing the name of the grantee in the tax deed; but this is unimportant, and is so treated in the briefs, as it appears that it was intended to make both the assignment and the deed to J. W. Baker, and both should be considered as so written.

The judgment is affirmed.

v.

GAITHER LUMBER COMPANY et al.
Appts.

(152 N. C. 651, 68 S. E. 134.)

Statute of frauds—another's debt — promise to subcontractor.

A promise by an owner of timber lands who has contracted to have the timber removed and manufactured into lumber, to hold back the amount which the contractor has promised to pay another to do the logging, and pay it to him, is not a promise to pay the debt of another within the statute of frauds.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Burke County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due under a contract to pay for certain work performed on defendants' lands by plaintiffs as subcontractors. Affirmed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

There was evidence tending to show that one L. L. Wood had contracted in writing with defendant company to "cut, saw, log, and stack in a workmanlike manner" for defendant company the timber growing on a tract of land of 888 acres, and was engaged in the performance of said contract; that the plaintiff had agreed with L. L. Wood to do the logging for this job at $3 per 1,000 feet; that plaintiff went to work under this agreement, and after a short time, not receiving any money, and not being satisfied

Note.—The holding of the court in the above case, that a promise by a third person to pay the debt of another is not within the statute of frauds where the agreement is to pay out of moneys of the debtor in the hands of, or thereafter to be paid to, the promisor, and the promise is primarily for his benefit, is supported by the weight of authority, not only where both of these elements exist, but also where either is present, the existence of either element generally being held sufficient to take the promise out of the statute.

For cases considering the question whether an oral promise to pay another's pre-existing debt is within the statute of frauds where made to secure a benefit to the promisor, see Howell v. Harvey, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1077.

And for a discussion of the question whether a contemporary promise to pay out of moneys in the hands of the promisor belonging to the debtor is within the statute of frauds, see note to Mankin v. Jones, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 224.

with the arrangements for his pay, he saw the manager of defendant company and told him that plaintiff was to have $3 per 1,000 for doing the logging, and that he wanted the company to hold back that amount for plaintiff out of money to be earned by Wood under his contract; that the manager agreed to do this, and, under and by reason of this agreement, plaintiff went back to work and did logging to the amount of $400 and over, for which he had not been paid; that this arrangement and agreement as to holding back the $3 per 1,000 was made with the knowledge and assent of Wood; that after this agreement on the part of the manager a large amount of the lumber was cut and turned over to the company by Wood, the amount thereafter earned by Wood under the contract being near $2,000; and that plaintiff had applied to the company for his money, and it had failed and refused to pay the amount or any part of it, claiming that they had paid Wood in full, and that he was indebted to them several hundred dollars on an old debt, etc. Defendant's evidence tended to show that they had the written contract with Wood to do the work, and they did not know plaintiff in the transaction; that the first they knew of plaintiff making any claim against the company was when he presented an order from Wood for the company for $416; that they had paid Wood something over $2,000, all they owed him for work done under the contract, and he was indebted to the company for more than $200 on an old debt. There was also evidence of some payments by Wood to Dale on the amount due him for logging. It appeared that R. A. Gaither was secretary and treasurer, having power as general manager to bind the company.

On the issue as to the liability of the defendant company, the court charged the jury as follows: "The court charges you: (a) That if you find from the evidence that R. A. Gaither, who is admitted to be the secretary and treasurer of the Gaither Lumber Company, agreed with plaintiff A. N. Dale that he would hold back $3 per 1,000 feet out of the money due or to become due L. L. Wood for sawing for said company, and that he would pay the same to said plaintiff for cutting and logging done by him for said Wood, and if you find from the evidence that plaintiff was induced thereby to go on with the logging, then the defendant the Gaither Lumber Company would be liable to pay plaintiff at that rate for all timber cut and logged by plaintiff for said Wood after the time such agreement was made, and you will therefore allow plaintiff $3 per 1,000 feet for whatever amount of timber you find was so cut and logged, in your answer to the second issue (b)."

There was verdict against the company for $393.90. Judgment on the verdict, and defendant excepted and appealed, assigning for error chiefly that the demand of plaintiff against defendant company was avoided under the statute of frauds (Revisal 1905, § 974), requiring agreements to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another to be in writing, and that all oral evidence tending to support the claim should have been excluded.

Messrs. Avery & Ervin for appellants.

Mr. John T. Perkins, for appellees:

Where the party promising has a personal interest, benefit, or advantage to be subserved, without regard to the interest of the original debtor, such promise is not within the statute, though the performance have the effect of discharging the original debtor.

Mr. John M. Mull also for appellees.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of opinion that the case has been correctly tried, and the charge of his Honor is in accord with the better considered precedents.

In Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. 28-43, 16 L. ed. 360-365, a decision on this section of the statute of frauds, the court said: "But whenever the main purpose and object of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, involving either a benefit to himself, or damage to the other contracting party, his promise is not within the statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another, and although the performance of it may incidentally have the effect of extinguishing that liability." This position has been sustained and applied in other cases of the same court, notably in Davis v. Patrick, 141 U. S. 479, 35 L. ed. 826, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58, in which it was held: "In determining whether an alleged promise is or is not a promise to answer for the debt of another, the following rules may be applied: (1) If the promisor is a stranger to the transaction, without interest in it, the obligations of the statute are to be strictly upheld; (2) but if he has a personal, immediate, and pecuniary interest in a transaction in which a third party is the original obligor, the courts will give effect to the promise. The real character of a promise does not depend altogether upon form of expression, but largely upon the situation of the parties, and upon whether they understood it to be a collateral or direct promise."

This rule has prevailed in many well-considered cases in other courts construing this section of the statute, as in Crawford v. Edison, 45 Ohio St. 239, 13 N. E. 80; Prout v. Webb, 87 Ala. 593, 6 So. 190; Gibson County v. Cincinnati Steam Heating Co. 128 Ind. 247, 12 L.R.A. 502, 27 N. E. 612,—and the same general principle has been recognized and approved with us, as in Deaver v. Deaver, 137 N. C. 241, 49 S. E. 113; Voorhees v. Porter, 134 N. C. 591-605, 65 L.R.A. 736, 47 S. E. 31; Whitehurst v. Hyman, 90 N. C. 487; Mason v. Wilson, 84 N. C. 51, 37 Am. Rep. 612; Threadgill v. McLendon, 76 N. C. 24. A doctrine resting upon the same basic principle appears in several of these cases from our own court, to the effect that where a debtor places a fund, money, or property in the hands of a third person, who agrees to pay the debt out of the fund, the said agreement is not within the statute. The position is stated in Mason v. Wilson, supra, as follows: "A parol promise to pay the debt of another out of property placed by the debtor in the hands of the promisor, who converts the same into money, is not within the statute of frauds. It is an original and independent promise founded upon a new consideration." And in either class of cases the promise on the part of the third person is held to be a binding obligation, whether the original debtor continues liable or not; this by reason of the new consideration moving between the parties.

Referring to this question in Whitehurst v. Hyman, supra, Merrimon, J., said: "It is settled by many judicial decisions in construing this statute, and others substantially like it, that where there is some new and original consideration of benefit or harm moving between the party to whom the debt to be paid is due and the party making the promise to pay the same, such case is not within the statute; as where a promise to pay an existing debt is made in consideration of property placed by the debtor in the hands of the party promising, or where the party to whom the promise is made relinquishes a levy on the goods of the debtor for the benefit of the promisor, or where the party promising has a personal interest, benefit, or advantage of his own to be subserved, without regard to the interests or advantage of the original debtor; as for example, if a creditor has a lien on certain property of his debtor to the amount of his debt, and a third person who has an interest in the same property promises the creditor to pay the debt in consideration of the creditor's relinquishing his lien. Such promises are not within the statute, because they are not made 'to answer the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person.' It may be the performance of the promise will have the effect of discharging the original debtor, but such discharge was not the inducement to, or the consideration to support the promise. The moving, controlling purpose of the promisor in such cases is his own advantage, not that of the debtor. It not unfrequently happens that in a great variety of business circumstances it becomes important in a valuable sense to third parties to discharge the debt of a debtor, or relieve his property from liability to the creditor for the benefit of such third parties, without regard to the benefit, ease, or advantage of the debtor. The advantage to the third party, the promisor, is a sufficient valuable consideration to support a contract separate from, and independent of, the debt to be discharged."

And to like effect, delivering the opinion in Voorhees v. Porter, supra, Associate Justice Walker said: "But we think the case of Mason v. Wilson, supra, is directly in point. The doctrine there stated is that if a third person promises the debtor to pay his antecedent debts in consideration of property placed in the hands of the promisor by the debtor for the purpose, which is afterwards converted into money, the creditors may recover on the promise or for money had and received, 'for although,' says the court, 'the promise is in words to pay the debt of another, and the performance of it discharges that debt, still the consideration was not for the benefit or ease of the original debtor, but for a purpose entirely collateral, so as to create an original and distinct cause of action,' and it is immaterial, as is further said by the court, whether the liability of the original debtor is continued or not; the promise being an independent and original one founded upon a new consideration and binding upon the promisor. In our case, though the property was not received for the purpose of being converted into money in order to pay the debt out of the proceeds, the promise to purchase it at a fixed price and to pay the amount of that price to the creditors of the vendor amounts to the same thing, and brings our case within the principle of the third class mentioned in Mason v. Wilson (which authorizes the creditor to sue directly), namely, 'when the promise to pay the debt of another arises out of some new and original consideration of benefit or harm moving between the original contracting parties.' In such a case the creditors may sue the promisor, whether his debtor remains liable to him or not."

In the case before us, the defendant company had a direct pecuniary interest in the work to be performed by plaintiff, and received the benefit of it, and its obligation comes clearly within the first principle as it appears in Emerson v. Slater, supra, and we see no reason why the promise of defendant does not come also within the second principle referred to. The company's agreement was, in effect, to see the claim paid out of the amount to be earned under the contract by L. L. Wood, the original debtor. This was entered into with the sanction and approval of Wood, and, as this amount was earned by Wood, it would seem to become a fund applicable by the agreement to plaintiff's debt, and affording the consideration to support the company's promise as a new and original obligation.

There is no error in the rule laid down by the court which gives defendant any just ground of complaint, and the judgment in plaintiff's favor is affirmed.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Wash. —, 107 Pac. 852.)

Railroad — unsafe crossing — deviation — injury — liability.

A railroad company is not liable for injury to one who voluntarily turns aside from a crossing over the track, left unsafe by the company, and attempts to make the crossing over the unprotected rails, and is thrown from his wagon by the unevenness of the crossing place.

Note. — A search has failed to disclose any other case involving the question of a railroad company's liability for an injury to a traveler while trying to cross its tracks at a place other than the regular crossing, because the latter is out of repair, though in Cowans v. Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. 40 Tex. Civ. App. 539, 89 S. W. 1116, where the question was whether the railroad company had invited the plaintiff to use as a crossing APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Superior Court for Lincoln County, granting a new trial after judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of Michael Schabb. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. V. Brown and J. J. Lavin, for appellant:

The defendant, having furnished a place for deceased to cross the tracks, is not liable for injuries resulting by his having selected and attempted to use another place, not intended for such purpose.

Mount, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondents brought this action to recover damages on account of alleged negligence of the appellant, which negligence, it is alleged, caused the death of Michael Schabb, the father of Jennie Schabb, and at that time, the husband of respondent Sarah J. Moore. The cause was tried to the court with a jury, and resulted in the discharge of the jury and a directed judgment for the defendant. Thereafter the respondents filed a motion for new trial upon several grounds. The motion was based upon the record of the case and affidavits of newly discovered evidence. This motion was not heard by the judge who tried the case, but was heard by his successor upon the record which is now before us. The court made an

the place where he was injured, the court, in holding that, if such was the case, the plaintiff was under no obligation to exercise ordinary care in selecting the crossing, added: "He would only be required to exercise this care in the event the company had in no way invited him to use the crossing, and he chose the same himself in his effort to avoid the use of a defective and unsafe crossing provided by the company."

order granting a new trial, without specifying the ground therefor. This appeal is from the order granting the new trial.

The case is presented here solely as one of law, to the effect that, under all the facts which were received and offered in evidence at the trial, and those discovered after the trial, no case is made out sufficient to go to the jury. No other question is presented. The facts are as follows: The appellant, in the year 1905, maintained a station or depot in the town of Wilson Creek. A railway track, called a "house track," extended east and west on the north side of this depot. The town is north of this house track. On the east side of the depot, and to the south of the house track, there was an L-shaped platform; the short end of the L or platform being at right angles to the house track, and near to it. The long side of the platform extended east and west, parallel with the house track, and about 33 to 36 feet distant therefrom. This platform was about 3 feet high. The space between the house track and the platform was covered with soft cinders. At the northeast corner of the depot, where the west end of the platform was nearest the house track, a crossing had been constructed and maintained by the railroad company for the use of teams in going to and from the platform. This crossing was made by laying boards lengthwise of the rails, on the railroad ties, on both sides and between the rails. These boards were about 16 feet long. They were not thick enough by 2 or 3 inches to come to the level of the tops of the rails. Some steps extended from the platform to the ground at the northeast corner of the depot, near this crossing, so that the length of the crossing was reduced about 2 feet, leaving about 14 feet space for the crossing. On the evening of December 26, 1905, the deceased, Michael Schabb, who was a drayman, hauled some trunks from the residence part of town to the depot. He drove over the crossing, made a turn of his wagon in the angle of the platform, and backed his wagon up against the long part of the platform. He unloaded the trunks and attempted to drive away. It was quite dark, but he was seen to drive away. After he had gone but a few feet, the wheels of the dray were heard to strike the rails of the house track, and were seen to "slew to one side," and Mr. Schabb "was hurled suddenly out of the dray, apparently over the front end thereof." The team of horses moved up a few feet and stopped. The witness who saw this paused for a moment, and, concluding that Mr. Schabb was not hurt, passed into the depot. A few minutes later Mr. Schabb was found dead under the left front wheel of his wagon. His neck was broken.

He had attempted to cross over the railroad tracks a few feet east of the crossing prepared by the railway company.

It is alleged that the appellant was negligent for the reason that the crossing was defective, in that the rails extended above the planking, so that it made the crossing dangerous; that the crossing was located too close to the depot, and did not extend a sufficient distance to the east. It is argued by the respondents that the space between the platform and the house track was too narrow, and the soft cinders thereon made it difficult for teams to turn around therein. The appellant argues that the facts are insufficient to go to the jury, because (1) it is not shown that the decedent came to his death by reason of being jolted from his wagon, and the cause of death is mere conjecture; (2) because it is not shown that the condition of the crossing caused the decedent to attempt to cross at the place where he did; and (3) because the deceased attempted to cross the rails at a place other than the one prepared for such purpose.

These last two positions must be sustained. The fact that the space between the house track and the platform was narrow and soft, so that it was difficult for teams to turn around therein, is of no importance in this case, because it was shown by the respondents' evidence that the deceased did turn his team around and back his wagon so that the rear thereof was against the platform, where he unloaded his trunks. It is plain, therefore, that the deceased could readily have driven out over the crossing the same way he drove in. It is true there is some evidence to the effect that wagons frequently "slewed" when an attempt was made to cross the rails at an angle, and this is no doubt a fact. But there is no evidence in the record to show that a wagon once turned around could not be driven out over the regular crossing without crossing the rails at an angle, and there is no evidence that it was necessary for the deceased to attempt to cross the rails at the place where he did, viz., 3 or 4 feet to the east of the crossing which the company maintained. The crossing was at the corner of the platform nearest the depot building. It was 16 feet in length, but some steps leading from the platform occupied 2 feet of this length, leaving the driveway 14 feet in width. This was clearly sufficient for the purpose for which it was used or intended. If the deceased had used this crossing, and, by reason of its defective or dangerous condition, had been injured, complaint then might be made that the company was negligent; but when it is shown and conceded that he attempted to cross in another place, not used or intended as a crossing, the company may not be held for an injury occurring there, because the negligence of the company was not the cause of the injury. The reason why the deceased attempted to drive his wagon across the rails of the track rather than over the crossing is not shown. It was clearly more dangerous to attempt to cross the rails where no crossing was prepared than it was to attempt to cross where a crossing was constructed for that purpose. No excuse is attempted, excepting the fact that it was difficult to turn a wagon such as deceased used in the narrow space and soft cinders between the house track and the platform. But this excuse failed when it was shown that he did turn his wagon, which was backed up against the platform before he started away. Where a railroad company has prepared a crossing over its rails, this is an invitation to the public to make use of such crossing, and the company would be liable to a person injured in using such crossing while exercising ordinary care, if the crossing proved to be unsafe for any cause of which the company was bound to take notice. If a person voluntarily or negligently turns aside from such crossing, and uses another way which is not held out as a crossing, and which is obviously more dangerous, there is no liability on the part of the company. 33 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 929; 5 Thomp. Neg. § 6269; Carey v. Hubbardston, 172 Mass. 106, 51 N. E. 521; Kelley v. Fond du Lac, 31 Wis. 179; Tasker v. Farmingdale, 85 Me. 523, 27 Atl. 464. This is a reasonable rule, and the facts in this case are controlled by it. It is not claimed that the deceased could not see the crossing, or that the company was negligent in any other respects than those above mentioned.

Under all the facts in the case, there is no liability against the appellant, and the order granting the new trial is therefore reversed and the cause ordered dismissed

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

REILLY ATKINSON

v.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF ADA COUNTY.

(— Idaho, —, 108 Pac. 1046.)

Statute — authorizing county to build railroad — constitutionality.

1. The act of the legislature approved

Headnotes by AILSHIE, J.
28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

March 16, 1909 (Sess. Laws 1909, p. 238), providing for the formation of railroad districts and the voting of bonds and purchase or construction of railroads by such districts, and providing for operating or leasing the same, is in violation of the provisions of § 4 of article 8 of the state Constitution, and contrary to the spirit of §§ 2 and 3 of article 8 and § 4 of article 12 of the Constitution.

Constitutional law — prohibited acts — authorizing by indirect method — validity.

2. That which the Constitution directly prohibits may not be done by indirection or by a general legislative act which is meant and intended to include and accomplish the purposes and objects specifically or impliedly prohibited.

County — right to build railroad.

3. It was never anticipated or intended by the framers of the Constitution that counties or other political subdivisions would or could enter into the business of railroad building, but, on the contrary, the specific prohibitions found in the Constitution manifest a clear purpose and intent to prohibit the state or county, or any subdivision thereof, from entering into any such enterprise.

Same — governmental power.

4. The building of a railroad is not, within itself, an exercise of governmental power, but is purely a business enterprise; and if it is to be engaged in by the state or any of its political subdivisions, it must be done by virtue of the proprietary powers of the state or political subdivisions thereof, and not under the police or general welfare powers of the state.

Note. — Power of legislature to authorize counties or other political divisions to build, purchase, or operate railroad or street railway, as affected by limitations or restrictions on power to aid private enterprises.

The few cases involving this question have considered it with reference to legislative power under constitutional restrictions or limitations, as did the court in ATKINSON v. ADA COUNTY. Hence, the question necessarily discussed was the legislative power to authorize counties or other political divisions to acquire a railroad or street railway, indirectly to aid a private enterprise, where power to render aid was limited or restricted by constitutional provisions. Each decision was necessarily based on the language of the restriction or limitation, and hence it is seldom that an individual case will be found an entirely satisfactory precedent for other cases, where the restrictions or limitations imposed by the Constitution, or the circumstances or conditions under which the power is sought to be exercised, are, to any substantial extent, different. Nevertheless, certain principles are recognized by such cases, which are of value in testing the constitutionality of an attempted APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel the commissioners of Ada County to call an election for the purpose of voting on the formation of a railroad district, as provided by law. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Karl Paine and B. S. Crow, for plaintiff:

The act is constitutional.

Nampa & M. Irrig. Dist. v. Brose, 11 Idaho, 474, 83 Pac. 499; Cincinnati v. Dexter, 55 Ohio St. 93, 44 N. E. 520.

The limitations and restrictions of the act apply to political subdivisions of the state, and not to districts created to promote internal improvements.

Re Madera Irrig. Dist. Bonds, 92 Cal. 296, 14 L.R.A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, 28 Pac. 272, 675.

Messrs. D. C. McDougall, Attorney General, C. P. McCarthy, J. H. Peterson, and O. M. Van Duyn for defendant.

Ailshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original action commenced in this court, praying for the issuance of a writ of mandate against the commissioners of Ada county, requiring and compelling them to make an order calling an election for the purpose of voting on the formation of a railroad district in the manner authorized and provided for by the act of March 16, 1909 (Sess. Laws 1909, p. 238). The real question involved in this proceeding is the constitutionality of this statute. The act is intended to authorize the formation of railroad districts by a vote of the resiexercise of such power under varying conditions and constitutional restrictions or limitations.

Thus, the cases are in harmony upon the proposition that constitutional restrictions or limitations upon the legislative power to authorize governmental corporations to lend their credit or give money to aid in the construction of a railroad cannot be avoided by an indirect exercise of the power, under the guise of authorizing the construction of a railroad by governmental corporations, where the primary purpose or object is to aid a private enterprise, in violation of a constitutional provision against giving such aid, rather than to build a railroad the title to which shall be retained by the corporation building it, and which the common good and general welfare of the people of the political division require. Pleasant Twp. v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 138 U. S. 67, 34 L. ed. 864, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 215; Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Pleasant Twp. 10 C. C. A. 11, 22 U. S. App. 510, 62 Fed. 719 (same case after return to lower court); Underground R. Co. v. New York, 116 Fed. 960; People ex rel. Murphy v. Kelly, 76 N. Y. 475; Sun Printing & Pub. Asso. v. New York, 152 N. Y. 257, 37 L.R.A. 788, 46 N. E. 499; Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, 8 Am. Rep. 24; Taylor v. Ross County, 23 Ohio St. 22; Wyscaver v. Atkinson, 37 Ohio St. 80; Counterman v. Dublin Twp. 38 Ohio St. 515.

Thus, in Pleasant Twp. v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 138 U. S. 67, 34 L. ed. 864, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 215, it was said that, in determining the constitutionality of any statute, its scope and effect are as proper for consideration as its language,—“The eyes of the court are never limited to the mere letter.” Thus, examining into the scope and effect of a statute which authorized in general terms certain townships to build railroads, and to lease or operate the same, it was said that this act contemplated the construction of a limited distance of track whose value could only be secured by mingling the funds of the township with other capital; the circumstances clearly disclosing that there was no thought or possibility of the township to which the act related equipping and owning an independent railroad, and that the only practical value and the only real resulting benefit would be the incorporation of this roadbed into a railroad then projected, and to be practically operated and made effective only through private capital. Such circumstances, the court said, established an intent to further the projected line through public aid, and meant not the building and ownership of a railroad by the township, but aid to a projected and lengthy line of railroad. Similar acts relating to other townships were held to be unconstitutional in Wyscaver v. Atkinson and Counterman v. Dublin Twp. supra.

A distinction was made both in the decision in the Supreme Court of the United States in Pleasant Twp. v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. and in the last-mentioned cases between the constitutionality of a legislative act authorizing political divisions to construct a railroad where such construction was necessary to the business interests of such political division, and where the railroad would be a mere convenience. In Pleasant Twp. v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. it was said that it was one thing for a large city, with its concentration of business interests, to build, equip, and own a great railroad highway running from such center outward into other districts, rapid and easy communication with which advances its business interests, and a very different thing for a quasi public corporation, as a township, with its sparse population, its lack of concentration of business interests, to construct a few miles of railroad through its territory, and added: “Business may demand the one, convenience alone supports the other. The justification of the one is in the private and business element which enters into a municipal corporation proper, the absence of which element in a quasi corporation, like a township, forbids its investment in railroad enterprises.”

In using this language, the court was considering and distinguishing the case of Walker v. Cincinnati, supra, which held that there was no constitutional limitation on the general legislative power vested in the gen-dent landowners of the districts. It provides for the manner of organizing the district, the election of directors, the voting of bonds, the selection and acquiring rights of way, and the building and constructing of lines of railroad, and operating or leasing the same. The act appears to have been very carefully drawn, and conforms very closely to the provisions of the irrigation-district laws of this state, providing substantially the same method of formation of the district, of levying and collecting assessments, determining benefits, and other incidents and details of the irrigation act.

Sections 2, 3, and 4 of article 8 of the state Constitution read as follows:

"Sec. 2. The credit of the state shall not, in any manner, be given or loaned to or in aid of any individual, association, municipality, or corporation; nor shall the state, directly or indirectly, become a stockholder in any association or corporation.

"Sec. 3. No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district, or other subdivision of the state, shall incur any indebtedness or liability, in any manner or for any purpose, exceeding in that year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose; nor unless, before or at the time of incurring such indebtedness, provision shall be made for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such indebtedness as it falls due, and also to constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof, within twenty years from the time of contracting the same. Any indebtedness or liability incurred contrary to this provision shall be void: Provided, that this section shall not be construed to apply to the ordinary and necessary expenses authorized by the general laws of the state.

"Sec. 4. No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district, or other subdivision, shall lend or pledge the credit or faith thereof, directly or indirectly, in any manner, to or in aid of any individual, association, or corporation, for any amount or for any purpose whatever, or become responsible for any debt, contract, or liability of any individual, association, or corporation in or out of this state."

Section 2 prohibits the state in any manner ever becoming interested with any indieral assembly, which prohibited it from authorizing a city to raise by taxation of its citizens the means for constructing a railroad leading into such city, when such an improvement was deemed by a majority of the citizens to be essential to its interests.

This case was also distinguished in Taylor v. Ross County, supra, which held unconstitutional a statute authorizing any county, township, or municipality to levy certain taxes for the purpose of building so much of a railroad as could be built for that amount, the railroad being of no practical utility to such political division, except to be used for the unlawful purpose of aiding a private enterprise, and the sale of the railroad by the county commissioners, either at or after its construction, being authorized by the act. The court said that this act attempted to accomplish by an indirection what would be a plain violation of the expressed provision of the Constitution to do directly, and added: "Where public credit or money is furnished to be used in part construction of a work which, under the statute authorizing its construction, must be completed, if completed at all, by other parties, out of their own means, who are to own or have the beneficial control and management of the work when completed, the public money or credit thus used can only be regarded within the meaning of the constitutional provision in question as furnished for or in aid of such parties."

In this connection, it is of interest to note that in reaching this conclusion in Taylor v. Ross County, the court referred to and distinguished Walker v. Cincinnati, principally upon the ground that the statute under consideration in the latter case authorized the construction of a railroad which was of special interest to the people of the political division constructing same, and which was to remain the property of such municipality; while in the case then under consideration, the railroad would not be of special interest to the political division constructing it, and a sale thereof was authorized by the statute delegating the power to construct.

The latter distinction would seem to be of no great practical value as a test of the constitutionality of such an act, in view of the later decision of that court in Cincinnati v. Dexter, 55 Ohio St. 93, 44 N. E. 520, which held that the city of Cincinnati, having constructed such railroad under the act the constitutionality of which was sustained in Walker v. Cincinnati, might thereafter sell it to private parties.

It has been denied that it is a city purpose within the meaning of the constitutional provision against the levying of taxes by cities for other than city purposes, for a city to construct a railroad not wholly within its borders, and of which it is only a terminal point. See remarks to that effect by Earl, J., in People ex rel. Murphy v. Kelly, supra.

It has been held, however, that a city may be lawfully authorized to construct a street railway or subway wholly within the borders of the city, where it is clearly to the business interests of the city that such railway be constructed, and where the circumstances are such that private capital cannot be induced to engage in such construction; and the fact that the purpose of the construction is to lease the railway so constructed to private parties does not renvidual, association, or corporation in any business enterprise, and it likewise prohibits the state in any manner loaning its credit to the aid of such an enterprise, or becoming a stockholder therein; while § 4 makes substantially the same prohibition against any county, city, town, township, board of education, school district, or other subdivision of the county or state, ever lending its credit, either directly or indirectly, to any business enterprise in aid of any individual, association, or corporation. Section 4 of article 12 reiterates substantially the same thing with reference to counties and municipal corporations as is provided against in § 4 of article 8. Section 4 of article 12, however, specifically authorizes cities and towns to contract indebtedness for "school, water, sanitary, and illuminating purposes," thereby excluding all other purposes not governmental in their character.

It is argued by the plaintiff in this case that under the authority of Nampa & M. Irrig. Dist. v. Brose, 11 Idaho, 474, 83 Pac. 499, holding the district irrigation law of this state valid and constitutional, that it must necessarily and logically follow that the present act authorizing railroad districts is also constitutional. The foregoing case is clearly not decisive of the question now before the court. There is a wide difference between the subject of and necessity for irrigation in this state and railroad building. Water, when secured, becomes appurtenant to land, and in vast sections of this state it is absolutely essential to life and habitation that it be secured by means of canals and ditches. When water is conveyed to a tract of land, it is unnecessary that it be carried further in order to be useful or marketable. It needs nothing further than application to the soil. It has, in fact, already become attached to and the chief value of the land, and will be fully as useful if not another acre be watered as if thousands adjoining be watered. But a railroad is an entirely different utility. A railroad from one man's farm to another would be of no use, nor would it, in many cases, be of any use from one side of a county or district to the other. It is a medium of transportation and commerce; and, in order to be of any use or value whatever, must tap centers of population, production, and manufacture. A railroad, in order to be of use or value, must extend from some place to somewhere. The der the construction unlawful. While the case, as to the facts, goes no further than above indicated, yet, in considering the scope of constitutional limitations upon the power of political divisions to give money or their credit to or in aid of any individual, association, or corporation, or to become owners of stock of any such individual, association, or corporation, the court said that such provision was not intended to and did not prohibit municipalities from constructing their own roads and paying therefor when necessary and authorized by the legislature.

Compare with Atty. Gen. ex rel. Barbour v. Pingree (Oren ex rel. Barbour v. Pingree), 120 Mich. 563, 46 L.R.A. 414, 79 N.W. 814, which holds it to be a violation of the constitutional provision against the state engaging in the work of internal improvement for a city to purchase and operate a street railway system then in existence and operation, wholly or partially within the city; and a legislative act delegating such power to a city is therefore unconstitutional, as violative of such provision.

See, however, Platt v. San Francisco (Cal.) 110 Pac. 304, which holds that a street railway system is a public utility which the state may invest a municipality with the power to acquire and operate. On this point it was said: "The existence and proper conduct of such utilities in cities clearly constitute public affairs, one relating very closely to the well-being, safety, health, advantage, and convenience of all the inhabitants thereof, and are well within the legitimate functions of government. If the state deems it conducive to the welfare of the inhabitants of a city that the municipality shall have the power to itself acquire and operate for their benefit any such utility, in order that they may not be dependent solely on the establishment or operation thereof by some private corporation or person, there can be no doubt of its right to confer such power on the municipality."

It is to be noted that ATKINSON v. ADA COUNTY was decided upon the theory that the statute under consideration did not contemplate bona fide acquisition or construction of railroads as public utilities, to be operated by the political division constructing same for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof. It was based upon the theory that the purpose of acquiring or constructing railroads thereby authorized was to avoid the constitutional limitations upon the power of a political division to aid or lend its credit to railroads or other private purposes. It is the latter question that has been considered herein, and no attempt has been made to consider the power of a state to authorize political divisions to acquire bona fide a railroad or street railway, to be used by it as a public utility for the benefit of its inhabitants, where not considered with reference to a constitutional provision against aiding a private enterprise, and the cases bearing thereon are not included herein,—Atty. Gen. ex rel. Barbour v. Pingree and Platt v. San Francisco being the only exceptions, and they are included simply for the purpose of distinguishing the two questions, and to direct attention thereto.

act in question authorizes the building of "railroads," but the result under the act must necessarily be that a district can only build a part of a road,—a branch line or feeder to a main or trunk line. As a court, we cannot be ignorant of that which is common knowledge. With the wisdom of legislation we have nothing to do, but it is our duty to look to the results an act will and is intended to accomplish, and determine whether those results will be violative of the Constitution. If each community is to be authorized to form a district and bond itself to build a stub or branch line to connect with the main transcontinental trunk lines, will they not be absolutely at the mercy of the trunk line? And will it not result in the district building the branch line for the use of or donation in whole or in part to the main line, and thereby doing indirectly the very thing § 4 of article 8 of the Constitution forbids and prohibits. No one anticipates or expects that a district, as authorized by this act, either can or will operate a line of railroad extending through or across such district only. It is to all purposes and intents an inducement or subsidy to a main or through line. If it is constitutional to build such a line of road by a district, it would be constitutional to authorize its sale, and thereby "indirectly . . . aid . . . a corporation," in violation of the Constitution.

In Wyscaver v. Atkinson, 37 Ohio St. 80, the supreme court of Ohio had under consideration an act passed by the legislature in 1880, "to authorize certain townships to build railroads, and to lease or operate the same." That act provided that townships falling within a certain class might vote bonds and construct a line of railroad, and do the things necessary and incident thereto. The court held the act to be in violation of § 6 of article 8 of the Constitution of Ohio, which reads as follows: "The general assembly shall never authorize any county, city, town, or township, by vote of its citizens or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any joint-stock company, corporation, or association whatever, or to raise money for, or loan its credit to or in aid of, any such company, corporation, or association." In considering this question, the supreme court said: "Was it contemplated that a complete and independent railroad should be constructed by the township? We think not, and therefore, without speculating as to the matter in which it was intended that the result should be accomplished, it is quite evident, to our minds, that the legislative intent, as well as that of the trustees of the township, was that the proposed road should, in some manner and by some means, become consolidated or connected with other roads, as part of a more extended line of railway, in order to make it at all subservient to the public welfare; and that in no other way could it be made of public utility. The purpose and effect of the statute is to unite the means and credit of the township with those of other parties, in order to promote a common enterprise; to wit, the construction of a continuous line of railway, which could not be accomplished without such combination of interests."

The court quoted with approval from the opinion in Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 54, 8 Am. Rep. 24, as follows: "The mischief which this section interdicts is a business partnership between a municipality, or subdivision of the state, and individuals or private corporations or associations. It forbids the union of public and private capital or credit in any enterprise whatever. In no project originated by individuals, whether associated or otherwise, with a view to gain, are the municipal bodies named permitted to participate in such manner as to incur pecuniary expense or liability. They may neither become stockholders, nor furnish money or credit for the benefit of the parties interested therein. Though joint-stock companies, corporations, and associations only are named, we do not doubt that the reason of the prohibition would render it applicable to the case of a single individual. The evil would be the same, whether the public suffered from the cupidity of a single person or from that of several persons associated together." The learned justice who wrote the opinion in Wyscaver v. Atkinson, after quoting the above extract from Walker v. Cincinnati, added the further comment: "And I will add that it makes no difference whether the scheme for the union of public and private money or credit originates with the party or parties representing the public or the private interests. In short, the thing prohibited is the combination in any form whatever of the public funds or credit of any county, city, town, or township with the capital of any other person, whether incorporated or unincorporated, for the purpose of promoting any enterprise whatever." In McDonald v. Doust, 11 Idaho, 24, 69 L.R.A. 220, 81 Pac. 63, this court said: "Acts inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution are as much prohibited by its terms as are acts specifically enumerated and forbidden therein." This position is reinforced by the further fact that railroad building is not, within itself, an exercise of governmental power, but is purely a business enterprise, and must be justified, if at all, under the proprietary powers of the state or political subdivision. Previous action of the legislature and the people with reference to this provision of our Constitution is a pertinent and proper subject of inquiry. In March, 1905, the legislature, by joint resolution, submitted to the people a proposition to so amend § 4, art. 8, Const., as to authorize a "county, city, village, municipality, or other subdivision of the state," by vote of the people, to "make donations to any railroad or other works of internal improvement" to an amount not exceeding 10 per cent of the assessed valuation of such county. That amendment was defeated by an overwhelming vote of the people. In this respect we have a positive declaration from the people against any participation by the counties or any of their subdivisions in railroad building in aid of "any individual, association, or corporation."

It is said that this provision does not prohibit the county or other subdivision building and owning a road in its entirety. It is true that the prohibition against absolute ownership is not, in so many words, to be found in the Constitution, but it is clear from the context and the language employed in §§ 2, 3, 4, article 8, and § 4, article 12, that it was never contemplated that the counties or other political subdivisions would or could go into railroad building, and so the framers of the Constitution forbade donations or ownership in part. They evidently appreciated the fact that a railroad, to be of any value to the people of Idaho, must extend further than across a county or even across the state,—that it must reach the markets, not merely at one end of the line, but at both ends. If the people want to authorize the formation of railroad districts, they can readily do so by adopting an amendment to the Constitution; but until they do so, we are constrained to hold such acts in conflict with the Constitution. The act in question is, in our opinion, violative of the spirit and intent of the Constitution (§§ 2, 3, 4, article 8, and § 4, article 12), and cannot be upheld.

The demurrer to the complaint is sustained, and the action will be dismissed. No costs awarded.

RE WILL OF THOMAS KENNEDY, Deceased.

(159 Mich. 548, 124 N. W. 516.)

Will—intention—parol evidence.

Parol evidence is not admissible to show that testator did not intend an instrument executed in pursuance of the formal requirements of the statute of wills to be a will.

(February 3, 1910.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for St. Clair County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Probate Court admitting to probate the will of Thomas Kennedy, Deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. David Fitzgibbon and John B. McIlwain, for appellants:

Parol evidence of the statements of the testator made at the time of the execution of the paper writing is admissible to show with what intention the execution of the instrument was accompanied, and to establish the fact that the testator did not intend it as a will to operate and be in force at his death as a disposition of his property, and such being the fact the paper writing never became a valid will.

Note.—Admissibility of extrinsic evidence to show that instrument, on its face a will, was not intended as such.

This note is confined strictly to cases passing on the question whether an instrument unambiguous, and on its face a will, may be shown by extrinsic evidence not to have been intended as such. The question, therefore, whether parol evidence is admissible to show that an ambiguous instrument was intended as a will is not within the scope of this note.

A case supporting the doctrine laid down in RE KENNEDY, is Heaston v. Krieg, 167 Ind. 101, 119 Am. St. Rep. 475, 77 N. E. 805, where it was said that where a writing contains every element of a valid will, and is incapable of operating in any other way, the animus testandi must be implied, and the instrument, supposing it to be regularly executed, is not subject to control by parol evidence tending to show any different intent.

This doctrine was evidently also recognized in Shaw v. Shaw, 1 Dem. 21.

And see Barnewall v. Murrell, 108 Ala. 366, 18 So. 831, sufficiently set out in the KENNEDY CASE.

A case not strictly in point, but of possible interest in this note, is Sewell v. Slingluff, 57 Md. 537, where it was held that parol evidence is not admissible to prove that a paper in form a valid will was in fact intended to be used and probated only in the event of the testatrix dying without issue, and that in the contingency of her dying leaving issue, it should be wholly inoperative, and her estate should pass as if it had never been executed. court in distinguishing Lister v. Smith, 3 Swabey & T. 282, and Nichols v. Nichols, 2 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 180, said: "These cases go, perhaps, as far as any cited in allowing parol evidence. But in these and in all other cases referred to, the courts have restricted the evidence to the ascertainment of the animus testandi, and have never gone beyond that. Even if we were to admit that these cases were well decided (which we do not determine), we consider the parol evidence offered in this case inadmissible. If it were in any such case admissible, we would be unwilling to reject it in this, as the straightforward testimony and disinterested conduct of the husband of the testatrix presents a strong case, and one with many equitable features, strongly appealing to our sense of justice. But we must take the law as we find it; and as in all the long period that has elapsed since the passage of the act of 29 Charles II., no court has permitted such testimony to be received, we cannot do so now."

There are other cases closely related to the cases presenting the question here annotated, which also might be cited in support of the KENNEDY CASE.

Such a case is Jackson ex dem. Coe v. Kniffen, 2 Johns. 32, 3 Am. Dec. 390, where it was held that parol evidence of declarations of a testator are not admissible to show that a will was made under duress.

It will be noticed, however, that such cases cannot be said to be strictly in point. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) and no effort has been made to include all of them here.

So, in Moran v. Moran, 104 Iowa, 216, 39 L.R.A. 204, 65 Am. St. Rep. 443, 73 N. W. 617, it was held that a devise absolute in form cannot be shown by oral evidence to be in trust for other persons.

But to the contrary see Vance v. Park, 15 Ohio C. C. 713, where it was said, however, that such proof must be "clear, convincing, and conclusive."

A case holding directly contrary to the KENNEDY CASE is Lister v. Smith, 3 Swabey & T. 282. This case is sufficiently set out in the KENNEDY CASE.

That a will might be shown by extrinsic evidence not to have been written with a testamentary intention was also held in Nichols v. Nichols, 2 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 180.

So, in Fleming v. Morrison, 187 Mass. 120, 105 Am. St. Rep. 386, 72 N. E. 499, the court was of opinion that it is competent to contradict by parol the solemn statements contained in an instrument that it is a will, that it has been signed as such by the person named as the testator, and attested and subscribed by persons signing as witnesses.

On the question whether an instrument not on its face of a testamentary character may be shown by extrinsic evidence to be such so as to take effect as a will, see note to Noble v. Fickes, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1203.

N. E. 656; Clay v. Layton, 134 Mich. 341, 96 N. W. 458.

Blair, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Thomas Kennedy died in the fall of 1908. In 1897 he signed a paper in the form of a will. The paper was drawn by John L. Black, and he and his nephew, Clare R. Black, are the witnesses. This paper was allowed in the probate court as the last will and testament of Thomas Kennedy. An appeal was taken to the circuit court by the brothers of deceased. The case rested on the testimony of the two subscribing witnesses, whereupon the circuit judge directed a verdict sustaining the document as the last will and testament of Thomas Kennedy, deceased. The contestants, his brothers, appeal and contest on the ground that the paper was not executed to operate as a will, and not executed as required by the statute.

John L. Black testified that he was an attorney at law and, up to January 1, 1897, had been judge of probate; that he drew the will in question, February 11, 1897; that, at Mr. Kennedy's request, he locked the door so that they should not be interrupted. "I remember that will being signed by Thomas Kennedy. I saw him sign it."

Q. In the presence of yourself and Clare R. Black?

A. I cannot remember about Clare, but I remember myself; I did not know Clare was a witness to it until I saw it here in probate court. As a matter of memory I could not recall who it was that signed it besides myself. He writes a little different, but have no doubt but that is his signature. I recall that Thomas Kennedy signed the will in my presence and that I signed it in his presence, at his request. I was well acquainted with Mr. Kennedy. He was in good bodily and mental condition at the time he signed it; no question about it in my mind. . . .

Q. Just state to the jury what he said he wanted.

A. Why, he wanted some paper; he was having trouble out there with the boys, as he put it, and they were making him a good deal of trouble, and insisting upon knowing what he was going to do with his personal property, and I think at the same time he told me that he had already disposed of his real estate; that is the way I understood him, and he said they kept at him and kept hounding him all the time, and that he wanted me to draw some kind of a paper that would be a peacemaker, that he could take out home. I told him at that time, "Mr. Kennedy, you don't have to make any kind of a paper, you are too old a man to make any kind of a paper," and he said to me, as I remember it, "You don't know the conditions out there as well as I do," and we talked it over one way and another. First we talked about a bill of sale, and I told him, if I remember right, some kind of a paper he had in mind that it was going to be a dangerous paper, and then he talked about putting it in the form of a will. I said that would be better because "You can destroy it any time." So I drew him up a paper, the paper that is here, and he signed it. . . . He said it was not a will; that at some future time he would draw a will.

Q. Did you have any talk at that time with him about keeping it in your safe?

A. Yes, I insisted, I said, "Mr. Kennedy, leave that with me, don't take it out there; and if you don't want it, why, if anything should happen you, I could destroy it for you," but he said, "No;" he would have to take it out there as a peacemaker. . . . He went over pretty near the history of his life with me, because I was at him for being so foolish as to sign a paper that he didn't want to sign. . . .

Q. He told you he had made some disposition of his real estate at that time? . . .

A. Well, he told me in a general way that he had made a disposition, and that he wanted that put in the will that he had made a disposition of his real estate, in that paper there that he had made a disposition of his real estate during his lifetime.

Q. And you put that clause in here?

A. I put that clause in.

That the ink of Clare R. Black's signature was of a lighter hue than that used by Mr. Kennedy and himself; that he did not sign the paper as an instrument intended to become operative as a will, and, so far as he knew, neither did Clare R. Black; that from the time he drew the paper until the time Mr. Kennedy left the building with it he was constantly with him; that Clare R. Black might have signed the will as a witness in the presence of Mr. Kennedy and himself, and he might have taken the will into Clare R. Black's office and he have signed here.

Q. But you told me a minute ago that the will and yourself,—that you were with the will all the time until the old man took it away that day?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. For you do not remember taking it away from the old man in next door?

A. No, I do not; and I don't remember of Clare coming in there either.

Clare R. Black, a practising attorney, testified to the genuineness of his signature:

Q. Now, Mr. Black, you state now that you have no memory of ever being called upon to witness any other will, except that one of Mr. Atkinson's, prior to your becoming a member of the bar?

A. No, sir.

Q. If you had been called into the office of John L. Black, and it had been made known to you either by Mr. Black or by Mr. Kennedy that Mr. Kennedy was making his will, and he had signed it or was going to sign it, and wanted you and Mr. Black to witness it, or wanted you to join with Mr. Black to witness it, and you did so join with him in witnessing it; what do you say whether you would have remembered it?

A. I believe I would have.

Q. What do you say now as to whether any such transaction as that occurred in February, 1897, in connection with the execution of the document presented here as a will?

A. As to whether I went in there and Mr. Kennedy asked me to sign this as his witness and told me what it was?

Q. That he was making a will and wanted you to sign as a witness, or Mr. Black in his presence and you did sign as a witness to his making his will; what do you say as to whether any such transaction as that occurred?

A. Well, from memory I would say, "No."

The court directed a verdict for the proponents, instructing them that the will had been executed in pursuance of the formal requirements of the statute, and that parol testimony that the testator did not intend that the instrument should operate as a will was not receivable. "The presumption is that this paper was executed, subscribed, and attested or witnessed as it purports to be on its face, and the mere fact that Mr. Black, one of the witnesses, fails to remember the circumstances under which he subscribed and attested this will cannot, under the law of this state, be allowed to defeat it. The court instructs you that these statutory formalities of execution have been complied with in this case as shown by the evidence. That is, the paper claimed to be a will is in writing, it is signed by Mr. Thomas Kennedy, it was attested and subscribed in the presence of the testator by two or more competent witnesses, hence, you must assume that the paper here claimed to be a will was executed in the form and manner as prescribed by law. The contestant also claims, as heretofore stated, that Mr. Kennedy at the time he executed this paper did not intend to make a will, but signed the paper merely to satisfy his relatives, the family of John Cavanaugh, Mr. Cavanaugh being the beneficiary under the will, and this being the family with whom Mr. Kennedy was living. Mr. John L. Black testifies that Mr. Kennedy said to him just before the paper was prepared, signed, and witnessed, that he, Mr. Kennedy, did not intend the paper for a will, but merely to satisfy the sons of John Cavanaugh, who were hounding him about his property. The court says to you that this testimony cannot be received and considered to invalidate the paper and render it of no effect as a will. Parol testimony of this kind when it arises, separate and apart from any question of fraud, undue influence, mental competency, or of ambiguity in the paper proposed as a will, cannot be permitted to overcome the presumption that the testator, in executing a solemn instrument like a will, intended the paper, not for a will, but to serve some collateral and extraneous purpose. To admit such testimony to defeat a will in a case like this would to some extent tend to defeat the right which every sane and competent person has under our laws to make a final disposition of his property by will, and to have his or her wishes in regard to property carried out after death. The momentous consequence of permitting parol evidence to thus outweigh the sanction of a solemn act is obvious. It would have a tendency to place all wills at the mercy of a parol story that the testator did not mean what he said and what he put in solemn written form. Hence, gentlemen of the jury, it is the duty of the court in this case to direct a verdict in favor of the proponent of the will."

The will gave all of his personal property to his sister's husband, John Cavanaugh. The important question presented by this record is whether the court erred in holding, as a matter of law, that evidence was not admissible to show that the alleged will was executed for a collateral purpose, and that the testator did not intend it to operate as a will disposing of his property. Stated in another way, the question is: Is an instrument purporting to be a will, and executed with all the statutory formalities, conclusively presumed to have been executed animo testandi? This question is one of first impression in this court. As stated by the circuit judge, the question is wholly separate and apart from any question of fraud, undue influence, or mental competency in the procurement of the will, or of ambiguity in the meaning of its provisions. The evidence conclusively shows that the testator was of sound mind, was laboring under no mistake of fact, knew precisely what he was doing, and intended to do precisely what he did do,—viz., to execute, according to the forms prescribed, a paper on its face disposing of his estate with knowledge that he could revoke it at any time.

Accepting the testimony of the scrivener, it must be presumed that he exhibited the will to his brother-in-law as his genuine will, for the purpose of securing peace in the family and securing those attentions which he required.

Q. You understood from him that he was making his home at the Cavanaughs?

A. I did; yes. Mrs. John Cavanaugh was his sister.

Q. What reason did he give for making his home there?

A. If I remember right, that his father and brothers were keeping bachelor's hall or something of that kind, and it was handy for him over there; that he could get his clothes cared for and one thing and another with his sister, and he made his home there and lived with them. I don't know how long he had been living there, but if I remember right, he told me that he taught school out in Emmett, too, and had made his home there while he was teaching school. Then he came in here and remained a great many years when he was here as deputy county treasurer. He made his home then at Mr. Walsh's hotel. He had either left the county treasurer's office or was about going to leave, I don't remember just which, and he was going back to make his home with the Cavanaughs, or had made it when this trouble arose out there, whatever it was, he wouldn't tell me the details of it.

Q. So that just before this will had been made he was here to town for eight years?

A. For eight to twelve, somewhere along there.

The testimony of the scrivener also discloses that Mr. Kennedy intended at a future time to make a will, but never spoke to him again about the paper in question or the making of another will. For over eleven years Mr. Kennedy retained this will in his possession, so far as this record discloses, and died leaving it unrevoked. There can be no doubt that a presumption of testamentary intention arises from the deliberate execution, by a competent person, of a paper in the express form of a will, in strict pursuance of the provisions of our statute regulating the execution of wills. Whether this presumption is a disputable one is the serious question in this case.

Respectable authorities are cited by counsel for contestants, some of which are directly in point, holding that parol evidence is receivable in such cases. The case of Lister v. Smith, 3 Sawbey & T. 282, is such a case. In that case, the question was whether a certain codicil was entitled to probate. It was regularly executed by the testator, but evidence was given at the trial that the testator never intended it seriously to operate as a testamentary document. It was proved before the jury that the testator wished one of his family to give up a house which she then occupied, and that, to force her to do so, he made pretense of revoking by codicil a bequest which he had made by will in favor of this woman's daughter, and that the paper in question was made with that sole object; that the testator gave his attorney instructions to prepare it with that intention, and informed him before it was drawn that he never wished it to operate at all; further, that the attorney pointed out the folly of executing such an instrument, and would have nothing to do with its execution. It was, however, executed in the presence of the testator's brother, to whom it was then given by the testator, with express directions that he was not to part with it, and that it was in no event to operate or to revoke the bequest made in his will, but to be used only in the manner above described. Similar declarations were made by the testator at the moment of its execution. The court said: "The momentous consequences of permitting parol evidence thus to outweigh the sanction of a solemn act are obvious. It has a tendency to place all wills at the mercy of a parol story that the testator did not mean what he said. On the other hand, if the fact is plainly and conclusively made out, that the paper which appears to be the record of a testamentary act was in reality the offspring of a jest, or the result of a contrivance to effect some collateral object, and never seriously intended as a disposition of property, it is not reasonable that the court should turn it into an effective instrument. And such no doubt is the law. There must be the animus testandi," citing Nichols v. Nichols, 2 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 180; Trevelyan v. Trevelyan, 1 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 149; Swinburne, Wills, pt. 1, § 3; Shep. Touch. 404; Pym v. Campbell, 6 El. & Bl. 370.

The court, however, recognizing the serious consequences which might flow from this holding, remarked: "But here I must remark that the court ought not, I think, to permit the fact to be taken as established, unless the evidence is very cogent and conclusive. It is a misfortune attending the determination of fact by a jury, that their verdict recognizes and expresses no degree of clearness in proof. They are sworn to find one way or the other, and they do so sometimes on proof amounting almost to demonstration, at others on a mere balance of testimony; sometimes upon written admissions and independent facts proved by disinterested parties, sometimes on conflicting oaths or a nice preponderance of credibility. And it is difficult to impress them with the enormous weight which attaches to the document itself as evidence of the animus with which it was made. This weight it becomes the court to appreciate, and to guard with jealousy the sanction of a solemn act. In the present case, however, the court finds the evidence so cogent, that it is prepared to act on the finding of the jury that the codicil was executed as a sham and a pretense, never seriously intended as a paper of testamentary operation. But I am far from saying that the court will in all cases repudiate a testamentary paper, simply because a jury can be induced to find that it was not intended to operate as such. The character and nature of the evidence must be considered, as well as the result at which a jury have arrived, and the court must be satisfied that it is sufficiently cogent to its end."

The case of Swett v. Boardman, 1 Mass. 262, 2 Am. Dec. 16, cited by counsel for contestant, is to the effect that some form of publication of a will is necessary, and that it was competent to prove by parol that, at the time of executing the instrument proposed as his last will and testament, the testator did not know or suppose that he was executing a will. The case of Waite v. Frisbie, 45 Minn. 361, 47 N. W. 1069, also cited by counsel for contestant, merely holds that where a will is not read by nor to the testator, and it has been prepared by another person from instructions given by the testator, and is then signed upon an assurance that it expresses what he desires, if the language inserted is not the language of the instructions, and if it does not make in legal effect the provisions which the testator apparently desires, it is not his will.

See also 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 581, and cases cited; 1 Underhill, Wills, § 39.

"The momentous consequences of permitting parol evidence thus to outweigh the sanction of a solemn act," referred to by the court in the case of Lister v. Smith, supra, are still more momentous under the laws of this state, since, under the rule of evidence prevailing with us, no more cogent evidence is required to establish the fact of lack of testamentary intention in the making of an instrument, than to establish any other fact which may be submitted to a jury for its determination, and the court has no greater authority to control the verdict or influence it in such a case than in any other. Recognizing fully the high character of the authorities sustaining the contestants' position, we are inclined, as this is an open question in this state, in view of the serious consequences of the contrary view, to hold, as was held by the supreme court of Alabama in the case of Barnewall v. Murrell, 108 Ala. 366, 18 So. 831, that "it was, doubtless, one of the purposes of the statute, in requiring that testamentary dispositions of personal property should be executed with the same formalities required in devises of land, to remove them from the doubt and uncertainty in this respect, which attended them while the rule of the common law prevailed. There is no other mode of giving a valid expression to the animus testandi, than that which the statute prescribes. Whatever form the expression may assume, whatever solemnity may accompany it, the statute declares it ineffectual, unless the formalities it prescribes are observed. When these formalities are observed, if the writing be testamentary,—if it imports a posthumous destination of property,—the statute in itself and of itself attaches, and conclusively attaches, the animus testandi. The requisition of extrinsic or additional evidence of its existence is to add to the requirements of the statute; and to receive such evidence to repel the existence of the intent would be to receive evidence against the statute." And, again: "When a sane testator, not subject to coercion or restraint, intentionally executes, with the formalities required by the statute, a writing which in form and substance is testamentary, the writing of itself imports, and conclusively imports, the animus testandi, i. e., the mind to dispose. the firm and advised determination to make a testament,—closing all inquiry as to the existence and manifestation of the intent."

Section 9262, Comp. Laws, provides for the disposition of real property by will. Section 9265, Comp. Laws, provides that every person of full age and sound mind may, by his last will and testament in writing, bequeath and dispose of all his personal estate. Section 9266, Comp. Laws, provides that no will "shall be effectual to pass any estate, whether real or personal, nor to charge or in anyway affect the same, unless it be in writing, and signed by the testator, or by some person in his presence, and by his express direction, and attested and subscribed in the presence of the testator by two or more competent witnesses," etc. Section 9270 provides: "No will nor any part thereof shall be revoked, unless by burning, tearing, canceling, or obliterating the same, with the intention of revoking it, by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction; or by some other will or codicil in writing, executed as prescribed in this chapter; or by some other writing, signed, attested, and subscribed in the manner provided in this chapter for the execution of a will; excepting only that nothing contained in this section shall prevent the revocation implied by law from subsequent changes in the condition or circumstances of the testator."

No publication of the instrument is required in this state to give it effect, but the execution of an instrument in testamentary form, with the statutory formalities, completes the testamentary act. Danley v. Jefferson, 150 Mich. 590, 121 Am. St. Rep. 640, 114 N. W. 470, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 242.

The execution of a paper in the form of a will, under the provisions of our statute, does not place the instrument beyond the control of the testator, whether he retains possession of it himself or delivers it over to the persons for whose benefit it has been made, or to another person for them. It remains at all times subject to his control. If he retains possession of it, he may revoke it in one of the ways specified in the statute. If he has parted with the possession of the instrument, he may revoke it by making a will. The certificate of attestation is as follows:

On this 11th day of February in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, Thomas Kennedy, of the township of Emmett, St. Clair County, Michigan, signed the foregoing instrument, and declared the same to be his last will and testament, in the presence of us as witnesses, and we, not being interested therein, at the request of said Thomas Kennedy, in his presence and the presence of each other, and where he could see us sign our names, did thereupon on said above-mentioned day subscribe our names thereto as witnesses thereto.

Clare R. Black,
Residing at Port Huron, Mich.,
John L. Black,
Residing at Port Huron, Mich.

On the back of it, in the handwriting of Mr. Black, was: "Will of Thomas Kennedy, of Emmett, St. Clair county, Michigan." It is undisputed that John L. Black witnessed the instrument in the presence of the testator.

Clare R. Black testified:

Q. Do you recall the circumstance of signing that?

A. No, sir.

Q. You haven't any present memory of going into that office? You haven't any present memory of signing that paper at all?

A. No, sir.

Q. But you have no memory one way or the other on this paper now at this time?

A. No, sir.

It is apparent, from his testimony, that he had no recollection whatever of the facts connected with his signing the will as a witness. His opinion, based wholly upon conjecture, is not sufficient to raise a question of fact for the jury, and the trial court did not err in so holding. Abbott v. Abbott, 41 Mich. 542, 2 N. W. 810. The declarations 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the testator that he was being hounded to make a will are the sole evidence in the record of undue influence in the procuring of the will, of which fact they are not competent evidence. Zibble v. Zibble, 131 Mich. 655, 92 N. W. 348.

The judgment is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

ISAAC G. JENKINS, Plff. in Err.,
v.

FRANK E. PILCHER.

(160 Mich. 349, 125 N. W. 355.)

Bankruptcy — fraud — inducing surrender of note.

Inducing the abandonment of a suit on a note and surrender of the instrument by a promise to pay the same, when falsely made to secure time to conceal assets and take advantage of bankruptcy proceedings, is not such fraud as will prevent the discharge of the debt in such proceedings.

Note. — Fraud in preventing collection of claim as excepting it from discharge in bankruptcy.

Fraud as used in that part of the bankrupt law which provides that no debt created by fraud, etc., shall be discharged in bankruptcy, means positive fraud or fraud in fact involving moral turpitude or intentional wrong. Wolf v. Stix, 99 U. S. 1, 25 L. ed. 309.

To come within the exception the debt must be tainted with fraud in its inception. The vice must come into existence with the debt. If the contract was fair and honest when made, although the debtor may subsequently have been guilty of fraudulent conduct in respect of it, yet such conduct does not cut off the benefit of the discharge. Brown v. Broach, 52 Miss. 536; Bank of North America v. Crandall, 87 Mo. 208.

Therefore the liability of a firm which succeeded a partnership, upon its agreement to save the partnership harmless from debts contracted before the firm succeeded to the business, will not be excepted from a discharge in bankruptcy, because the successor firm forged the partnership's signature to notes and indorsed them in payment of such debts, at the same time falsely representing to the members of the former partnership that the debts had been paid. Brown v. Broach, supra.

Fraud which will except a debt from discharge in bankruptcy does not include such fraud as the law implies from the purchase of property from a debtor, with the intent thereby to hinder and delay his creditors in the collection of their debts. Wolf v. Stix, supra.

Therefore, liability upon a replevin bond

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the declaration in an action brought to recover damages for alleged fraud and deceit in inducing plaintiff to abandon a suit on a certain promissory note and to surrender the instrument. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Wetherbee, for plaintiff in error:

The right in action upon the note was property.

Dunlap v. Toledo, A. A. & G. T. R. Co. 50 Mich. 474, 15 N. W. 555; Power v. Harlow, 57 Mich. 111, 23 N. W. 606.

The action for fraud or obtaining property by false pretenses, mentioned in the bankruptcy act of 1898, is the common-law form of action for fraud and deceit.

Goodman v. Herman, 172 Mo. 344, 60 L.R.A. 885, 72 S. W. 546.

Upon the theory that defendant received nothing of value, plaintiff is entitled to recover damages, which are not a provable debt, nor barred by a discharge in bankruptcy.

Eaton v. Winnie, 20 Mich. 156, 4 Am. Rep. 377; Joyce, Damages, § 2214.

Messrs. Jackson, Mills, Culver, & Griffin for defendant in error.

Blair, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff prosecutes his writ of error in this case to reverse the judgment sustaining the defendant's demurrer to his declaration.

The declaration alleges, in substance, that, for the purpose of aiding defendant to obtain a medical education, secure his admission to the practice of his profession, and support him while acquiring a practice, plaintiff loaned to defendant the sum of $3,487.50, for which he took his note payable after date, with the understanding that defendant should repay the loan as soon as he should become established in the practice of medicine and surgery; that defendant failed to pay the note as agreed, and plaintiff brought suit against him "in the circuit court for said county of Wayne in an action of assumpsit . . . for the recovery thereof;" that, for the purpose of getting possession of the said note and terminating the said suit, and in order that he might get time to fraudulently dispose of, conceal, and cover up his property, and later obtain his discharge in bankruptcy and defeat the collection of plaintiff's debt, defendant on the 16th of November and on previous days fraudulently represented 'that he, defendant, during a considerable time then immediately preceding, had done and transacted considerable business in his said practice and profession, but that all the money he had been able to collect and realize from his said business was the sum of $15 during the last preceding month, which constituted his income for that month, and that he, defendant, was wholly unable from his then said income to make any payment upon said indebtedness so owing to plaintiff as aforesaid; that, if said plaintiff would surrender up said promissory note and return the same to him, defendant, and take no judgment in said cause, record and file number 43,611, and consider the same ended, he, the said defendant, would be greatly aided and assisted thereby, and would then and there be enabled to make, and would make, regular considerable payments upon said indebtedness so owing to plaintiff for the recovery of which said action was brought, . . . would make considerable and substantial payments upon said indebtedness, and would soon pay the entire amount thereof, if he were not annoyed, hindered, and prevented by actions or proceedings brought for collection and enforcement of the same;" that plaintiff, relying upon the fraudulent representations, turned back the note, took no judgment, and "considered said action at an end," "and, relying upon the same, was led and induced to, and did, delay, prolong, and put off bringing any other or further action against defendant for the recovery of said several sums until the 18th day of April, 1906, when he began a similar action in said circuit court, and, before judgment could be recovered therein, said defendant had matured, carried out, and fulfilled his fraudulent plans and intentions, given by one against whom replevin was brought upon the alleged ground that he was a fraudulent grantee of the grantor is dischargeable in bankruptcy. Ibid. To the same effect is Re Blumberg, 94 Fed. 476, 1 Am. Bankr. Rep. 633.

It was held in United States v. The Rob Roy, 1 Woods, 42, Fed. Cas. No. 16,179, that the obligation evidenced by a forthcoming bond was not created by fraud so as to be excepted from discharge in bankruptcy, merely because the obligor used false witnesses and swore falsely himself in an effort to establish his right to the property in the suit in which such right was adjudicated.

It was held in Gleason v. O'Mara (C. C. A.) 180 Fed. 417, that a liability for obtaining property by false pretenses or representations, within the bankruptcy act, was not established by proof that a bankrupt's false representations as to his property, alleged to have induced an attorney to accept his defense on a criminal prosecution, were not made until after the attorney had undertaken to defend the bankrupt.

as aforesaid stated, to collect, receive, and obtain from his, defendant's, said business, practice, and profession of medicine and surgery divers other large sums of money, to wit, the sum of $10,000 and upwards, and to unlawfully, wrongfully, and fraudulently assign, conceal, secrete, and dispose of the same, and place the said sums beyond plaintiff's knowledge and ability to trace the same, and thereafter to go through bankruptcy and secure discharge from the payment of his just debts, and particularly from his said indebtedness to plaintiff. And plaintiff further avers that said statements, representations, pretenses, and promises so made by defendant, as aforesaid, were then and there false and untrue, that defendant's said promises to make regular considerable payments upon said indebtedness so owing by him to plaintiff were then and there a mere subterfuge, designedly made in connection with said statements, representations, and pretenses, as part and parcel thereof, and of the general scheme therein embraced to cheat and defraud him, said plaintiff, and with the preconceived and well-matured intention on the part of defendant not to carry out and fulfil the same or any part thereof, and not to make any payments whatsoever upon said indebtedness; that the said defendant then and there, at the time of making said false, unlawful, deceitful, and fraudulent statements, representations, and pretenses concerning his said income, was receiving in money from his said business, practice, and profession of medicine and surgery an income of nearly $500 per month; that the said defendant in the month of October, 1903, collected, received, and obtained from his said business the sum of $493.75 or thereabouts, and that, during the year then immediately preceding, the said defendant collected and received from his said business $300 and upward in money per month; that since the said 16th day of November, 1903, and up to the time of filing his petition in bankruptcy, the said defendant had received, collected, and obtained from his said business as income therefrom more than $12,500 in money, and that said defendant, during said time, assigned, concealed, secreted, and disposed of the greater part thereof, to wit, of the sum of $8,000 and upwards, with the intention of going through bankruptcy at such opportune time as presented itself, for the purpose of obtaining a discharge from the payment of his just debts, which he is entirely able to pay, and particularly from his said indebtedness to plaintiff, and that said defendant did on, to wit, the 22d day of October, 1907, or about that date, and before judgment could be recovered in said second action, begin proceedings in the bankruptcy court of this jurisdiction, scheduling but a few debts of small amounts in addition to his said indebtedness to plaintiff; that said bankruptcy proceedings are still pending undetermined, and that in due time the said defendant will procure his coveted discharge. . . . And plaintiff further avers that he but lately learned that the said statements, representations, pretenses, tokens, and promises so by the said defendant made as aforesaid were wholly designedly false and untrue." The declaration further avers that defendant, by means of his fraudulent practices and representations, "did then and there designedly, unlawfully, falsely, and fraudulently deprive him, plaintiff, of said promissory note and the said action at law thereon based, and did further designedly, unlawfully, falsely, and fraudulently deprive him, plaintiff, of all further effort, action, and proceeding to enforce, compel, and collect payment of said indebtedness during the time aforesaid when he, defendant, received and collected the said sum of $12,500 and upwards of his, defendant's, money, and then and there and thereafter by means of said bankruptcy proceeding the said defendant did designedly and intentionally, fraudulently deprive him, said plaintiff, of all action and proceeding to enforce, compel, and collect payment of said indebtedness; wherefore, by reason of the promises, the said plaintiff was cheated and defrauded of said divers large sums of money, and has been damaged in a large sum, to wit, at the county of Wayne aforesaid, to his, the said plaintiff's, damage, $10,000."

Among the causes of demurrer assigned are the following:

"(21) Because the adjudication in bankruptcy of said defendant on October 22d, 1907, and the consequent discharge of defendant's liability to said plaintiff, is pleaded in said declaration.

"(22) Because in so pleading plaintiff admits that his claim, if any, was a provable debt, from which bankruptcy of defendant is a discharge.

"(23) Because it nowhere appears in said declaration that defendant failed to turn over and account to his trustee in bankruptcy all of his assets.

"(24) Because plaintiff himself admits in said declaration that his failure to collect all that was due him from defendant prior to defendant's adjudication and discharge in bankruptcy was due to his own laches.

"(25) Because plaintiff admits in said declaration that the bankruptcy of defendant is a discharge of his alleged claim."

Although the record does not disclose the ground upon which the circuit court sustained the demurrer, plaintiff states such ground in his brief, as follows: "The decision in the lower court was based upon the effect of defendant's discharge in bankruptcy. Had it turned upon any point which would have left defendant in court after amendment, the case would not now be in this court." It is apparent, from the declaration, that plaintiff has never parted with his original cause of action. Whether at the time of surrendering the note he took a new note in its place, as claimed by defendant, does not appear, but, at least, it does appear that he retained his cause of action, and commenced a similar suit to the original suit thereon, and was entitled to and would have proceeded to judgment except for the bankruptcy proceedings. As the defendant admitted the cause of action by scheduling the debt, it is clear that plaintiff suffered no damage by merely surrendering the note. The plaintiff did not lose his cause of action, and have remaining an action of fraud and deceit alone, because of the bankruptcy proceedings. The enforcement of his cause of action was merely transferred to another forum, and the trustee in bankruptcy "is subrogated to the rights of creditors, and may sue to avoid any conveyance which a creditor could have avoided, although more than four months prior to the adjudication of bankruptcy." Collier, Bankruptcy, 6th ed. 612, ¶ 6; Re Mullen (D. C.) 101 Fed. 413; Bush v. Export Storage Co. (C. C.) 136 Fed. 918; Lewis v. Bishop, 47 App. Div. 554, 62 N. Y. Supp. 618; Beasley v. Coggins, 48 Fla. 215, 37 So. 213, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 801. In view of the allegations of the declaration that the defendant is really the owner of much more than sufficient property to satisfy his claim and all other claims which can be collected by the trustee as well as by himself, it is not apparent how the plaintiff has been injuriously affected by the bankruptcy proceedings, or why he could not have collected his claim in full if he had seen fit to file it against the bankrupt's estate. But, however this may be, we are satisfied that the declaration shows an indebtedness or liability provable against the bankrupt's estate, and that therefore the bankrupt's discharge would terminate his liability. United States v. The Rob Roy, 1 Woods, 42, Fed. Cas. No. 16,179; Re Blumberg (D. C.) 94 Fed. 476; Wolf v. Stix, 99 U. S. 1, 25 L. ed. 309; Hennequin v. Clews, 111 U. S. 676, 28 L. ed. 565, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576; Crawford v. Burke, 195 U. S. 176, 49 L. ed. 147, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 9; Tindle v. Birkett, 205 U. S. 183, 51 L. ed. 762, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Collier Bankruptcy, 6th ed. 224; Brown v. Broach, 52 Miss. 536; Bank of North America v. Crandall, 87 Mo. 208; Hatten v. Speyer, 1 Johns. 41. The declaration alleging the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings "and that in due time the said defendant will procure his coveted discharge," we think the case may be considered as though the declaration alleged a discharge.

Since such discharge, in our opinion, would be a bar to the maintenance of the action, the judgment sustaining the demurrer is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

SAMUEL T. HAUSER, JR., et al., Appts,
v.
CITY OF ST. LOUIS.

(96 C. C. A. 82, 170 Fed. 906.)

Deed — heirs — construction.

1. A mere restraint on alienation is not sufficient to cause the word "heirs" in a grant to one and his heirs to be construed as meaning "children," so as to limit the interest of the first taker to a life estate.

Same — fee — limitation of alienation.

2. A limitation upon the power of alienation may be imposed upon a grant of a fee in trust for a married woman.

Same — equitable fee.

3. Under a deed in trust for the sole and separate use of a married woman and her heirs, but not her assigns, she acquires an equitable fee, which, upon the death of her husband, becomes an absolute estate, which she may assign at will.

Note. — Validity of limitation upon power of alienation imposed upon grant or devise of equitable estate to married woman.

Whatever differences of opinion there may be as to whether a restraint upon the power of alienation, imposed by the creator of an absolute equitable estate, generally is void for repugnancy, it is well settled that an exception to the general rule exists in the case of the equitable separate estates of married women.

That a restraint on alienation, or its equivalent, a restraint on anticipation (see Re Currey, L. R. 32 Ch. Div. 361), is in such case valid, has been expressly or impliedly recognized in a considerable number of decisions in the United States, as well as in England. See Lindsay v. Harrison, 8 Ark. 302; Phillips v. Grayson, 23 Ark. 769; Robinson v. Randolph, 21 Fla. 629, 58 Am. Rep. 692; Weeks v. Sego, 9 Ga. 199; Fears v. Brooks, 12 Ga. 195; *Freeman v. APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri, dismissing a bill filed to recover an interest in certain lands to which they allege title as heirs of Ellen Farrar, deceased. Affirmed.

Messrs. Christy M. Farrar and Holmes, Blair, & Koerner, for appellants:

Whenever it plainly appears from a deed that the word "heirs" is used in the sense of "children," it is construed to mean children.

Heriot [1896] A. C. 174; also other cases cited elsewhere throughout this note.

The establishment of the principle seems to have been due rather to a general recognition than to any express adjudication. This was doubtless largely due to the circumstance that its sponsor, Lord Thurlow, at whose instance a sweeping provision against anticipation is said to have been first introduced into marriage settlements, was at the time Lord Chancellor. His lead was followed by his successor, Lord Alvanley, with the result that Lord Eldon, speaking in 1817, said that it was too late to contend against the validity of a clause in restraint of anticipation. See Jackson v. Hobhouse, 2 Meriv. 483.

The argument in its support is stated by Lord Brougham in Woodmeston v. Walker, 2 Russ. & M. 197, as follows: "As the separate estate of the wife was thus the invention of equity, it followed that the same court which invented might mold and modify its own creation in whatever manner it thought fit. It is by force of the donor's intention, to which, in the case of a feme covert, equity gives effect, that, contrary to the rule of law, a married woman is permitted to hold property in this peculiar manner. And it is strictly in accordance with the same principle that equity allows such restrictions to be imposed on the separate interest thus given, as, by qualifying the extent of her dominion over it, may, in the judgment of the settlor or testator, best secure to the object of his bounty the full and uncontrolled enjoyment of the property for her own benefit."

Although some courts seem to entertain the idea that this exception was arbitrarily created for the purpose of effectually protecting the separate estates of married women, the better view is that such exception, so far from being an infringement of the principle that a restraint upon alienation attached to an absolute estate is void for repugnancy, is perfectly consistent with it. And this view has the support of a very discriminating writer, who says: "That doctrine [of the repugnancy of restraints upon alienation] is that it is against public policy to permit restraints to be put upon transfers which the law allows. But the common law does not allow married women to transfer their property. The separate estate which allows a transfer is the creature of equity, and it cannot be deemed against public policy for equity to permit its creation to be molded by a clause against anticipation, for the tendency of such clause is only to put the married woman where the common law has always put her." Gray, Restraints on Alienation, § 269.

The attempt has been made to distinguish the case of real from that of personal estate, on the ground that both the property of a married woman in the latter and her power of disposition over it, being creatures of equity, might, by the same jurisdiction, be modified and restricted to any extent; but that in the case of real estate, which a married woman had power to dispose of by the common law, that power could not be controlled by the terms of the gift, any more than in the case of a male. But the courts have held that although the power of a married woman, independent of the trust for separate use, may be different in relation to real estate from what it is in relation to personal, yet that equity, having created in both a new species of estate, may in both cases modify the incidents of that estate. Baggett v. Meux, 1 Colly. Ch. Cas. 138, affirmed in 1 Phill. Ch. 627; Woodmeston v. Walker, supra.

The doctrine under discussion, which was first recognized in cases involving life estates, was held in Baggett v. Meux, 1 Phill.

A restriction upon the right to alienate an estate conveyed is one not favored by law, and one which cannot be raised by implication, but must be clearly and explicitly set forth.

The heirs or children of a life tenant, without words of inheritance appended, take a remainder in fee.

Messrs. Charles W. Bates and Charles P. Williams for appellee.

Amldon, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought to obtain a decree defining and declaring the rights of complainants to a one-fifth interest in valuable real property situated in the heart of the city of St. Louis. In 1823 this property was owned by William Christy. On the 13th day of October of that year, he and his wife executed the following deed, conveying the same to trustees for the benefit of their daughter:

This deed, made and concluded this 13th day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, between Wm. Christy and Martha Christy, his wife, of North St. Louis, county of St. Louis and state of Missouri, of the first part, and John O'Fallon, of St. Louis aforesaid, and Charles W. Thruston, of Louisville, state of Kentucky, in trust for Ann C. T. Farrar, the wife of Bernard G. Farrar, of the other part.

Witnesseth that the said William Christy and Martha, his wife, for and in consideration of the sum of $800 lawful money of the United States, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the said sum of $800 paid

Ch. 627, to apply equally to an estate in fee, the Lord Chancellor saying: "The object of the doctrine was to give a married woman the enjoyment of property independent of her husband; but to secure that object it was absolutely necessary to restrain her during coverture from alienation. The reasoning evidently applies to a fee as much as to a life estate; to real property as much as to personal."

As applicable to subsequent coverture.

It is no objection to the validity of such a restriction that the woman is unmarried at the time the grant or devise takes effect. Robinson v. Randolph, 21 Fla. 629, 58 Am. Rep. 692; Fears v. Brooks, 12 Ga. 195; Tullett v. Armstrong, 4 Myl. & C. 377, 405, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 215.

But in Pennsylvania no such restriction can be sustained unless there is a marriage in immediate view when the trust is created. Wells v. McCall, 64 Pa. 207; Pickering v. Coates, 10 Phila. 65. This is a result of the peculiar doctrine entertained in that state, that a trust intended for a protection against a coverture is not valid except where in immediate contemplation of marriage; as the restraint on anticipation, being an incident of the equitable separate estate, necessarily stands or falls with it.

Since the operation of the clause against alienation or anticipation, where there is no limitation over, rests entirely on its connection with the coverture, and on its being applied to a species of interest which is itself a creature of equity, its validity is necessarily coterminous with such interest. It therefore follows that it will not be permitted to operate so as to prevent alienation either before coverture or after dis-coverture. Brown v. Pocock, 2 Russ. & M. 210, reversing 2 Myl. & K. 189; Baggett v. Meux, 1 Colly. Ch. Cas. 138, affirmed in 1 Phill. Ch. 627; Jones v. Salter, 2 Russ. & M. 208; Woodmeston v. Walker and Robinson v. Randolph, supra; Brown v. Foote, 2 Tenn. Ch. 255.

In view of the doctrine that a woman, upon becoming discover, might dispose of her separate estate notwithstanding any restriction against anticipation or alienation which may have been imposed upon it, it was at one time contended that her contracting a second marriage was equivalent to a disposal thereof to the second husband, and consequently that such restriction was not operative during the second coverture; but the decisions favoring such view, of which Massey v. Parker, 2 Myl. & K. 174, may be cited as an instance, were subsequently overruled in Tullett v. Armstrong, supra.

That such a provision revives upon subsequent coverture, see also Clark v. Jaques, 1 Beav. 36; Re Gaffee, 1 Macn. & G. 541; Brown v. Foote, supra; Phillips v. Grayson, 23 Ark. 769, overruling dictum to contrary in Lindsay v. Harrison, 8 Ark. 309.

Under the Pennsylvania doctrine relating to the creation of trusts for the separate use of a woman, to which reference has heretofore been made, neither the separate estate nor its incident, the restraint upon alienation, revives upon a second marriage. See Pickering v. Coates, supra.

Effect of enabling acts.

As above pointed out, the provision under discussion owes its validity to the fact that at common law a married woman is not sui juris. It therefore becomes an into them, by the said John O'Fallon and Charles W. Thruston, in trust, as aforesaid, the said William Christy and Martha, his wife, have granted, bargained, and sold, and hereby do grant, bargain, and sell, unto the said John O'Fallon and Charles W. Thruston, in trust for the said Ann C. T. Farrar, now the wife of said Bernard G. Farrar, for her sole, separate, and only use, the following property to wit:

A square of ground on the hill in the addition to the old town of St. Louis laid off by said William Christy of 210 feet French measure in front by 270 American feet back, bounded on the east by a street laid off by said Christy through said addition in its present direction, which passes on the north side of Clamorzan's, now Thomas Brady's, square on the main street, on the west by Sixth street, and on the south by a street parallel to the one passing up by said Brady's square, the lots in said square above sold known on the plan of said addition by Nos. (25, 26, 27, and 28) twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, and twenty-eight.

To have and to hold unto them, the said John O'Fallon and Charles W. Thruston, in trust to and for her, the said Ann C. T. Farrar, the wife of said Bernard G. Farrar, to her sole, separate, and only use, as aforesaid, the aforegranted and bargained premises, together with all and singular the privileges and appurtenances to the same belonging or in any wise appertaining, and to her heirs forever.

It is understood by the said grantors that the above-granted premises are conveyed as aforesaid for the sole and separate use and benefit of the said Ann C. T. Farrar and her heirs, and not to her assigns, and to the use and benefit of no other person whatever, to have, hold, enjoy, or possess any part thereof.

In testimony whereof the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals at St. Louis of the day, month, and year above written.

W. Christy. [Seal.]

Martha Christy. [Seal.]

At the date of this conveyance, Ann C. T. Farrar was the wife of Bernard G. Farrar. In 1847 the trustees, by quitclaim deed, transferred the legal title vested in them to teresting question, but one of which there seems to have been but little discussion, as to the effect upon such validity of the married women's enabling acts of modern times.

In Pacific Nat. Bank v. Windram, 133 Mass. 175, where a woman, after her marriage, being possessed in her own right of personal property, conveyed it to trustees to pay the net income to her during her life, with a provision against anticipation, the court, considering this question, pointed out that the legislation of the state had essentially changed the common-law status of the married woman, especially in respect to her holding separate property, making her a person sui juris, except as to dealings with her husband, and said: "Courts of equity upheld the restraint of alienation in favor of a married woman because of her disability during coverture, and as an incident of the trust estate necessary for her protection. The statutes having removed her disability, and having made unnecessary the creation of a trust estate, the incidents of the trust estate and the equitable rights growing out of it no longer remain in her favor. She is put upon the same footing as if she were a feme sole. She no longer needs any protection against the marital rights of her husband. It is argued that she still needs protection against his persuasion and undue influence. The statutes have made such provisions as were deemed necessary to meet this danger by providing that, upon her application to the supreme judicial court, a trustee may be appointed, and she may thereupon convey her separate estate to the trustee upon such trusts and to such uses as she may declare. Pub. Stat. chap. 147, § 13. For these reasons, we are of opinion that the provision in the indenture of 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

March, 1879, intended to restrain Mrs. Windram's power of alienating the income of the trust fund, is invalid."

In Brown v. Macgill, 87 Md. 161, 30 L.R.A. 806, 67 Am. St. Rep. 334, 39 Atl. 613, it was held that the doctrine under discussion could not be invoked to enable a married woman, or a woman contemplating marriage, to settle her separate property, which would otherwise be liable to her creditors, upon herself in such a way that she could escape the payment of her just debts, notwithstanding the settlement is made a matter of record before the debts are contracted; since this may not be done by one sui juris, and the policy of the state is so radically different in its dealings with married women from what it formerly was, that the reasons for making an exception in their favor are no longer applicable.

In Deering v. Tucker, 55 Me. 284, where a testatrix had devised to her granddaughters certain property, not to be subject to the control of creditors of any husbands they might have, "and this direction not to be altered by any request or consent of either of such granddaughters, thereto," the court, although not explicitly discussing the question whether the enabling acts affected the validity of a limitation upon the power of alienation of the separate estate of a married woman, stated that since the enactment of such legislation, a husband acquires no right by marriage to any property of his wife, and that his joinder and consent is not necessary to her dealing therewith as she sees fit, and said: "If the design of the testatrix was to restrict the rights of the granddaughters in the control and disposition of these estates devised to them in fee, such design would be against law."

Mrs. Farrar, "for her sole, separate, and only use." Mr. Farrar died in the year 1849. On June 4, 1866, Ann C. T. Farrar, then being a widow, conveyed the property in question to the city of St. Louis, by warranty deed, in consideration of the sum of $245,000. The city rests its right to the property upon that grant. The complainants claim as heirs at law of Ellen Farrar, a daughter of Ann C. T. Farrar, being one of five children, the issue of the marriage between Ann C. T. Farrar and Bernard G. Farrar. It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to set forth fully the facts upon which they base their right, nor the peculiar reasons why that right is not barred by the statute of limitations. The bill was dismissed on general demurrer.

The whole controversy turns upon the proper interpretation of the deed above set out in full. The primary object of the grantors was to secure the property to their daughter, free from the marital rights and influence of her husband. That object is conspicuous, not only in the peculiar form of the conveyance, but in all its provisions. The grantors show no solicitude as to the respective rights of their daughter and her children. Their concern was to protect the property against the rights and solicitations of Bernard G. Farrar. Every term of the deed should be interpreted in the light of this primary purpose.

By the first paragraph of the habendum clause an equitable estate in fee is granted to Ann C. T. Farrar and her heirs, forever. The next paragraph, however, says: "It is understood by the said grantors that the above-granted premises are conveyed as aforesaid for the sole and separate use and benefit of the said Ann C. T. Farrar, and her heirs, and not to her assigns, and to the use and benefit of no other person whatsoever, to have, hold, enjoy, or possess any part thereof."

Seizing upon the phrase that the grant is not to the assigns of the grantee, counsel for the complainants make the following argument: They say, first, that, because the grant does not extend to the assigns of the grantee, it is impossible that she should take a fee in the property; hence they say that Ann C. T. Farrar took only a life estate. To support such a contention it is necessary to get rid of the words "heirs forever" in the paragraph preceding. This is accomplished by the familiar doctrine that the word "heirs" will be construed in a popular sense as meaning "children," when the entire grant shows clearly that such a meaning was in the mind of the grantor; and it is insisted that such a meaning in the present grant follows as a necessary conclusion from the restriction as to "assigns." The effect of the deed as thus interpreted is to convey to Ann C. T. Farrar a life estate in the property, with a remainder to her children then in being, opening, however, to let in after-born children, under the rule applied and explained by the supreme court of Missouri in Kinney v. Mathews, 69 Mo. 520.

This argument is based upon two fundamental fallacies: First, it is urged that the equitable fee granted to Mrs. Farrar is, by a proper interpretation of the deed, cut down to a life estate by the restraint upon her alienation of the property, and that the word "heirs" for this reason should be interpreted to mean "children." So far as we are aware, a restraint upon alienation alone has never been held to show clearly that a grantor used the term "heirs" as meaning "children." All the authorities agree that in order to justify such an interpretation the intent of the grantor must be clear. McDowell v. Brown, 21 Mo. 60; Allen v. Craft, 109 Ind. 476, 58 Am. Rep. 425, 9 N. E. 919; Roth v. Rauschenbusch, 173 Mo. 584, 61 L.R.A. 455, 73 S. W. 664. No case has been brought to our notice, nor have we been able to discover any case, in which a restraint upon alienation alone has been held to show that the grantor used the terms "heirs" other than according to its recognized legal meaning. In all the decisions brought to our notice by counsel for complainants, the restraint upon alienation was coupled with other language in the deed, evidencing the intent. It was a cardinal rule of the common law that the grant of a fee, coupled with a restraint against all alienation of the property, did not limit the fee; but the restraint was held to be repugnant to the grant, and for that reason was rejected as of no force. 4 Kent, Com. 131; Potter v. Couch, 141 U. S. 296, 315, 35 L. ed. 721, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1005. If such an interpretation were necessary in the present case, we should not feel the slightest hesitancy in applying the rule, and treating the restraint upon alienation as void.

Second. But no such interpretation is necessary. The limitation of the power of alienation, even when a fee is granted, has no application to estates in trust for the benefit of married women. This exception was found necessary in order to protect the rights of married women during coverture. It was at first held that restraints upon alienation, when married women were given the equitable ownership of property, were void, the same as in the case of legal estates. This, however, resulted in defeating the whole object underlying such separate estates. The subject is clearly explained by Lord Cottenham in Tullett v. Armstrong, 4 Myl. & C. 377, 405, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 215, as follows: "When this court first established the separate estate, it violated the laws of property as between husband and wife; but it was thought beneficial, and it prevailed. It being once settled that a wife might enjoy separate estate as a feme sole, the laws of property attached to this new estate; and it was found, as part of such law, that the power of alienation belonged to the wife, and was destructive of the security intended for it. Equity again interfered, and, by another violation of the laws of property, supported the validity of the prohibition against alienation."

See also 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. pt. 2, p. 713, note.

The whole doctrine of the separate estate of married women is equitable, and the ancient common-law rules of property are applied to it only in so far as they are compatible with the object which courts of equity sought to attain in the creation of such separate estates. Mr. Pomeroy, after fully explaining the subject in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (§§ 1107 et seq.), says: "The subject-matter on which the restraining clause is to operate may be any kind of property, real or personal, and any estate therein, absolute, for life, or for years." § 1108.

Prof. Gray, in his work on Restraints on Alienation, says, at § 125: "There is one exception to the invalidity of restraints on the alienation of fees, or absolute interests. When, in the case of married women, the doctrines of separate use and restraint upon anticipation came into existence, the interests alienation of which it was sought to restrain were life interests. It was only in Baggett v. Meux (1844) 1 Colly. Ch. Cas. 138, that the question as to the validity of a clause against anticipation upon a gift of an absolute interest came up. In this case the legal estate in land was devised to a married woman, in fee, for her separate use, with a direction that she should not sell or encumber it. She did encumber it. Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce held that a restraint on anticipation was equally valid upon a fee simple as upon a life estate, and that the encumbrance was void. The decision was confirmed by Lord Lyndhurst, C., s. c. 1 Phill. Ch. 627."

See also Tiffany, Real Prop. p. 1138; Perry, Tr. 5th ed. § 671; Brown v. Foote, 2 Tenn. Ch. 255, 259.

In speaking of a devise of a fee, coupled with an absolute restriction upon alienation during coverture, the court says in Robinson v. Randolph, 21 Fla. 629, 58 Am. Rep. 692: "The court of equity having created such estate, it was held that it could modify its creature by annexing to it the restraining feature."

of complainants' argument is swept away. The deed being a grant for the benefit of a married woman, an absolute restraint upon her alienation of the property during coverture was entirely consistent with her taking an equitable fee to the property, which, upon the death of her husband, became an absolute estate, free from the restriction; for it is well settled that the trust continues only during the marriage relation. Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 1109. Upon its termination, the wife became vested with all the powers over the property possessed by a feme sole. The deed of Mrs. Farrar, therefore, after the death of her husband, passed the entire estate to the defendant.

It is urged, however, that the exclusion of "assigns" should be interpreted as a limitation upon the quantum of the estate, instead of a restriction upon the grantee's power of alienation. But why should such an interpretation be adopted? There is nothing in the deed supporting it, and it is out of harmony with the primary purpose which caused the conveyance of the property to trustees. It may be conceded that the deed is not drawn with legal accuracy; but it seems to us that the general purpose of the grantors is not open to doubt. They were apprehensive that the provision which they were making for their daughter would, in some way, be lost through the improvidence or solicitation of her husband. The whole last paragraph of the deed seems to us to be simply the language of a layman seeking to emphasize that purpose. It may be that there was also in the minds of the grantors a desire that the property should continue for all time to be the family seat. If that was in fact an end desired, its accomplishment would cause such a restriction upon the power of alienation as the law could not sustain. Again, if we should interpret the word "heirs" in the deed as meaning "children," then it would contain no general words of inheritance. The result would be, as counsel for complainants says, that Mrs. Farrar would take an equitable estate for life, with a legal remainder to her children. Their estate, however, would also be for life, as the change of "heirs" to "children" would leave no words of general succession. As a result, upon the death of Mrs. Farrar's children, the estate would then revert to the grantors, or their heirs. Such a result, it is conceded by both parties, was never in the contemplation of the grantors. A fair interpretation of the last paragraph of the deed seems to us simply to limit Mrs. Farrar's power of alienation during her coverture.

The decree must therefore be affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.
(Division No. 1.)

MICHAEL OHLMAN, Appt.,
v.
CLARKSON SAWMILL COMPANY et al.,
Respts.

(222 Mo. 62, 120 S. W. 1155.)

Nickname — tax proceeding — validity.

No valid judgment can be entered in a proceeding to enforce unpaid taxes against one whose Christian name is Michael, upon a constructive service of process against him by the name of Mike, where there is nothing to show that he ever answered to or tolerated such name.

(July 1, 1909.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Reynolds County in defendant's, Clarkson Sawmill Company's, favor in a suit to quiet title to certain lands. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. I. January, Arthur T. Brewster, and Samuel M. Brewster, for appellant:

The court did not have jurisdiction to render judgment for taxes against the land of Michael Ohlman on an order of publication giving constructive notice to "Mike Ohlman."

Messrs. Dinning & Dinning, for respondents:

The suit for taxes brought against Mike Ohlman gave the court jurisdiction against Michael Ohlman, to render a judgment for taxes against land the title to which stood in Michael Ohlman.

Lamm, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit under § 650, Rev. Stat. 1899 (page 667, Anno. Stat. 1906). Plaintiff, a resident of Illinois, sues the Clarkson Sawmill Company (joining divers other parties as codefendants) in the Reynolds circuit court to quiet title to S. $\frac{1}{4}$ Sec. 35, Twp. 32, range 2,—the sawmill company alone making defense. Judgment went in favor of that defendant on the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section, and, as to the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, dismissing the cause. Plaintiff comes here.

The petition alleges, inter alia, that the sawmill company claims under a quitclaim deed from certain Cartys and others. The answer of that company was a general denial, barring an admission that it held an adverse claim to the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and an allegation that it owned the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ by a fee-simple title. It pleads a misjoinder of causes of action, admits the quitclaim deed by the Cartys, but denies it makes any claim to the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ under that deed.

Plaintiff introduced a patent from the United States to the S. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 35 of date September 1, 1859, recorded December 7, 1866. This patent runs to "Michael Ohlman."

Defendant, over objection and exceptions saved, introduced a tax deed from Harrison, sheriff of Reynolds county, dated May 29, 1879, purporting to convey the S. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 35 to G. J. Carty.

Sundry objections were made below to this tax deed, and are now pressed. But unless it is necessary to develop and determine

Note.—It appears that the above case presents for the first time the question of the validity of a judgment based upon the publication of process in which the defendant was designated not by his Christian name, but by a nickname. The decision is clearly right, for no one should be held responsible for the fact that others, no matter how numerous, may have so designated him, unless it further appears that in his business transactions he has adopted and made use of such name.

Upon the question of the use of initials instead of Christian name in publication of process, see note to Butler v. Smith, post, 436.

As to whether publication of process under wrong name may be held good on the doctrine of idem sonans, see note to Schoenfeld v. Bourne, post, —.

As to the admission of the Christian name in the publication of process, see note to Whitney v. Masemore, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 676.

other phases of the case, we need heed but one, viz., that the deed does not purport to convey the title of Michael Ohlman, patentee, but runs against the title of "Mike Ohlman." Carty's bid was $16 for the half section, and the land was knocked down to him for that sum. Whether this sheriff's deed was put of record does not appear.

Supplementing that deed with evidence that certain Cartys and others were the sole heirs of G. J. Carty, the sawmill company introduced a quitclaim deed of date September 5, 1903, conveying to it the title of said heirs in the locus.

Thereupon plaintiff read into the record the petition, authenticated tax bill made a part thereof, order of publication, and judgment in the tax suit,—from all which it appears that the suit was instituted in 1878 in the name of the state, to the use of Carter, collector of revenue in Reynolds county, against "Mike Ohlman" as owner of a certain 960 acres of land, including said S. $\frac{1}{2}$, for delinquent taxes; that the back tax bill certified the owner's name to be "Mike Ohlman," and that the order of publication ran against "Mike Ohlman" as a nonresident. The judgment followed the petition, back tax bill, and order of publication in that particular.

No possession is alleged or proved by either side.

Waiving, for the present, all other questions raised on the record (some of them of no little gravity), we confront the first, viz.: Did Michael Ohlman's title as patentee pass by a sheriff's deed purporting to convey the title of "Mike Ohlman," when the deed is based on a judgment for taxes on constructive service, with no appearance by defendant; the petition, order of publication, and judgment describing the owner as "Mike Ohlman?"

(a) The question goes to jurisdiction and due process of law. No man may judicially lose his property without his day in court. A day in court proceeds on notice. So, due process of law and jurisdiction depend on notice. By Rev. Stat. 1899, § 9303 (Anno. Stat. 1906, p. 4274), it is ordained that tax suits shall be brought "against the owner of the property." By this is meant the record owner, unless the fact is known, or the purchaser have notice, that the record owner is not the true owner. When summons is actually served on the right individual by the wrong name, the error becomes immaterial, because he has notice of the suit, and may appear if he choose and plead a misnomer. But, absent actual notice, when the law, for convenience, substitutes a constructive notice, the name of the individual defendant obviously becomes one of the essentials and of the very life of the notice.

"Names are like definitions in mathematics, though less exact," says Woodward, J., in Jones's Estate, 27 Pa., loc. cit. 338. "The use of names [he continues] is to describe the individual of whom we speak, so as to distinguish him from all other persons."

(b) There will be found a variety of cases decided by us, giving voice to the gravity and significance of accuracy in the use of the Christian name of a defendant where his land is sought to be taken from him through jurisdiction acquired in a suit by constructive notice. Thus, the settled doctrine has come to be that the use of the initials of the Christian name is not sufficiently accurate for such purpose. Gillingham v. Brown, 187 Mo. 181, 85 S. W. 1113; Evarts v. Missouri Lumber & Min. Co. 193 Mo. loc. cit. 449 et seq. 92 S. W. 372; Burkham v. Manewal, 195 Mo. 506, 94 S. W. 520 et seq., and cases cited. The rule is relaxed where estoppel has play; for instance, where the record title was taken by the owner in the initials of his Christian name, and he was served by such initials. Elting v. Gould, 96 Mo. 541, 9 S. W. 922. There is a case (Mosely v. Reily, 126 Mo. 124, 26 L.R.A. 721, 28 S. W. 895) seemingly holding against the general rule, but that case itself was finally sustained only on the theory of estoppel (Turner v. Gregory, 151 Mo. loc. cit. 106, 52 S. W. 234). Use of initials in procuring a license to marry, and in being married in accordance with the license, was held to create an estoppel, so that a judgment of divorce granted against defendant on publication, identifying him by his initials, was held valid. McDermott v. Gray, 198 Mo. 266, 95 S. W. 431.

There is a line of cases holding that the law recognizes only one Christian name, and that some freedom may be taken with the initial of a middle name. Howard v. Brown, 197 Mo. 46, 95 S. W. 101 et seq.; Morrison v. Turnbaugh, 192 Mo. loc. cit. 445, 91 S. W. 152 et seq. But in the last case the true name of the defendant appeared in the petition, the affidavit for an order of publication, and the order itself. The trouble arose by clerical slip in the judgment. In the Howard Case, where the defendant's name was Henry "P. P." Brown, and he was sued as Henry "T." Brown, significance was given to the fact that his name was grouped with his mother, his sisters, and his nephews, comprising the immediate Brown family to which he belonged, thus identifying him in that way. These cases in no wise militate against the rule that in notice by publication the defendant should be accurately designated by his true name.

If the law tolerated slovenliness or pranks in this regard, then slovenliness and pranks might ripen into a custom, and open the door to great mischief. Constructive service at best is harsh. It is service, not in substance and fact, but of a sort to which the name of service is attached from necessity. That method of service, being highly technical, must be strictly pursued. Thus it was said in the Turner Case, supra: "Where resort is had to this method, a substantial, even rigid, observance of the law is required, otherwise the judgment will be void [citing cases]." And in the Morrison Case, supra, it was held that "constructive service must be viewed critically in order to prevent, so far as can be, irreparable injury." And this rule of strictness was applied in each case directly to the use of the true name of the defendant.

The Turner Case has met the approval of this court many times. It is a landmark in the law, and establishes the proposition that in constructive service the real record name of the landowner, the name in which he took title (as distinguished from the colloquial name he was known by in the neighborhood of the land, and to which he answered among those who knew him), should be used in designating him in an order of publication in a tax suit. Turner's record name was Singleton V. Turner. By that name he was designated in the deed by which he took title, his name appearing there no less than four times. Though grantee, he signed that deed by that name. The "V." in his name stood for "Vaughn." While a resident of Missouri he lived in Holden, say 15 miles from the land. In Holden he was usually called "Vaughn Turner." He went by that name in the neighborhood of the land. He was known as Vaughn from his youth up. When he went to California and took up a residence there, he continued to be called Vaughn. He was sued for taxes as "Vaughn Turner." That name runs through the whole record-petition, order of publication, judgment, and deed. In business transactions he usually signed his name "S. V. Turner." It was held that the deed was void, and that ruling and the reason underlying it apply vehemently to the case at bar.

(c) We are cited to many cases by counsel for defendant in which the right party has been sued and served with process, but in which profert has been made of some document signed with an abbreviated name, or in which it has been urged there was a variance between the proof and allegation, arising from misnomer, etc. But none of those cases touch the vital point of jurisdiction and due process of law. For instance:

The contention was the contract called for one signed by John McMickle. It was ruled that McMickle might be bound under a note signed as Mickle, but that defendant had no right to impose on plaintiff the risk of proving that "Mickle" was intended for "McMickle." In discussing the case, it was held that abbreviations of men's given names are so common that, without any violation of the laws of the land, the courts may take judicial notice of them. It will be seen that the question in that case arose on the sufficiency of the evidence to identify the subject-matter of the contract.

In Weaver v. McElhenon, 13 Mo. 89, the suit was on a note, and defendant was sued by his true Christian name, "Christopher." But the note was set forth in the petition, and it was signed "Christy" or "Christ" McElhenon. The defendant demurred. It was ruled that the defect, if any, could not be reached by demurrer, but by a motion to exclude the note as evidence on account of variance. The court also ruled that the signature to the note was a well-known abbreviation of Christopher, and the logic of the ruling was simply that Christopher, if he liked, could dub himself "Christy" or "Christ," and by signing his name that way bind himself on a note when impleaded under the name of "Christopher."

In Moseley v. Mastin, 37 Ala. 216, an abbreviation, "adm'r" was used in the complaint. Exception was taken to that, and the court held "adm'r" meant "administrator."

In Goodell v. Hall, 112 Ga. 436, 37 S. E. 725, it was ruled that "judicial notice will be taken of the ordinary and commonly used abbreviations and equivalents of Christian names." That language must be read with the case, viz., Eliza M. Hall held title to certain land. She made application under the Georgia statute to have it set apart as a homestead, signing the application "Elizabeth M. Hall." Subsequently she mortgaged the land as "Eliza M. Hall." The mortgage being foreclosed, she made claim that her homestead was not subject to mortgage. This, because her application to have it set apart as a homestead had been sustained. In offering the application in evidence, it was objected to because made by "Elizabeth M. Hall." The court ruled that "Eliza" was an abbreviation of "Elizabeth," and, if not so, that at least parol evidence was admissible (and was admitted) to show the identity of "Elizabeth M." with "Eliza M."

In Jones's Estate, 27 Pa. 336, supra, a judgment was recovered against Abel Jones. It was entered on the lien docket against "A. Jones." Other judgments were obtained against Jones, and entered on the lien docket. The real estate of Abel Jones was sold at sheriff's sale, and, on making distribution between judgment creditors, the auditor disallowed the judgment entered on the lien docket in the name of "A. Jones." Proof was made that Abel Jones signed his name in no other way but "A. Jones," and that there was no other Abel or A. Jones in the county. It was ruled on appeal that the object of the docket entry was to give the public notice who was bound, and that the entry was sufficient.

In Rupert v. Penner, 35 Neb. 587, 17 L.R.A. 824, 53 N. W. 598, the proposition was announced that a deed correctly describing the grantor as "Archibald T. Finn," with an acknowledgment designating the grantor as "Archibald T. Finn," and identifying him as known to the officer to be the person whose name is affixed to the instrument and who executed the same, and which deed was signed "Arch T. Finn," was sufficient to convey the title of Archibald T. The question arose over the admission of the deed in evidence. See, in this connection, Houx v. Batteén, 68 Mo. 84.

McGregor v. Balch, 17 Vt. 567, was a scire facias upon a recognizance. The defendant pleaded nul tiel record. At the trial plaintiff gave in evidence a record of the recognizance, in which Balch's Christian name is set forth as "Barney D." Objection was made to this evidence. The court ruled that there was no controversy but that "Barney" and "Barnabas" are used for the same name, and that, as defendant was known by the name of "Barney" as well as "Barnabas," the objection was properly overruled.

In Sparks v. Sparks, 51 Kan. 195, 32 Pac. 892, a question arose on a motion to quash a deposition. The notice to take specified the place as the office of "Dan Ray." The deposition was actually taken at the office of Daniel E. Wray. Wray was identified in the notice as an "attorney at law of Versailles, Mo." There was no claim made there was any other person of that name or sounding like his in that place, or that the parties were misled. In view of that fact, and of the further fact that "Dan" is an abbreviation of "Daniel," and that "Ray" and "Wray" are idem sonans, a motion to quash was held properly overruled.

Other cases cited are of a similar character, and none go to the point of due process of law or jurisdiction, or in any wise impugn the reasoning of Turner v. Gregory.

(d) We cannot find it ever ruled by any respectable court that "Mike" is a universally known abbreviation of "Michael." We are asked to take judicial cognizance that it is a universally recognized equivalent of that name. We decline to do so. It is sometimes used flippantly to designate anyone, as in the colloquialism, "Sure, Mike," or in the other, "Are you Mike?" or "You think you're Mike." But this figurative and slangy use is too broad, and proves too much.

We are of the notion there is something Celtic about "Mike,"—a tang or flavor of the old sod,—and that its usage among Teutons is either malapropos, mythical, or scant. The name "Michael Ohlman" is self-evidently German, and we have no call to judicially determine "Mike" as applicable to a nationality not shown to have adopted its use at the fireside as part of the mother tongue.

In this connection it is not without some appreciable weight that there is no evidence tending to show that Ohlman was known as "Mike" where he lived in Illinois, or in Missouri, where his land lay, or that he answered to that name or tolerated such easy familiarity. So far as we can see, it is left to the tax officers and circuit court of Reynolds county to be the first to joke or trifle with his name; this, too, when engaged in enforcing tax laws, serving him with summons, and solemnly enforcing the state's lien, and separating him from the ownership of his estate (no joking matter, withal), and when the records of Reynolds county showed his title was got and held in the name of "Michael."

(e) Michael is a baptismal name, sacred in meaning and hallowed by sacred legends; witness Saint Michael, Michaelmas, or the great archangel whose prowess is vouched for in accredited annals of those dim wars seen by the mind's eye of the blind Milton, in which the Great Enemy of Mankind, thrust forth by his sword, pitched headlong flaming, so that (as the record runs):

"From morn
To noon he fell, from noon to dewy eve,
A summer's day; and with the setting sun
Dropp'd from the zenith, like a falling star."

Messrs. J. F. Green and W. A. Meserve, "It ill becomes the law, moving with dignity and venerating sacredness, to deal in flippant vein with such a name as Michael, literally, in Hebrew, "Who is like God."

If we were to hold that an order of publication might deal with those abbreviations in names commonly known to all men, yet "Mike" is not an abbreviation of Michael, any more than of Micah, Micaiah, Micha, Michah, Michaiah, Michal, or others mentionable. But "Mike" is not an abbreviation at all, accurately speaking. It is to all intents and purposes a mere diminutive, a nickname,—a corruption. Now, nicknames are in a sense nicked names,—names that are snipped, whittled off. They are names given in contempt, derision, or sportive familiarity,—a familiar or opprobrious appellation. Webster's International Dict. title "Nickname." As such appellations they have no place in those judicial publications of notice by which courts acquire jurisdiction. Otherwise we would have Amelia Jones notified by an order of publication directed to "Sis" Jones; or William Brown under the title of "Bub" or "Bill" or "Buck" Brown; or, if the hypothesis be indulged that the master sculptor and painter were alive and so fortunate as to own real estate in Missouri, he would be brought in under the name of "Mike" Angelo; or Winfield Scott (in like hypothesis) under the name of "Fuss-and-Feathers" or "Hasty-Plate-of Soup Scott; or Thomas H. Benton as "Old Bullion" Benton.

But we have pursued the matter far. We think the deed was void, because the Reynolds circuit court never acquired jurisdiction over Michael Ohlman. This view of the matter precludes the necessity of considering other questions made.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment in favor of plaintiff, adjudging title in him to all the land in his patent.

All concur.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

MARY BUTLER, Appt.,

v.

SUSIE M. SMITH, Exrx., etc., of Banks
M. Smith, Deceased, et al.

(84 Neb. 78, 120 N. W. 1106.)

Writ — substituted service — legal name.

1. For the purpose of giving constructive notice to a defendant in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, where he is not sued on a written instrument signed by himself, his legal name includes his first Christian name and surname.

Same — initials — sufficiency.

2. Foreclosure of a mortgage does not divest the title of a nonresident defendant who was sued by the initial letters of his name, there being no personal service of summons upon him or appearance in his behalf, and the record showing that he did not sign the mortgage or the note secured thereby.

Adverse possession — suspension — ejectment action — amendment — effect.

3. Service of summons in ejectment arrests the running of the statute of limitations in favor of a defendant who claims title by adverse possession, though the form of action is subsequently changed, by amendment of plaintiff's petition, to a suit to redeem.

Same — unimproved and unoccupied land — presumption as to possession.

4. Unimproved and unoccupied land is deemed to be in possession of the holder of the legal title.

Same — establishment of title — elements.

5. Title by adverse possession is not established, unless the proof shows actual, exclusive, and continuous possession under claim of ownership for the full statutory period of ten years

Note. — Use of initials instead of Christian name in publication of process.

It is clear that when a defendant is not correctly named in the process, or his Christian name is represented by initials only, and service of the writ is actually made on the person intended, he is thereby informed that he is the person meant, and, unless he appears and takes advantage of the misnomer or defect by plea in abatement, the judgment by default, rendered thereupon, will not be void. 20 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1131.

But a distinction exists between such a case and a case where the only notice is by publication, and no appearance is made. While the service of the writ in the former case is a demonstration that the person upon whom it is served is the person intended to be sued, in the latter case, notice by publication is a proceeding against the name, and to give such notice as the service of the writ imparts, the name should be fully and correctly set forth, and if it is not so set forth, it is ineffectual as a notice. It would seem that a publication of process against J. Adam would impart the same notice to Jacob, James, John, Jane, or Julia Adam: but it would not impart to any one of them notice of the fact that he or she was the J. Adam intended, while the actual service of such process upon any one of them would inform him that he was the J. Adam against whom it was directed.

In Herbage v. McKee, 82 Neb. 354, 117 N. W. 706, it was conceded by counsel that a foreclosure decree was void as to defendants served by publication, and described by the initial letters of their names.

In Steinmann v. Strimple, 29 Mo. App. 478, it was held that an order of publication in an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien, naming defendant as "J. Strimple," was void as to Joab Strimple.

In Hirsh v. Weisberger, 44 Mo. App. 506, where it appeared that, in an action in attachment by a nonresident, the case proceeded in the ordinary course to a judgment by default and final judgment, after publication of notice against "A. Weisberger," it was held that the court properly granted his petition to set aside the judgment, and reinstate the cause for further proceedings, upon the ground that the order of publica-

And in Elting v. Gould, 96 Mo. 535, 9 S. Rose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The subject-matter of litigation in this suit is 640 acres of land in Knox county. Both parties claim title. When Clement L. Boon was the undisputed owner, he conveyed the land and 100 acres more to Ellis W. Wall, January 1, 1890. Eight days later, the grantee and his wife mortgaged the entire tract of 800 acres to Pierce, Wright, & Company for $2,850, and by deed dated January 11, 1890, reconveyed it to Boon, subject to the encumbrance thus created. Boon did not pay the taxes, interest, or the mortgage, but left the state a year or two later, and never returned. September 28, 1903, Boon executed and delivered to Paul Butler a quitclaim deed to the premises, and the latter's interest was transferred to plaintiff, March 7, 1904. In the meantime, Henry H. Drake became the owner of the mortgage, brought suit March 1, 1894, to foreclose his lien, procured a decree of foreclosure, bought the land August 18, 1894, at judicial sale thereunder, which was confirmed September 25, 1894, and received, April 27, 1895, a held that although the property was assessed on the tax rolls to Joseph G. Thorpe, a published summons running to J. G. Thorpe was sufficient. This was based upon the ground that the proceedings were in rem against the land, not against the person of the owner, and that the evidence showed that he was commonly known by the latter name.

In the first two cases cited in the note to Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hasenwinkle, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 129 (upon the question of summons or notice to a person by wrong initial), it appeared that service was had by publication in which merely the initial letters of the Christian names were used, but that these initials appeared in an inverse or improper order, for which reason the notices were held ineffectual. In each case the court expressly said it was not called upon to determine the sufficiency of a notice which contains only the initial letter of the Christian name.

As to the omission of the Christian name in the publication of process, see note to Whitney v. Masemore, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 676.

As to the use of a nickname in the publication of process, see Ohlman v. Clarkson Sawmill Co. ante, 432.

sheriff's deed to the entire tract of 800 acres. Through mesne conveyances from Drake, defendants claim title to the 640 acres in controversy, and are now in possession thereof. Plaintiff instituted a suit in ejectment against them March 11, 1905, for the realty in dispute. In their answer defendants pleaded the mortgage described, an assignment to Drake, nonpayment, foreclosure, a judicial sale, the sheriff's deed, title in themselves through mesne conveyances from Drake, and adverse possession for ten years. After the court acquired jurisdiction in the ejectment suit, plaintiff was permitted to amend her petition by changing the form of action to a suit to redeem the land, and to require defendants to account for rents and profits. If plaintiff has any right to redeem, it rests on the quitclaim deed from Boon and the conveyance from Boon's grantee to plaintiff. Defendants have no title, unless it is derived from the sheriff's deed to Drake, or acquired by adverse possession. The trial resulted in a decree for defendants. The suit was dismissed, and plaintiff appeals.

The trial court held that Boon's title was divested and the right to redeem terminated by the foreclosure of the mortgage. Plaintiff insists that this holding was erroneous, and that the foreclosure proceedings were void for the following reasons: Boon did not sign the mortgage or the notes secured. He was sued by the initial letters of his name. There was no notice except by publication. The verification in Drake's petition did not state that he could not discover Boon's true name, and neither the summons nor notice contained the words "real name unknown," as required by § 148 of the Code. The title to the land described in Drake's petition stood on the public records in the name of Clement L. Boon. On these facts, plaintiff argues that the district court had no jurisdiction to bar her equity of redemption, and that the sheriff's deed was void. In an effort to meet this attack on the foreclosure proceedings, defendants adduced proof in the present case to show that in the name of "C. L. Boon" he transacted business, accepted deeds, transferred realty, and acted in the capacity of deputy county clerk and of notary public. It is insisted by defendants that these facts show that he was sued by his true name. They have argued this point at some length, and have referred to a number of cases in support of their contention. Their view of the law, however, cannot be accepted as applicable to the present controversy. Statutes creating a method for bringing a defendant into court without personal service are strictly construed, where actual notice may never reach him. Stull v. Masionka, 74 Neb. 322, 104 N. W. 188, 108 N. W. 166. For the purpose of constructive notice under the statutes of this state, in a case where defendant is not sued on a written instrument signed by himself, the legal name of a defendant includes his first Christian name and surname or patronymic. Enewold v. Olsen, 39 Neb. 59, 22 L.R.A. 573, 42 Am. St. Rep. 557, 57 N. W. 765. Not having been so described as a defendant, Boon's title was not divested by the foreclosure proceedings, since he was not personally served with notice, did not appear in the case, and did not sign the mortgage or notes secured by the name of C. L. Boon or by any other name. Herbage v. McKee, 82 Neb. 354, 117 N. W. 706; Enewold v. Olsen, supra. The law required personal service when Boon was not sued by his true name. He was protected by that law. The fatal defect deprived the court of jurisdiction to bar his right of redemption. In the present suit, the law was not abrogated nor jurisdiction restored in the foreclosure proceeding by proof that Drake sued him by the initial letters used by himself, and by which he was known in the community. It follows that the title of defendants fails in so far as it rests on the sheriff's deed to Drake.

Plaintiff also complains of the trial court's ruling that defendants have title to the land by adverse possession. The objection to this finding is that there is no evidence to support it. Plaintiff commenced her action in ejectment March 11, 1905. Summons was issued the same day and afterward returned with the appearance of each of the defendants indorsed thereon. She takes the position that the running of the statute of limitations against her cause of action was arrested March 11, 1905, when the summons was issued. Defendants insist that the ejectment suit was abandoned, and, by reason thereof, the statute of limitations continued to run until her action to redeem was barred at a later date. The question thus presented is not an open one in this state. Under both petitions, plaintiff asked the court to protect her title, and the changing of the form of action did not delay the assertion of her rights until she filed in the ejectment suit her amended petition to redeem the land. Defendants having waived service of summons in ejectment, the running of the statute of limitations was arrested when it was issued, March 11, 1905. In McKeighan v. Hopkins, 19 Neb. 33, 26 N. W. 614, plaintiff, by amendment of his petition, changed the form of his action from ejectment to a suit to redeem; and this court, in an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Maxwell, held that the statute of limitations ceased to run from the date of the summons in ejectment, saying: "The plaintiff sought in the original petition to recover the land, because he was the owner thereof; and in the amended petition, filed by him by leave of court, he seeks to recover the land in question upon the ground that he is the owner of the same, but, while asking equity, he offers to do equity by paying the defendant all valid claims held by him against the land. The cause of action is the same, although the relief is sought in a different manner from that in the first petition. This, however, does not change the cause of action, and the statute of limitation ceased to run when the summons which was served on him was issued."

To establish title by adverse possession, it was therefore necessary for defendants to show that Drake took actual and exclusive possession of the premises as early as March 11, 1895. Clark v. Hannafeldt, 79 Neb. 586, 113 N. W. 135. Drake's action in attempting to enforce his mortgage against the real estate was inconsistent with his claim of title by adverse possession. McKeighan v. Hopkins, supra. He received the sheriff's deed through which defendants claim title as late as April 27, 1895, and ten years had not elapsed March 11, 1905, when plaintiff's ejectment suit arrested the running of the statute of limitations. There is evidence that Drake and his grantees did not have exclusive occupancy for the statutory period; that the land was never cultivated after 1890; and that it was open territory or commons where cattle ran at large as late as May 24, 1895. Unimproved and unoccupied land is presumed to be in possession of the person holding the legal title. Herbage v. McKee, supra; Yorgensen v. Yorgensen, 6 Neb. 384; Troxell v. Johnson, 52 Neb. 46, 71 N. W. 968. There is no pretense that Drake ever made a personal effort to take possession of the premises. Defendants rely chiefly on the testimony of E. D. Wigton to establish title by adverse possession. Wigton lived in Sioux City, Iowa, and was Drake's attorney. For a time John Green was lessee and Robert Peyton was local agent under Wigton's directions. Wigton testified that he came over from Iowa, and went out to the land in the summer or fall of 1893. When asked what he did upon that occasion with reference to taking possession, he answered: "I viewed the land, and it was particularly pointed out to me by a Mr. Green, who had been using it for grazing purposes; and I informed Mr. Green that I represented the man who held the mortgage against the land, and that the interest on the mortgage and taxes were delinquent, and that I had charge of the land for my client, and instructed him that the rents hereafter would be payable to my client; Mr. Boon and Mr. Wall both being out of the country, and unable to reach them by any usual process."

Wigton further stated that on behalf of

Drake he declared himself to be in possession of all the land described in the mortgage, and claimed the same against all the world; that he actually took possession openly and notoriously under claim of ownership; that Green was pasturing the land at the time, and was instructed to make settlement with Peyton; and that Green agreed to recognize Drake as landlord. Wigton also testified that he afterward saw the land on two different occasions. Green stated that he never rented the land from Wigton, and never paid any rent except to Peyton. Peyton said he never leased the land to anyone before May 24, 1895, and that the first rent received was for the period between May 24, 1895, and January 1, 1896. The lease is in the record. It is dated May 24, 1895, expired January 1, 1896, and is signed by Green and Peyton. In a letter dated May 17, 1895, Wigton wrote Peyton as follows: "We have arranged to take legal steps, if necessary, to disabuse Mr. Green of his idea in regard to control of the land. . . . It might be Green would rent land, but he must first get the idea of his right to the land out of his head." In a letter dated May 22, 1895, Wigton wrote Peyton further: "You may rent the land to Green for pasturage for $40 cash, lease to run to January 1, 1896. Sign lease 'Henry H. Drake' by you as agent, and have it distinctly understood therein that Green acknowledges Drake's ownership, and that he will give possession without further trouble January 1. Green's claim to the land is entirely without foundation, even if he had rented it from some other party, as the sheriff's deed entitled Drake to possession." Wigton's testimony that he viewed the land, and his conclusion that he took possession for Drake, when considered with his letters and the entire record, fail to show actual and exclusive possession under claim of ownership prior to May 24, 1895. From that date ten years did not elapse before plaintiff brought her ejectment suit, March 11, 1905. Defendants' testimony has been carefully considered, and is found to be wholly insufficient to establish title by adverse possession for the full statutory period.

Delay on the part of plaintiff in bringing her suit is also urged to defeat her recovery, but the rule in this state is that an action to redeem may be brought at any time before the statutory bar of ten years is complete. Dickson v. Stewart, 71 Neb. 424, 115 Am. St. Rep. 596, 98 N. W. 1085. For the reasons given, the decree of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Petition for rehearing denied.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

MARY M. COOKE WOODRUFF, Admr., etc., of Jason G. Cooke, Deceased, Respt.,
v.

H. B. CLAFLIN COMPANY, Appt.

(198 N. Y. 470, 91 N. E. 1103.)

Executor — overpayment — right to recover.

1. An executor who, under the mistaken belief that the estate is solvent, pays a claim in full, may, upon ascertaining the fact of its insolvency, recover the excess over the portion equitably due the claimant.

Surrogate's decree — person not party — binding effect.

2. One holding a claim against a decedent's estate is not bound by a decree of the surrogate's court in a proceeding to which he is not a party, settling the executor's accounts, and declaring the estate to be insolvent, nor by a decree entered on petition of the executor's surety, amending the original decree by restating the dividend to which creditors were entitled, after a citation to such claimant to attend the hearing.

Note. — Right of executor or administrator to recover back from creditor excessive payments made under the mistaken belief that estate was solvent.

It may be laid down as a rule supported by the weight of judicial authority that an executor or administrator who, under the mistaken belief that the estate is solvent, pays the claim of a creditor in full, may, upon ascertaining the fact of its insolvency, recover the excess over the pro rata share due the claimant.

This rule, in addition to WOODRUFF v. H. B. CLAFLIN Co. and those cases therein sufficiently cited and reviewed, is also supported by Tarplee v. Capp, 25 Ind. App. 50, 50 N. E. 270; Walker v. Bradley, 3 Pick. 261; Bliss v. Lee, 17 Pick. 83; Heard v. Drake, 4 Gray, 514.

In East v. Ferguson, 59 Ind. 169, it was held that an administrator may recover the amount due the estate from a debtor, and compel him, being also a creditor, to file his debt against the estate, and share pro rata therein as other creditors, where it appeared that upon settlement with such creditor, through mutual mistake that the estate was solvent, his claim was allowed in full.

A case closely related to the above, although possibly not directly in point, is Moore v. Moore, 88 Ky. 683, 11 S. W. 780, where it was held that the wife of a testator, who, in accordance with the latter's wishes, paid creditors out of the proceeds of an insurance policy in her favor, under the mistaken belief that the estate was solvent, and that she would be indemnified, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Executor — overpayment — carrying on business — effect.

3. That the executor, after paying a claim against the estate in full, carries on decedent's business for a time at a loss, does not prevent his recovering the overpayment in case the estate proves to be insolvent, if it is not made to appear that such conduct in any manner affected the respective rights or relations of the executor and claimant.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Monroe County, entered upon a directed verdict for plaintiff in an action brought to recover back money alleged to have been overpaid to defendant as a creditor of the estate of Jason G. Cooke, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Percival DeWitt Oviatt, for appellant:

A creditor cannot be compelled, in the absence of statute, to refund a portion of the moneys he has obtained from an insolvent might, upon finding that the estate was insolvent, compel the creditors to refund the insurance money, and to take of the estate their pro rata share of the assets.

However, as will be noted from the cases cited in the WOODRUFF CASE, there are a few which have denied the right of an executor or administrator to maintain an action of this character.

In Lawson v. Hansborough, 10 B. Mon. 147, it was held that when an administrator pays a debt in full to a creditor, under the mistaken belief that the estate is solvent, such mistake being the result of his own negligence, he cannot recover of such creditor in equity the surplus paid over what would have been the creditor's pro rata share of the estate. The court, in distinguishing Walker v. Hill, 17 Mass. 386, cited in the WOODRUFF CASE, said: "Although it may be inferred from the opinion of the court in that case, that their statute for the administration and settlement of estates is, in many of its leading provisions, similar to ours, yet there may, and probably do, exist, some distinctive features in the two statutes which demand a different rule to prevail in relation to the question in this case. Our statute certainly contemplates a class of cases where the executor or administrator will pay the debts at his own risk, although he may deem the estate sufficient to pay all the debts of the decedent. There would be no propriety in the language used by the statute, nor would it be allowing to it any meaning, if an exposition be given to it by which a mere mistaken belief entertained by the executor or administrator as to the sufficiency of the assets, no matter how it originated, or what cause produced it, will estate in payment of his claim, where the personal representative pays the claim upon the assumption that the estate is solvent, but previous to the time when the law would compel him to make such payment.

authorize the reclamation of the money, so far as it exceeds the ratable share of the debts paid."

So, in Brooking v. Farmers' Bank, 83 Ky. 431, it was held that notwithstanding a statute to the effect that when a personal representative shall pay to a creditor an undue proportion of his demands, under a mistake as to the solvency of the estate, he may recover from the creditor the amount of the overpayment, such personal representative cannot recover from the holder of a note, who, under the mistaken belief that the estate was solvent, had been paid in full, where it appeared that the sureties liable for the payment of the note had been released through the negligence and bad faith of the administrator.

Where the creditor expressly agrees to refund upon it being found that the estate is insolvent, it would seem as a matter of course that the executor or administrator may recover the overpayment. Wright v. Jordan, 71 Ind. 1; Beardsley v. Marsteller, 120 Ind. 319, 22 N. E. 315; Hatcher v. Royster, 14 Lea, 222.

The administrator cannot recover the overpayment where the commissioners of insolvency returned a list of claims allowed by them after the time limited in their commission, although the judge of probate thereafter ordered a payment of the dividends to the creditors. Bascom v. Butterfield, 1 Met. 536.

So, an executor cannot recover the overpayment, made more than a year after his appointment, where a statute provides in effect that if an executor or administrator shall not, within one year after notice given of his appointment, have notice of demands against the estate which will authorize him to represent the estate insolvent, he may proceed to pay the debts due from the estate, and the creditors, if subsequent demands arise from other creditors, shall not be liable to refund any part of the amount received by them. Colegrove v. Robinson, 11 Met. 238.

It would follow that a payment made within the year would not come within the above statute, and the overpayment might be recovered by the personal representative. Heard v. Drake, supra.

In Austin v. Henshaw, 7 Pick. 46, where the executor of an estate promised a debtor that if the latter would secure a note due from the estate to a certain creditor, he would allow the note towards the payment of his debt, it was held, upon the estate afterwards proving insolvent, that the executor could not recover of the debtor the difference between the amount of the note and the dividends decreed upon it; since, as the court said, the negotiations for the procuring of the note were made at the request of the executor, and he could not be permitted to throw the loss upon the defendant.

An administrator cannot recover back the whole amount so paid, but only the amount of the overpayment. Morris v. Porter, 87 Me. 510, 33 Atl. 15.

The right of an executor or administrator to recover overpayments to creditors does not accrue when the estate is represented insolvent, nor when commissioners are appointed, but when the decree of distribution is made. Flint v. Valpey, 130 Mass. 385.

The defendant is in no position to say that plaintiff is estopped from maintaining this suit by reason of the very misconduct it compelled her to commit.

Wetmore v. Porter and Chapman v. Forbes, supra.

Willard Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Jason G. Cooke, who died at Potsdam, New York, on December 23, 1899, was indebted to the defendant in the sum of $725.95. His widow, the plaintiff, became his administratrix on January 2, 1900. The defendant pressed for payment of its claim, threatening to sue if it were not speedily paid, whereupon the administratrix, believing the estate to be solvent, compromised it by paying $700 in the month of May, 1900. Upon her subsequent accounting in the surrogate's court, it turned out that the estate has been from the outset insolvent, and was really capable of paying only a dividend of 71.04 per cent upon its indebtedness. Such a dividend would have given the H. B. Claflin Company $178.48 less than it received from the administratrix in discharge of its claim, and she brought the present suit to recover that amount, with interest. As evidence of the insolvency of the estate and its extent, she was allowed to introduce, over the defendant's objection and exception, a decree of the surrogate's court of Monroe county upon her accounting, to which it is conceded the defendant was not a party, and a second decree of the same court, purporting to amend the first, made in a proceeding which the defendant was cited to attend. The competency of this proof will be considered presently. The trial court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the judgment thereon has been affirmed by the appellate division.

We have no statute in New York, giving the personal representative of an insolvent decedent a right of action in such a case as this; and the first question presented for our determination is whether an action of this character can be maintained in the absence of statutory authority therefor. The only New York case referring to the question, to which our attention has been called by counsel, is Gulke v. Uhlig, 55 How. Pr. 434, which was decided by a general term of the New York court of common pleas, consisting of Chief Justice Charles P. Daly and Judges Van Hoesen and Joseph F. Daly. Two opinions were written, one by Judge Van Hoesen and the other by Judge Joseph F. Daly. It does not appear with which of these the Chief Justice concurred. Judge Van Hoesen distinctly assumed that an administrator could recover money which he had overpaid to creditors in confidence in the ultimate solvency of the estate, but insisted that the suit must be brought in equity, and not at law; while Judge Joseph F. Daly avowed his inability to perceive any good reason for denying the administratrix relief in an action at law, if she made out a case which would entitle her to recover formerly in equity. The case involved other issues, however, and it is impossible to ascertain from the report which of these conflicting views received the sanction of a majority of the court.

The decisions in other states are conflicting. The doctrine which is supported by the weight of judicial authority, and which, it seems to me, we ought to sanction, may be briefly stated. In the case of the death of an insolvent debtor, the law contemplates equality in the distribution of the proceeds of his estate among his creditors. A creditor who seeks more than his pro rata share of the debtor's property under such circumstances seeks that which does not belong to him, and makes the other creditors poor in proportion. To insist upon full payment from an insolvent estate is dishonest, if the party thus insisting is aware of the insolvency. Hence, whether the overpaid creditor shares the erroneous belief of the administrator, that the estate is solvent, or is acquainted with its true condition, he is equally obligated to return the surplus he has received over the dividend to which he was entitled when it has become judicially ascertained that the estate is not large enough to pay all the debts in full; for in the first case both parties act under a mutual mistake of fact, and in the second case there is a wrongful intent on one side and a mistake on the other. The creditor who has received the excess has no right to retain it, in equity and good conscience; and the personal representative who has innocently paid such excess may maintain an action to recover it, if he moves seasonably after the ascertainment of the insolvency, and has done nothing which ought to constitute an estoppel in favor of the overpaid creditor.

It is settled by a uniform series of decisions in Massachusetts, beginning with the case of Walker v. Hill, 17 Mass. 380, that an administrator who pays a debt due from his intestate within a year after giving notice of his appointment, and under the honest belief that the estate is solvent, may subsequently, when the estate is shown to be insolvent, recover back the difference between the amount of the debt so paid and the amount awarded to the creditor by the probate court on a judicial settlement of the estate. See Heard v. Drake, 4 Gray, 514, and Flint v. Valpey, 130 Mass. 385. It is not entirely clear, however, that the assertion of this doctrine in Massachusetts has not been dependent to some extent upon the statutes of that commonwealth. The case of Walker v. Hill, supra, was cited by Finch, J., writing for this court in Re Hodgman, 140 N. Y. 421, 431, 35 N. E. 660, 662, when he said it must probably be granted "that an executor may, at least in equity, recover an overpayment to a legatee under peculiar circumstances which excuse his mistake."

first administrator, within the time limited for the presentation of claims, paid in full to the defendants a claim of $400, under the belief that the estate was solvent, and having disallowed certain claims against the estate on the ground that they were invalid, as he had been advised by the probate judge. These disallowed claims were subsequently held to be valid in a judicial proceeding, and the estate was thereby rendered insolvent. The dividend which the defendants would have received was $290 less than the amount actually paid them. The first administrator having died, and the plaintiff having succeeded him as administrator de bonis non, he sued the defendants to recover $290, on the ground that it was money paid to them under a mistake by the original administrator. The supreme court of errors of Connecticut held that the action was maintainable, saying: "We know of no case, and have been referred to none, wherein it is decided that the administrator may not recover in a case like the present." The court points out that in such a case the mistake in overpayment works no harm whatever to the creditor, but that it would be against equity and good conscience to allow the creditor to retain money which rightfully belongs to the estate, and which has been obtained solely in consequence of an honest error. A considerable portion of the opinion is devoted to a discussion of the question whether it is necessary that the mistake should be one of fact, and the conclusion is reached that the same principle should apply even where the mistake is only one of law. That question, however, does not arise in the present case, where it is clear that the administratrix made a mistake of fact as to the condition of the estate.

In Morris v. Porter, 87 Me. 510, 33 Atl. 15, it is expressly held "that an administrator who, within the year allowed by statute, pays a creditor's claim in full, acting upon the honest belief that the estate is solvent, may, upon the estate proving actually insolvent, recover back the difference between the amount so paid and the pro rata share which the creditor would have been entitled to in common with all other general creditors." Such right of action is declared to arise out of the equitable doctrine that the creditor has received money which, in equity and good conscience, belongs to the estate, for the purpose of making an equal distribution among all the general creditors. This purpose is characterized in the opinion as "the cardinal principle of the laws relating to the administration and settlement of decedent's estates."

and the creditor who received the overpayment believed that the assets of the estate were sufficient to pay all claims of the same class in full, and acted upon such belief; but both were mistaken in regard to the fact. The supreme court of Illinois held that the executor might recover back the overpayment in an action for money had and received for the use of the estate. So also in Ohio it has been held that, where an administrator, supposing an estate to be solvent, pays a creditor more than the distributive share to which he was entitled upon a final settlement of the estate, the administrator may recover back the difference in an action for money had and received. Rogers v. Weaver, 5 Ohio, 536.

The cases cited by the appellant which distinctly deny the right to maintain an action of this character are few in number. The earliest of these is Carson v. McFarland, 2 Rawle, 118, 19 Am. Dec. 627, decided by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1828. There it was held that an administrator who had paid money within a year from the issue of letters, to a creditor of the intestate, on account of a just debt, could not recover it back on the ground that it proved to be an overpayment by reason of a subsequently discovered deficiency of assets. In Findlay v. Trigg, 83 Va. 539, 3 S. E. 142, it was held that where an administrator voluntarily pays debts of inferior class in preference to debts of higher class, and there is a deficiency of assets, he is not entitled to have the money refunded by creditors so overpaid. The only authority cited in the opinion is Carson v. McFarland, supra. In Indiana, in the case of Beardsley v. Marsteller, 120 Ind. 319, 22 N. E. 315, it is declared to be settled "that, in the absence of an agreement to refund, an administrator who has paid money on account of a just debt cannot recover it back on the ground that, by reason of insufficient assets, not arising from their accidental destruction, loss, or failure, it afterwards appears that he has made an overpayment by mistake, unless the mistake was induced by the fraudulent conduct of the creditor."

Other cases in behalf of the appellant on this branch of the appeal are distinguishable in their facts. Thus, in Adams v. Smith, 19 Nev. 259, 9 Pac. 337, 10 Pac. 353, it did not appear that when the administratrix caused the claim to be paid she supposed that the estate was solvent. On the contrary, it was clearly shown that she paid the claim voluntarily and in her own wrong. The case of Johnson v. Molsbee, 5 Lea, 444, was not an action by an executor or administrator to recover an overpayment made to a creditor under the mistaken supposition that the estate was solvent, but was a suit in equity, brought by other creditors, to compel those who had been overpaid to refund the excess which they had received over and above their proper pro rata shares. The case does not decide the question involved in the case at bar; it merely asserts that such a suit cannot be maintained by creditors.

Without continuing the discussion of the authorities any further, I am of the opinion, as already intimated, that the plaintiff has a right of action upon the facts set out in her complaint. It does not follow, however, that she has established her alleged cause of action by competent proof. It was essential for her to show that the estate was insolvent and the extent of its insolvency. The adjudication to the effect that it could pay creditors only 74.01 per cent by the surrogate's court of St. Lawrence county, in the first decree which she put in evidence, was not binding upon the defendant corporation, since it was not made a party to the proceeding in which that decree was entered. Two years later an attempt was made to render it binding upon the defendant by means of an application by the surety upon the bond of the administratrix, to open the original decree and amend the same. The petition of the surety alleged that the original decree was erroneous in having credited the administratrix with 74.01 per cent of the amount paid to unsecured creditors; whereas, the amount paid to unsecured creditors should have been stated at 74.043 per cent, at which the dividend should have been fixed. It further alleged that the original decree erroneously directed a dividend upon a claim of $1,000 to be paid to the administratrix individually. It prayed that a citation issue, directed to all the persons interested in the estate, including the defendant in the present action, ordering them to show cause before the surrogate's court why the said first decree, settling the accounts of the administratrix, should not be reopened and amended, as set forth in the petition. The defendant was duly cited to appear in accordance with the prayer of the petition, and upon the return of the citations a second decree was made which in terms granted the prayer of the petitioner, and amended the original decree in the respects therein prayed for. The contention of the plaintiff is that these amendment proceedings put the defendant in precisely the same position as though it had been a party to the judicial settlement of the accounts of the administratrix which terminated in the first decree; and, therefore, that it was bound by the adjudication of insolvency therein contained, and by the determination of the surrogate's court as to the dividend to which creditors were entitled. No such effect can properly be given to the proceedings upon the petition of the surety, which led to the rendition of the second amendatory decree. The original decree was not vacated and set aside. The petitioning surety did not ask that this should be done. The original decree was left to stand precisely as it was first made, except in the particulars which have been pointed out. It seems to me that it would be a perversion of the truth to assume that the defendant had ever been afforded an opportunity to litigate any of the issues as to the solvency of the estate or the extent of its insolvency, or the correctness of the account of the administratrix, that arose upon her original accounting, which terminated in the first decree. Assuming that the surrogate's court might have set aside the first decree upon a proper application for that purpose, and proceeded with the judicial settlement de novo, with the defendant as a party, it is sufficient to say that nothing of the kind was attempted, and what was done in no wise operated to make the first decree evidence against the defendant of the facts which the plaintiff sought to prove by its introduction. There was no other sufficient proof of those facts, and the error in receiving this decree, therefore, requires a reversal of the judgment.

The administratrix carried on the intestate's business for some time at a loss, and the circumstances under which she did this are relied upon by the appellant as insuperable obstacles to a recovery in her behalf, as well as the point that a voluntary payment is not recoverable. The defense of voluntary payment is not available where the payment was the result of mistake; and it does not appear that the conduct of the business by the administratrix, after her settlement with the defendant, in any manner affected their respective rights or relations.

The conclusion which I have reached is that, while an action of this character is maintainable, some of the most material evidence offered and received in behalf of the plaintiff was inadmissible.

The defendant is therefore entitled to a reversal of the judgment and a new trial, costs to abide event.

A merchant cannot be discriminated

Note. — No other case has been found involving the validity of a license tax on automatic vending machines.

In Cain v. Daly, 74 S. C. 480, 55 S. E. 110, however, it was held that a statute prohibiting the buying and selling or exposing to sale of merchandise on Sunday was broad enough to include automatic vending machines, and that a license from the city, authorizing their operation, was of no avail, as such license was subject to the Sunday laws of the state.

A law is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges, or imposes peculiar disabilities, or burdensome conditions, on the exercise of a common right, upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law.

Messrs. Scott Calhoun and Ralph S. Pierce for respondent.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court for King county after trial, upon conviction of the violation of an ordinance of the city of Seattle relating to the sale of goods by automatic vending machine, which ordinance reads as follows:

An Ordinance Licensing Certain Automatic Devices, and Providing a Penalty for Violation.

Be it ordained by the city of Seattle as follows:

Section 1. That it shall be unlawful for any person to maintain, keep, conduct, manage, have in his possession or control for use, any automatic device for the sale of goods of any kind or character, where money or any representative of value is used to operate the same, or where gain or trade is the object, without being licensed so to do by the city of Seattle.

Sec. 2. The license required by this ordinance shall be secured by paying the required amount to the city treasurer, receiving a receipt therefor, and presenting such receipt to the city comptroller, who shall issue such license as the receipt calls for.

Sec. 3. The schedule of amounts to be paid for licenses, is as follows: Where a deposit of one (1) cent or slug representing the same in trade is required to operate the same, one (1) dollar per year for each device; where a deposit of five (5) cents or slug representing the same in trade is required to operate the same, five (5) dollars per year for each device; where a deposit of ten (10) cents or slug representing the same in trade, is required to operate the same, ten (10) dollars per year for each device; where a deposit of twenty-five (25) cents or slug representing the same in trade is required to operate the same, fifteen (15) dollars per year for each device.

Sec. 4. The provisions of this ordinance shall not be held to include or apply to the sale of gas or other commodities, through prepayment meters, or the installation and use of telephones with slot machine devices, by public-service corporations operating under franchises granted by the city of Seattle, or to the sale of candies or similar confections by automatic devices in theaters or other such places of public assembly where a fee is charged for admission.

Defendant is the manager of the Northwestern Automatic Vending Machine Company, a Washington corporation, which is engaged in the business of selling cigars at retail by means of vending machines, owns and operates a great many of these machines in the city of Seattle, and has invested a large sum of money in said machines. The machines are placed in hotels where cigars are required by the patrons, are under the general supervision of the clerks of the hotels, and, as a rule, a certain percentage is given to the hotel men for operating the machines. Under the ordinance in question the license fee required for the operation of the machines varies from $30 to $95, according to the number of devices; the fee being based on the denomination of the coin required for operation and the number of devices, and not on the amount of business done. Each machine has a device for 5, 10, and 25 cent pieces. The cigars are at all times exposed to view under their proper labels and prices, so that the purchaser can at all times see what he is getting for his money, and he gets just what he pays for. If he drops in a 5-cent coin in the device calling for a coin of that denomination, and presses the plunger, he gets a 5-cent cigar; if a 10-cent coin, a 10-cent cigar; and if a 25-cent coin, either a two-for-a-quarter or a three-for-a-quarter cigar, according to his selection. There is no more opportunity for the customer being cheated or defrauded in dealing with this device than by any other one.

The question for determination here is the validity of the ordinance. It is conceded that this ordinance is a revenue measure; that the only ground of difference between licensed and unlicensed sales in this ordinance is in the mode of sales, whether by device or hand. It is conceded that none of the other retail merchants of that occupation is taxed by licenses for the sale of cigars; that if the sale is by this device, the license is imposed; and that if it is by hand, in the ordinary way, no license is required. In the discussion of this question there are certain fundamental principles which may be conceded; viz., that it is a well-known attribute of sovereignty to tax occupations for the purpose of raising revenue, and that such tax may be imposed in the form of a license fee; that the state may tax all or any occupations or business carried on within its boundaries, imposing the burden upon some and passing by others; that only considerations of general policy determine such selections; and that there is no restriction unless it be imposed by the Constitution. This determination, however, must not be exercised arbitrarily or fraudulently, and, while the policy of the enactment may not be questioned by the courts, the discretion exercised by the lawmaking power must be natural and reasonable, and consistent with the general principles of law and the fundamental principles upon which our government is founded. When these principles are violated to the extent of depriving the citizen of natural or constitutional rights, it is the duty of the court to intervene in his behalf. A wilderness of authority might be cited on this interesting and fruitful subject of litigation, for from the beginning of not only our government, but of all government, the contest has been waged between legislative powers and individual rights. But, from the best-considered cases, the general principles above announced can be deduced.

Tested by these principles, can this ordinance be sustained? We think not. It is plain that there is no police power or regulation involved,—a power which is the sustaining principle in 99 out of 100 of the cases cited; for there is no claim that the business discriminated against here affects in any way the public morals or the business interests of the community, except as it affects the interest of others engaged in the same business, but purely in the way of competition. The article that is sold does not in any way involve the police power. Hence it is a matter of no public concern whether it be sold by device or by some other method. And here it is well to note a vital distinction, founded on sound and just principles of law, between the power to tax occupations under the form of a license, which, by reason of the character of the occupation, is subject to police regulation, and the power to tax what are termed useful trades and employments under the guise of a license. It is well settled that the license required of employments of the latter character can carry with it only such fee as is necessary to make compensation for the regulation services, and cannot be perverted into a tax. Especially is this true when the attempt is made to discriminate between occupations alike in principle, but differing only in mode of operation in some trifling particular.

The respondent relies largely upon the case of St. John v. New York, 201 U. S. 633, 50 L. ed. 896, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 554, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 909, where the Supreme Court of the United States sustained an act prohibiting the sale of adulterated milk, wherein certain respects it provided different prohibitions and penalties as to producing and nonproducing venders of milk; the enactment making it a penal offense for a person to vend milk that contained more than a certain amount of water and less than a certain amount of milk solids. The objection urged to the law was that it was a discrimination between the vender and the producers of the milk, and that such discrimination had no basis in right or public policy. In discussing the case, the court said: "It has been decided many times that a state may classify persons and objects for the purpose of legislation. We will assume the cases are known, and proceed immediately to consider whether the classification of the law is based on proper and justifiable distinctions, considering the purpose of the law and the means to be observed to effect that purpose. By referring to § 20, it will be observed that adulterated milk, as there defined, includes not only that to which something has been added, but milk from which the cream has been removed, or which is deficient naturally in certain substances, or taken from cows fed on certain things, or cows in certain conditions when milked. In other words, the purpose of the law is to secure to the population, adult and infant, milk attaining a certain standard of purity and strength. All other milk is declared to be 'unclean, impure, unhealthy, adulterated, or unwholesome.' It is not contended that such purpose is not within the power of the state, but it is contended that the power is not exercised on all alike who stand in the same relation to the purpose.

. . . Legislation, to be practical and efficient, must regard this special purpose as well as the ultimate purpose. The ultimate purpose is that wholesome milk shall reach the consumer; and it is the conception of the law that milk below a certain strength is not wholesome, but a difference is made between milk naturally deficient and milk made so by dilution. It is not for us to say that this is not a proper difference, and, regarding it, the law fixes its standard by milk in the condition that it comes from the herd. It is certain that, if milk starts pure from the producer, it will reach the consumer pure, if not tampered with on the way. To prevent such tampering, the law is framed and its penalties adjusted. As the standard established can be proved in the hands of a producing vender, he is exempt from the penalty. As it cannot certainly be proved in the hands of other venders so as to prevent evasions of the law, such venders are not exempt." It would be difficult to discover in principle any similarity between that case and the one at bar. The court in that case, as in nearly all the cases, starts out with the discussion as to what is the purpose of the law. The purpose of the law in the case just cited was to prevent the adulteration of milk, which the state undoubtedly had a right to do under its plain police powers, for the protection of the health of the citizen. But, as we have before said, this case is stripped of any police feature, and if we were to start an investigation to determine the purpose of this act, it could only end in a report that there was no such beneficent purpose as was stated by the court in that case, but that the purpose, if it had any, was to benefit the regular retail cigar merchants by suppressing a business of the same kind, but differing simply in the mode of the delivery of the cigars; or, in other words, to prevent honest competition in the cigar trade. The further reason upon which the court decided that case, viz., that it was more difficult to detect fraud when the milk was in the hands of the vender than when it was in the hands of the original producer, is also absent in this case. As the testimony shows and as the model of the machine indicates, there is no more opportunity for fraud or deceit in selling cigars under this system than in selling them in any other way.

The case of Chicago v. Bowman Dairy Co. 234 Ill. 294, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 684, 123 Am. St. Rep. 100, 84 N. E. 813, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 700, also largely relied upon by the respondent, is practically the same kind of a case. Probably the circumstances of that case bring it a little nearer to the case at bar. There an act was sustained which required dealers selling cream and milk in bottles or glass jars to have the capacity of the bottles or jars permanently indicated upon them, and prescribed a penalty for having in their possession bottles or glass jars of capacity less than that indicated on the outside; while the act did not apply to venders of milk through other agencies. But that case, as the other, was sustained on the doctrine of the police power of the state. Even so, we are doubtful if that case could be indorsed by this court under the decision in Spokane v. Macho, 51 Wash. 322, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263, 130 Am. St. Rep. 1100, 98 Pac. 755, where it was held that in an ordinance to regulate and license employment agencies, a section making it a misdemeanor for the keeper of an employment agency to make wilful misrepresentations, or to wilfully deceive any person seeking employment, and take a fee of such employment, is unconstitutional, since it is not general and impartial in its operation, but operates upon one class to the exclusion of others, in respect to a penal act common to all classes of business, and exceeds the reasonable limit of police regulations. In that case it was stated that it is a fundamental proposition that an ordinance must be fair in its terms, impartial in its provisions, and general in its application; citing Dill. Mun. Corp. § 322, and McQuillin, Mun. Ord. 193. It was also said: "When exercising its power to regulate a business, the municipality may classify subjects of legislation; but the law must treat alike all of a class to which it applies, and must bring within its classification all who are similarly situated or under the same condition,"—citing State ex rel. McCue v. Ramsey County, 48 Minn. 236, 31 Am. St. Rep. 650, 51 N. W. 112, where the court said: "The classification must be based on some reason suggested by a difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects treated, and no arbitrary distinction between different kinds or classes of business can be sustained, the conditions being otherwise similar." A much worse discrimination would be a discrimination between citizens of the same class, engaged in the same business, where there is no reason suggested by a difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects treated; for not only is the business in this case similar and identical, but it is purely and simply a difference in the mode of transacting the business,—a mode which cannot possibly affect any principle or affect deleteriously the consumer or purchaser of the article sold. The general principle announced by Mr. Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (volume 1, § 322), seems to be specially applicable here: "As it would be unreasonable and unjust to make, under the same circumstances, an act done by one person penal, and, if done by another, not so, ordinances which have this effect cannot be sustained. Special and unwarranted discrimination or unjust or oppressive interference in particular cases is not to be allowed. The powers vested in municipal corporations should, as far as practicable, be exercised by ordinances general in their nature and impartial in their operation." The Montana legislature passed a law imposing a license tax of $25 per quarter on every laundry business other than that of a steam laundry, wherein more than one person was employed or engaged, and but $15 per quarter upon steam laundries. This law was sustained by the state court of Montana, but was afterwards declared unconstitutional by that eminent jurist, Judge Knowles, of the United States circuit court, in Re Yot Sang, 75 Fed. 983. In the course of the opinion it was said: "Unless there is something so different in the conducting of a laundry by steam to that of the carrying on of that business by any other means, the law providing a different and more excessive license for the conducting of such business other than by steam is unequal and unjust. . . . It may be said that the state may have wished to encourage steam laundries. If so, it had no right to do it at the expense of any person carrying on such a business other than by means of steam. Such an argument would imply that it was in the power of a state to force a man who conducted a business in one mode to abandon the same in order that he who conducted such business in another mode should be encouraged and built up." The court concluded that where the same business is conducted by different modes, it was unjust and in violation of the rule that each man should have the protection of equal laws to place upon one a greater burden than upon the other. It is stated by counsel for appellant as a matter of history that, since the determination of this case in the United States court, it has been accepted as the law of the state, and that there have been no prosecutions under the statute. However this may be, we are satisfied that the decision of the United States court expresses the true principles governing such cases. In the case of Covington v. Dalheim, 126 Ky. 26, 102 S. W. 829, the court, in passing upon the constitutionality of an act which imposes a tax on a certain class of grocers, without the imposition of the same tax on others, held that the tax must apply to all grocers in the city, and that the act was unconstitutional, saying: "It is competent for the city to select any of the enumerated classes as subjects for license taxes. But . . . it is not competent for it to tax some members of a class set apart by the legislature, and not tax others of the same class." And the principle announced in that case was reaffirmed by the court of appeals of Kentucky in the case of Read v. Graham, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 569, 102 S. W. 860. These last three cases which we have mentioned seem to be exactly in point on the question under discussion.

It is very well suggested by counsel for appellant that it would be just as reasonable to discriminate against a merchant who used a patent carrier for the transmission of money and change, instead of a cash boy. The same rule might apply to a thousand different improvements that have a tendency to cheapen products by reason of the fact that they are labor-saving machines, and do away with the necessity for so many clerks and employees. It is a legitimate business, and it makes no difference to the public whether the cigar is delivered by means of this automatic device or in the ordinary way. A strict or puritanical conception of the business of selling cigars might be that it was harmful to the health of the consumers, but the mode of selling them would not enter into that thought. Nor can the objection that it is particularly attractive be urged, for handsome girls are ordinarily employed around hotels for the purpose of selling cigars, and no doubt many susceptible men are induced to buy more cigars than they otherwise would by reason of the employment of this delivery agency. Fairly considered, this seems to be a tax or invention, for invention in most cases, as in this, lessens the expense of the business, and thereby necessarily cheapens the product. This was one of the arguments advanced in favor of sustaining the validity of this ordinance; viz., that the machine could be manufactured and operated for less money than a retail cigar store could be equipped and operated. It would seem that the reduction in price of an article of commerce would savor of the quality of a blessing rather than of a curse, when the welfare of the consumer is taken into consideration; and to hold otherwise would reverse the general rule that legal restraints may be imposed upon the few for the benefit of the many. The tendency of this kind of an ordinance is to foster monopolies, for a monopoly exists when the manufacture and sale of any commodity is restrained to one or a certain number. It is said that it has three inseparable consequences,—the increase of the price, the badness of the wares, the impoverishment of others. Hence it naturally follows that monopolies are odious to the law, and the law will concern itself to restrain rather than to nourish them. If this ordinance can be sustained, there is no limit to the arbitrary, capricious, or tyrannical imposition of taxes, and the constitutional guaranty that "no law shall be passed granting to any citizen, class of citizens, or corporation other than municipal, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens or corporations," becomes a dead letter. Discrimination to the extent exhibited in this ordinance discourages enterprise, paralyzes progress, is a deprivation of liberty, and is entirely inconsistent with the true principles and the genius of our government. None of the cases cited, from either this or any other court, numerous as they are, go to the extent of discriminating against a simple mode of doing business, which is conceded to be lawful and fair, and which in no way involves the principles of police power or regulation.

The judgment will be reversed, with instructions to dismiss the action.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM A. SHRINER, Appt.,

v.

JOHN CRAFT.

(— Ala. —, 51 So. 884.)

Contract — signing — liability.

1. The mere signing of one's name to a contract does not make him a party thereto, if the contract states that it is between other parties, and the person so signing is not mentioned therein.

Action — discontinuance — striking — party.

2. The striking out of an improper party does not work a discontinuance of the case.

Contract — promise of additional compensation — validity.

3. The promise by one party to a building contract to pay more for the work than the amount called for in the contract, upon the refusal or threatened refusal of the Note. — Promise of additional compensation for completing an executory contract other than for the payment of money.

The conflict of authority on this subject shown in the notes in 34 L.R.A. 38 and 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 780, is reflected in the contradictory conclusions reached in SHRINER v. CRAFT and Evans v. Oregon & W. R. Co. post, 455. The statement, in the latter case, of the elementary principle that parties competent to contract may abrogate or rescind the contract and enter into a new one touching the same matter, to be performed in the same or a different way, upon a different consideration, hardly serves to distinguish that case from the SHRINER CASE and other cases cited in the notes referred to, holding that the promise of additional compensation is without consideration; since that statement was evidently not intended to imply that the parties in this case had in fact formally abandoned the original contract and then formally entered into a new one, but was merely intended to express the court's view of the legal aspect or implication of a promise to pay additional compensation for performing the contract. The statement would therefore seem to be applicable to any case of a promise to pay additional compensation for completing a contract. Possibly a basis for a distinction might be found, contractor to go on with the work, the original contract still remaining in force, is without consideration and unenforceable.

Same—failure to secure ordinance—effect.

4. Failure to have an ordinance passed authorizing a frame building within the fire limits, so as to allow the work to be begun at a certain time, is no defense to an action for breach of a building contract, if the ordinance was in fact passed, and there is nothing to show that the building contract fixed any time when work should be commenced, or that there was any consideration for the agreement as to the ordinance.

Evidence — architect's certificate — contract provision.

5. An architect's certificate provided for by a building contract is admissible in evidence in an action for breach of the contract.

Contract — architect's certificate — binding effect.

6. An architect's certificate which a building contract provides shall be final and conclusive is so in legal effect unless impeached for fraud or such gross mistakes as would imply bad faith or a failure to exercise an honest judgment.

(December 16, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Mobile County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of a building contract. Affirmed.

if the parties did in fact formally abandon the original contract and enter upon a new one in all respects the same except for the promise of additional compensation. That, however, might be fairly characterized as a distinction without a difference.

Some considerations were suggested in the note to 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 789, in favor of the doctrine that the actual performance of the work, even though the party was already under obligation to perform, is a sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay additional compensation. But even if the reverse is the true doctrine, it is apparent that very slight circumstances will be sufficient to take a case out of its operation. A modification of the contract favorable to the party agreeing to pay the additional compensation, though comparatively slight, would undoubtedly be sufficient for this purpose. So, of course, many cases may be taken out of the operation of that doctrine, on the ground that there was a compromise of an honestly disputed question concerning the original contract. And so, in exceptional cases, the new promise may be sustained consistently with that doctrine, upon the ground that the circumstances under which the original contract was entered into were such as would have entitled 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"(9) The defendant, as a defense to the action of the plaintiff, saith that at the time the said action was commenced the plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $250 damages, arising in connection with the contract described in the complaint, in this: That the buildings provided for to be erected under the contract described in the complaint were to be built upon lots of land lying within what are known as the 'fire limits' of the city of Mobile, within which limits it was unlawful to erect frame buildings, such as was provided in the contract described in the complaint should be erected on said lot, and the plaintiff agreed with the defendant that, because he was a member of the general council of the city of Mobile, he would have an ordinance passed by the general council of the city of Mobile excepting these lots from the provisions of said ordinance, and permitting defendant to erect plain buildings on said lot, and that he would do this sufficiently in advance of the commencement of the contract to enable the defendant to begin the erection of buildings upon the day prescribed by the terms of the contract; but defendant says that plaintiff negligently failed to secure the passage of such ordinance as would exempt the buildings to be erected under the contract, from the provisions of law establishing the fire limits of the city of Mobile, until two weeks had elapsed after the time defendant was required to commence con-

the party to whom the promise of additional compensation was made to relief at the hands of the courts. Cases of this kind are not within the scope of these notes, but, for the purpose of illustrating the point, the recent case of John King Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 131 Ky. 46, 114 S. W. 308 (rehearing denied in 116 S. W. 1201), may be referred to. In that case a promise of additional compensation to a contractor for excavating and removing a rocky stratum was upheld, it appearing that, at the time the contract was made, test pits had been sunk, which developed no rock, and that the contract was made on the supposition by both parties that there was none. The court said that, after the discovery of the true condition, which was materially different from that represented and relied on, a court of equity might have relieved the contractor from the execution of a contract under the circumstances, and that it was competent for the parties to do voluntarily what the court might have done for them.

The analogous question as to the payment of part of a liquidated and undisputed debt as a consideration for the discharge of the whole is treated in notes in 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1018, and 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1005.

structing said building under the terms of the contract, and the defendant says that, by the said delay of the plaintiff, he was damaged in the sum of $250, which he hereby offers to set off against the demand of the plaintiff, and he claims judgment for the excess."

Further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Gregory L. Smith and H. T. Smith for appellee.

Simpson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the appellee against the appellant, for damages for the breach of a contract, by which the defendant undertook and agreed to furnish material and build two houses in accordance with the contract set out in the record.

The first assignments of error insisted on (numbered 1 and 2) are to the sustaining of the demurrer of Mary R. Shriner, on the ground that the complaint shows on its face that Mary R. Shriner was not a party to the contract sued on, and the third, fourth, and fifth assignments relate to the same subject, to wit, to the refusal of the court to grant the motion for a discontinuance of the case, because of the amendment of the complaint, by striking out the name of said Mary R. Shriner.

There was no error in either action of the court. The contract sued on is set out in the complaint, and it states distinctly that it is between W. A. Shriner and John Craft. The fact that Mary R. Shriner's name appears at the end of the contract with

W. A. Shriner does not make it her contract. The statute is clear on the right of amendment by striking out parties, and our decisions are uniform to the effect that the striking out of an improper party does not work a discontinuance of the case. It cannot be material how the fact comes to the knowledge of the court that such person is an improper party; whether it appears upon the face of the pleading, and is brought to the attention of the court by demurrer, or is subsequently made to appear in the evidence. Section 5367, Code of 1907, and cases cited.

A number of the assignments of error are grouped by the appellant in his brief, being questions raised on sustaining motions to strike and demurrers to pleas, which set up a modification of the contract. The first proposition is correct, to wit, that the parties to a written contract may, by mutual parol agreement, modify the contract; but the second proposition, to wit, that said modification is binding without any new consideration, is not so clear. While there are some expressions in the case which seem to dispense with the necessity of a consideration to a modification of a contract, yet a modification can be nothing but a new contract, and must be supported by a consideration like every other contract. An analysis of the cases shows that it would be more accurate to say that the mutual obligations assumed by the parties, at the time of the modification, constitute a sufficient consideration, and if one of the parties does not assume any obligation or release any right, then a promise by the other is a nudum pactum and void.

Where a teacher who had been employed at an annual salary agreed to give up his definite contract and to serve during the pleasure of the board, it was held that the change in the terms of the teacher's service furnished a sufficient consideration for the promise of increased compensation. Hildreth v. Pinkerton Academy, 29 N. H. 227, 235.

Where an agreement to do blasting on certain terms was made upon the representations of the defendant as to the quality of the rock to be blasted, and it was found that the rock was much harder, and useless to the party blasting, in place of being useful, as represented, a new agreement to pay more for the work was supported by the additional work which the other party agreed to perform. Osborne v. O'Reilly, 42 N. J. Eq. 468, 475, 9 Atl. 209.

There is a class of cases in which the original contract had been abandoned, and the parties afterwards entered into a new parol contract for the performance of the same work on different terms, and the contract was held to be valid. The theory of these cases seems to be that either party may abandon the contract and subject himself to the penalty or liability therefor, and then the parties are at liberty to make another contract, in which the original work, stipulated for in the first contract, may be a sufficient consideration for the second, leaving the parties to their remedies on account of the abandonment of the first contract, unless special provision be made to release the same. Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 298, 20 Am. Dec. 475, 478; Coyner v. Lynde, 10 Ind. 282, 284; Morrison v. Heath, 11 Vt. 610; Koerper v. Royal Invest. Co. 102 Mo. App. 543, 551, 77 S. W. 307.

Other cases have gone a step further, and have held that, if one party finds himself in such a position that he cannot carry out the contract on the terms provided, and notifies the other party that he will abandon the contract unless different terms are granted, said second party has the option either to let the contract be abandoned, and depend on his action for damages, or to make the new agreement, and consideration being that he considers it worth more to him to have the benefits of the new agreement, than to recover his damages for the breach of the original contract. Bishop v. Busse, 69 Ill. 403, 407.

It seems to this court that this latter class of cases has reached a dangerous limit in permitting one party to be bound by his promise to another, who has promised nothing but what he was already under contract obligation to perform, which is no consideration at all. Koerper v. Royal Invest. Co. 102 Mo. App. 543, 550, 77 S. W. 307; Widiman v. Brown, 83 Mich. 241, 244, 47 N. W. 231; C. H. Davis & Co. v. Morgan, 117 Ga. 504, 506, 61 L.R.A. 148, 97 Am. St. Rep. 171, 43 S. E. 732; Willingham Sash & Door Co. v. Drew, 117 Ga. 850, 45 S. E. 237.

Where, upon the mere statement of the defendant that the drilling of the well would be very expensive, plaintiffs agreed to reduce the price of drilling, it was held no modification of the contract (Wendling v. Snyder, 30 Ind. App. 330, 333, 65 N. E. 1041, 1042), the court saying: "The evidence did not tend to prove an abandonment or modification of the original contract" and that the work was done under the new contract.

In our early case of Young v. Fuller, 20 Ala. 464, no question was raised about consideration, the only question being that the parties might, by a subsequent written contract, guarantee the genuineness of a note which had been indorsed by one to the other, by providing that if the note turned out to be void, the transaction was, in effect, to be canceled.

In the case of Thomason v. Dill, 30 Ala. 444, 459, T. had purchased a slave from D., taken a bill of sale, and given his promissory note, but left the slave with D. until he (T.) went to procure sureties, and the court held that if the promise of T. to procure the surety was after the consummation of the contract, in pursuance merely of a prior unaccepted offer, it was nudum pactum, but if the parties mutually agreed to modify the contract, T.'s right to the slave not to attach until he executed the proposed note, the promise of each is supported by a sufficient consideration. See same case, 34 Ala. 175.

In the case of Johnson v. Sellers, 33 Ala. 265, the defendant had entered into a contract to take charge of a school, and there being a dispute as to whether he was bound, under the original contract, to bring his wife to the school as a teacher, it was agreed to pay him an additional amount to bring her. The court held that the defendant could not refuse to perform his contract and make that a sufficient consideration for a promise of payment of a sum to induce him to perform his contract, though one party might waive the performance of the contract and the two agree to rescind or modify the contract and ingraft new provisions on it, but that, while the original contract was subsisting, a promise to prevent its breach was without consideration.

In the case of Burkham v. Mastin, 54 Ala. 122, 125, 127, emphasis is placed on the fact that the part payment made at the time of the additional contract was before anything was due, thus furnishing a consideration for the modification, and the court held that, in that phase of the case, the modification was supported by a consideration, but "if such agreement is made only to induce a performance, or to prevent a breach of the original contract, it would be without consideration, and could not be supported."

In the case of Hall v. Jones, 56 Ala. 493, 497, where the question was whether the assumption of the debt of the old firm by the new one discharged the old one, this court, speaking through Stone, J., said: "It requires the same mutuality to vary or modify a contract, as it does to create it in the first instance; for modification is only a species of contract. The mutual agreement of the parties, a promise for a promise, is sufficient to uphold such modified contract, without other new consideration."

In the case of Cooper v. McIlwain, 58 Ala. 296, 300, the original contract was expressly rescinded and a new written contract made, and on these facts the court says that the parties "may rescind or modify it, at pleasure; and their mutual assent is all

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prior to August 12, 1907, the appellants entered into a contract with the respondent Oregon & Washington Railroad Company for grading a part of its roadbed in Lewis county. On that date the appellants entered into a written contract with the respondent Evans, by which they sublet to him a portion of the work. The respondent Evans commenced work under his contract, but, finding that the compensation agreed upon was inadequate, abandoned the work. The following day, at the instance of the division engineer of the railroad company, a Mr. Abbott, Evans and Abbott went to see the appellant Dibble, and informed him that Evans was dissatisfied, and had quit work. Evans then complained of the refusal of the appellants to pay a certain bill, and further said to them that he did not want to resume work because he had struck gumbo, and could not make anything. Abbott insisted that he should go on with the work, and stated in the presence of the appellant Dibble that, if he would continue and complete the work, "we will see that the bills are paid and you get a reasonable wage." Dibble was present, but said nothing further than to discuss the bill. The respondent Evans then resumed and completed the work, and, upon the refusal of the parties to pay a portion of the bills and his wages, brought this suit against his correspondent and the appellants to enforce the oral contract. At the close of his testimony, a motion for a nonsuit was granted as to the railroad company and denied as to the appellants. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the respondent Evans against the appellants, and they have appealed.

The first point suggested by the appellants is that the oral contract, if made, was without consideration, and not enforceable. It is insisted that neither the promise to do, nor the doing of that which the promisor is by law or subsisting contract bound to do, is a sufficient consideration to support a contract in his favor. We cannot assent to this view of the law. We think the better rule is that, where a party has breached his contract and refused to perform it, it is optional with the adverse party to sue him for damages, or waive the breach, treat the contract as abrogated, and enter into a new contract with the delinquent party. It would seem to be elementary that parties competent to contract can abrogate or rescind the contract and enter into a new contract touching the same subject-matter to be performed, in the same or a different way, upon a different consideration. In the case at bar the appellants had contracted to do certain work, and it was important to them that the work that Evans had agreed to perform should go forward. When he abandoned the work, they had the election to hold him answerable in damages, or to make a new contract with him. They chose the latter course, and cannot now be heard to say that the contract was nudum pactum. This position has abundant support in the authorities. "Where the contractor refuses to perform his contract, and the builder promises to pay him additional compensation in consideration of the continued performance of the contract, the authorities are not in accord on the question whether the promise for additional compensation is supported by a sufficient consideration. The prevailing rule seems to be, however, that such a promise is valid as an abandonment of the original contract and the creation of a new contract." 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1197. "The release of one from the stipulations of the original agreement is the consideration for the release of the other; and the mutual releases are the consideration for the new contract, and are sufficient to give it full legal effect." Rollins v. Marsh, 128 Mass. 116. In Rogers v. Rogers, 139 Mass. 440, 1 N. E. 122, it was held that where one party has agreed to sell and the other has agreed to buy certain goods at a stipulated price, and the seller delivers a part of the goods, but refuses to deliver the remainder except at an advanced price, the agreement of the purchaser to pay the increased price is binding upon him upon the delivery of the goods. In Goebel v. Linn, 47 Mich. 489, 41 Am. Rep. 723, 11 N. W. 284, in an opinion by Judge Cooley, it was held that, where an ice company had contracted to deliver ice to a brewing company at a given rate, and, owing to a shortage in ice, refused to complete the contract unless a higher rate was paid, a note given by the brewing company for the ice at the increased price was based upon a sufficient consideration. In Foley v. Storrie, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 377, 23 S. W. 442, the plaintiff had agreed to deliver to defendant 1,000 cords of wood at $4 per cord. Owing to the advance in wages, the plaintiff found that he could not make a profit on the contract, and so advised the defendant. Thereupon it was agreed that the defendant would pay $5 per cord. The plaintiff then delivered 100 cords, and brought suit to recover the price on the new contract. It was held that the new contract was enforceable, and that "the parties had the right to rescind their contract or to modify it by mutual agreement." In Coyner v. Lynde, 10 Ind. 282, the defendant agreed with the plaintiff, the original contractor, to complete a portion of his contract for the construction of a part of a line of railroad at the price plaintiff was to receive, and to pay plaintiff a premium for the privilege of the contract. Later the defendant ascertained that the contract price was inadequate, and determined to abandon the work. The plaintiff, to induce the defendant to continue the contract to completion, agreed to release him from the payment of the premium, and the defendant completed the contract. It was held that when a party abandons his contract, the adverse party has his election to sue or make a new agreement, and, if in the new agreement he makes new or additional promises dependent upon the fulfilment of the contract, and the party abandoning the contract, in consideration of the new promises, completes the work, the promise is binding. In Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 298, 20 Am. Dec. 475, the plaintiff undertook to construct a cartway for the sum of $900. After beginning the work, he ascertained that the price was inadequate, and determined to abandon the contract. Whereupon the defendant orally agreed to release him from the contract and pay him by the day, if he would complete the work, which he did; and, in an action to recover upon the second contract, it was held binding. The same principle is announced in Cooke v. Murphy, 70 Ill. 96; Abbott v. Doane, 163 Mass. 433, 31 L.R.A. 33, 47 Am. St. Rep. 465, 40 N. E. 197; and Wilhelm v. Voss, 118 Mich. 106, 76 N. W. 308. The rule contended for by the appellants was criticized by this court in Brown v. Kern, 21 Wash. 211, 57 Pac. 798, the court saying that it was not in accord with ethics, and ought not to be in accord with the law, to allow a creditor to compromise a debt for a less sum than the amount due, receive a sum of money on the compromise, and then permit him to repudiate the compromise and retain the benefits. We think the view we have expressed is supported by the reasoning of this court in Sherman v. Sweeny, 29 Wash. 321, 69 Pac. 1117. It must be conceded, however, that the courts are not agreed upon this question, and judges of the highest ability have announced the view urged by the appellants. The view we have taken will permit greater freedom in contracting, and is, we think, more in harmony with the fundamental conception of contracts.

The court instructed the jury that they must find "that there was some consideration for the contract," and that "one promise is a good consideration for another promise." The respondent Evans did not except to this view of the law. The following interrogatory was propounded to the jury: "If you find from the evidence that there was an oral agreement entered into between the railroad company and Dibble-Hawthorne Company and the plaintiff, wherein the said defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff all past bills incurred, all future bills to be incurred in the prosecution of the work, and a reasonable wage to himself, state what the consideration for such promise was to the defendants Dibble and Hawthorne." The jury answered: "The fact that Dibble and Hawthorne were under bond to complete the work within a stated time." The appellants insist that the answer is in conflict with the instructions of the court, and that their motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict should have been granted. The contention is untenable, for three reasons: (1) If the parties made an oral contract, the sufficiency of the consideration was a legal question for the determination of the court, and not a fact for the consideration of the jury; (2) the answer to the interrogatory necessarily implied that the minds of the parties met and that the oral contract was made, thus falling within the instruction that "one promise is a good consideration for another;" and (3) the consideration found was a sufficient consideration and within the evidence.

It is insisted that the court erred in submitting the case to the jury as to the appellants, and withdrawing it as to the railroad company, and that there is not sufficient evidence of the oral contract to support the verdict. The respondent is not complaining of the action of the court in granting the nonsuit in favor of the railroad company. Obviously he is the only party injured thereby. In addition to the facts stated, there was evidence tending to show that, after making the alleged oral contract, the appellants kept the time of the men employed by Evans; that they did not do so before that time; and that they thereafter paid five bills for supplies, such as milk, hay, meat, and powder, which Evans had contracted in the prosecution of the work, aggregating over $500. They were not required to pay these bills under the written contract. The appellants stoutly denied making the oral contract, but admitted paying the bills mentioned, explaining that they did so, not as a duty, but at the request of Evans, when there was money due him. There is sufficient evidence, direct and circumstantial, to support the verdict. On the other hand, the jury might properly have found for the appellants. The issue was sharply drawn, and was determined adversely to the appellants upon sufficient evidence, and they must abide the result.

The authorities cited in the reply brief, holding that it requires clear, positive, and convincing evidence to establish the rescission of a written contract, have no application here; the court, at the instance of the appellants, having instructed that a preponderance of evidence was sufficient to establish that fact.

The judgment is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

FINNEY'S ORCHESTRA

v.

FINNEY'S FAMOUS ORCHESTRA et al.,
Appts.

(— Mich. —, 126 N. W. 198.)

Unfair tradename of organization — protection.

A name like "Finney's Orchestra" may be protected against unfair competition by those whose efforts have made it valuable, although the one who originated the organization and gave it his name is dead.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wayne County in complainant's favor in a suit to enjoin the alleged unlawful use of complainant's tradename. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Duncan C. Beath and H. F. Chipman, with William Look, for appellants:

Theodore Finney could legally devise his music and instruments to Mosby, but not the name of "Finney Orchestra" or "Finney."

Atkinson v. John E. Doherty & Co. 121 Mich. 372, 46 L.R.A. 219, 80 Am. St. Rep. 507, 80 N. W. 285.

Neither corporation, as such, was entitled to the name or property or business of the association as its successor, to the exclusion of the other.

Mason v. Finch, 28 Mich. 282; Schiller Commandery No. 1 v. Jaennichen, 116 Mich. 129, 74 N. W. 458.

Messrs. Stellwagen & MacKay, for appellee:

Tradenames are protected, not as trademarks necessarily, though they may also be trademarks, but on the ground of unfair competition.

Christy v. Murphy, 12 How. Pr. 77; Hopkins, Unfair Trade, §§ 52, 53; Weinstock, L. & Co. v. Marks, 109 Cal. 537, 30 L.R.A. 182, 50 Am. St. Rep. 57, 42 Pac. 142.

Defendants incorporated under the name for the sole purpose of appropriating the Note. — Right of members of organization to protection in use of name which their efforts have made valuable.

Although it is sometimes loosely said that a person whose efforts have made a tradename valuable acquires a property right therein, the more discriminating decisions hold that the principle upon which the courts proceed in restraining the simulation of trade or business names, where the name assumed is of a fanciful or arbitrary character, is not that there is property acquired in the word or name employed, but that it is to prevent fraud and deception in the dealing of the party charged with the simulation or infringement of the name used by another in a similar business.

Although the question has received little judicial discussion, the right of the members of an organization, or, more properly speaking, of the public, to protection against the use by others of a name to which the united efforts of such members have given a peculiar significance, seems to have been recognized wherever the question has arisen in such a form as definitely to require the predication of such right.

Thus, in Aiello v. Montecarlo, 21 R. I. 496, 44 Atl. 931, it was held, against an objection that no cause for equitable action was disclosed, because equity will not interfere except in cases of substantial monetary damage to a continuing business, that a bill setting forth that the complainants, a voluntary association organized under a certain name for the purpose, in part, of giving dramatic entertainments, had advertised themselves and were well known as a club or society, and had from time to time given dramatic entertainments, and that the action of the defendants in wrongfully appropriating the name of the society had caused and would cause great loss and damage to the complainants, set forth cause for equitable relief.

In Original La Tosca Social Club v. La Tosca Social Club, 23 App. D. C. 96, and Black Rabbit Asso. v. Munday, 21 Abb. N. C. 99, it was held that members of a social organization could not, by withdrawing therefrom and organizing a corporation of the same name, acquire any right to interfere with the use of such name by the remaining members of the organization.

benefit of the previous work of this organization, and should be permanently enjoined.

Any similarity of name which will be likely to deceive or mislead an ordinary unsuspecting customer may be restrained.

Messer v. The Fadettes, 168 Mass. 140, 37 L.R.A. 721, 60 Am. St. Rep. 371, 46 N. E. 407.

McAlvay, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The parties to this controversy are Michi-

E. 407, the court refused to enjoin the use of the name of an orchestra by a corporation, some of the members of which were members of the original organization, at the instance of one who claimed to have acquired the right to an exclusive use of the name by purchase from the organizer of the orchestra, upon the ground that, so far as the organizer had any right or ownership in the tradename which designated the organization under her management, it was personal to herself, depending upon her personal reputation and skill, and therefore was not assignable, and upon the further ground that the use of the name by such assignee would be only to mislead and defraud the public by implying that she and such musicians as she employed were the same persons who had formerly gained a good reputation under this name.

But in Christy v. Murphy, 12 How. Pr. 77, it was held that the originator of the form of entertainment known as negro minstrelsy was entitled to enjoin the use of the name which he had given a band of performers organized by him, by persons who had formerly been employed by him as members thereof. This case, however, is not necessarily inconsistent with the right of members of an organization to the use of a name which owes its value to their efforts; since, so far as appears therein, whatever value attached to the name was due to the efforts and expenditures of the plaintiff.

An analogous question is presented in the cases involving the rights of members of a labor organization to protection in the exclusive use of a label which owes its value to them. That the members of a union have an interest in the proper use of the labels of the union, which may, upon sufficient grounds, be protected by injunction against the inequitable use of such labels, is expressly held in Schmalz v. Wooley, 57 N. J. Eq. 303, 43 L.R.A. 80, 73 Am. St. Rep. 637, 41 Atl. 939, and Strasser v. Moonelis, 23 Jones & S. 197.

In Allen v. McCarthy, 37 Minn. 349, 34 N. W. 416, the court was equally divided in opinion upon the question whether a complaint brought by plaintiffs as officers and members of a local union, a branch and member of a general organization, to restrain defendant from putting up, selling, gan corporations. The incorporators of complainant for many years before incorporation acted together in a voluntary association under the same name as incorporated, and claim that defendant, without any right, and intending to injure their corporation in its business, etc., wrongfully adopted the name of "Finney's Famous Orchestra," and have, by falsely claiming to be the original Finney's Orchestra, greatly injured complainant in its business. Complainant claims the sole right to use the name "Finney's Orchestra," and filed its bill of complaint against defendant, asking that it be perpetually enjoined from using the name "Finney's Orchestra" or the name stamping, or offering for sale any boxes containing any cigars whatever having posted, placed, or put thereon a label or trademark in imitation of plaintiff's label, and having thereon the words "Union-Made Cigars," showed the plaintiffs to be entitled to assert a proprietary claim or interest in the device or trademark.

That a person—using the term in its broadest sense, as including individuals, firms, corporations—will be protected in the use of a name which he has attached to his business, and to which he has no claim other than may be based on the circumstance that his efforts have made it valuable, may be demonstrated by reference to the following cases: Woodward v. Lazar, 21 Cal. 448, 82 Am. Dec. 751; Busch v. Gross, 71 N. J. Eq. 503, 64 Atl. 754; Howard v. Henriques, 3 Sandf. 725; Martell v. St. Francis Hotel Co. 51 Wash. 375, 98 Pac. 1116, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 503 (names of hotels); Gamble v. Stephenson, 10 Mo. App. 581 (name of restaurant); Dewitt v. Mathey, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 257, 35 S. W. 1113 (name of saloon); Weinstock, L. & Co. v. R. 5 Ch. 155 (names attached to various other sorts of business).

"Finney" in any way, or representing itself to be the original "Finney's Orchestra." Defendant answered this bill of complaint by answer in the nature of a cross bill, praying affirmative relief, and the benefit of a demurrer. Answers were filed to the cross bill by complainant and by the twenty-three members of complainant organization. The record shows a motion on the part of cross-complainant to strike the answer of the members of the complainant corporation from the files. No disposition appears to have been made of this motion by any formal order. It does appear that it was "held pending the hearing of case." Replications were later filed by complainant and defendant. The issues joined were heard before the Wayne circuit court, in chancery, and a decree granted to complainant. Defendant appeals. The main contention in the case is upon the facts presented.

We agree with the findings and conclusion of the trial judge. The evidence preponderates greatly in favor of complainant, the membership of which includes all but three of the entire number of a voluntary association, known since the year 1899 by the name under which they have now become a legal organization under the laws of this state. Theodore Finney during his lifetime organized and conducted an orchestra known as "Finney's Orchestra" in the year 1864. This he continued to manage and conduct until his death, April 7, 1899. By his will he gave his music and musical instruments to his friend, Frank Mosby, with the request "to keep up the organization of the Finney Orchestra during his natural life." Mosby proceeded at once to do this with the assistance of his fellow associates. The old members, and such as were considered competent by them to be added from time to time, continued to act together with this common purpose under the name of Finney's Orchestra. Each year elections were held, and officers and a manager were elected. Mr. Mosby was elected for seven years as president. Fred S. Stone was elected manager, until the election held in January, 1908, when Mr. Shook was elected to that office by a large majority. Mr. Stone's resignation was accepted January 18, 1908. Two of his brothers also withdrew. During these years the record shows without dispute that this voluntary association existed and continued to do a successful business under the name and style of "Finney's Orchestra." Twenty-three remaining members, desiring to become a body corporate known as "Finney's Orchestra," under the law of this state, on January 25, 1908, made, executed, and filed articles of association in the office of the secretary of state, which, after being amended 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to conform with the statute, were finally recorded February 7, 1908. In the meantime, ex-manager Stone and three brothers incorporated as "Finney's Famous Orchestra," on January 27, 1908, and this organization, holding itself out as the "Original Finney's Orchestra," has caused the injuries complained of. It will be of no benefit to the profession to review this evidence. Suffice it to say, we find no single contention of defendant sustained. It may be fairly inferred from the record that the only reason for the organization of defendant association was to accomplish exactly what is charged in the bill of complaint. The name of this organization was the property of those who made it valuable, and its use by others "different from those who earned a reputation thereunder would be a fraud upon the public." Messer v. The Fadettes, 168 Mass. 140, 37 L.R.A. 721, 60 Am. St. Rep. 371, 46 N. E. 407. Such tradenames are protected on the ground of unfair competition. Hopkins, Unfair Trade, §§ 52, 53; Weinstock, L. & Co. v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529-537, 30 L.R.A. 182, 50 Am. St. Rep. 57, 42 Pac. 142. In the last case cited the court said: "Although there can be no property right in a tradename which is not the subject of trademark, yet it is a fraud on a person who has established a trade and carried it on under a given name that some other person should assume the same name or the same name with a slight alteration in such a way as to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with the one who has given a reputation to the name; and an injunction will issue to prevent such fraudulent infringement of the tradename."

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed, with costs.

Election — ballot — marking.

Section 4, art. 1, chap. 17, p. 233, Sess. Laws 1905, under the title of "Elections," provided that on receiving his ballot, "if the voter shall desire to vote for all the candidates of one political party or group of petitioners, he may stamp a cross in the circle which is under the device and in the column above the candidates of the party or group for whom he desires to vote, and such ballot when so marked shall be counted as a straight ticket for all the candidates in the column under said circle." A voter stamped a cross in the circle under a party device, and then stamped a cross in the square immediately to the left of all the names in the same column except the name of plaintiff. Held, that by stamping in the circle under the party device the voter, under the law, voted for all the candidates in the column under said circle, and that the extra markings were without effect.

ERROR to the District Court for Haskell County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action in the nature of quo warranto to try the title to a certain office. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frederick & Mitchell for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Holley & Brown and Clark & Crittenden for defendant in error.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in the nature of quo warranto, brought by the plaintiff in error, plaintiff below, against the defendant in error, defendant below, to try the title to the office of constable of Taloka township, Haskell county, Oklahoma. At the general election held on the 17th day of September, 1907, both plaintiff and defendant were candidates for the office of constable on the Democratic ticket. The judges of election at Garland precinct in said township declared a tie vote between them, and certified their finding to the county commissioners. The commissioners decided the matter by lot, and declared the defendant elected.

It is admitted by counsel that this ruling would be correct, and that the defendant would be legally entitled to the office, if it were not for the fact that the election commissioners counted two ballots for the defendant which the plaintiff insists should have been counted for him. The ballots are made a part of the case made, and are in the usual form, but the plaintiff insists that they were not properly voted. They are stamped with a cross in a circle under the party device and also each candidate on the ticket for Congress, district judge, state senator, representatives, etc., is marked with a cross in the square to the left of their names, with the exception of the office of constable, where the square to the left of defendant's name is marked with a cross and the square to the left of the plaintiff's name left blank. The plaintiff insists that because the voter marked the ticket with a cross in the circle under the device that is a vote for every candidate on the ticket, notwithstanding he also marked all the other candidates in the manner above described, except himself. The court below held that these ballots should be counted for the defendant, and not counted for the plaintiff. Section 41 of chapter 33 (§ 2946) of Wilson's Revised & Annotated Statutes of Oklahoma of 1903, under the title "Elections," provided that, after receiving his ballot, the voter shall enter a booth and in-

Note. — Does marking some but not all of the candidates on a party ticket defeat the effect of marking under the party emblem as a vote for the omitted candidates, where no votes were cast for their opponents.

The conclusion reached in the above case finds support in Dickerman v. Gelsthorpe, 19 Mont. 259, 47 Pac. 999, in which it was held that ballots marked with a cross in a party circle, and also marked with crosses opposite the names of the part of the candidates under such party circle, were properly counted for a candidate thereunder whose name was not so specifically marked, in view of the provision of the Montana Political Code, that if any part of a ballot was sufficiently plain to gather therefrom the voter's intention, it should be counted, as the marking in the party circle was, so far as the legal intent was concerned, equivalent to voting for all candidates under it.

Potts v. Folsom is in accord also with McClelland v. Erwin, 16 Okla. 612, 86 Pac. 283, which is fully set forth in that opinion.

said that when a voter has marked his ticket by placing a cross in the circle opposite the party appellation, no addition is made to the legal effect of that marking by placing crosses opposite the names of candidates on the same party tickets; and this language was approved in Spurrier v. McLennan, 115 Iowa, 461, 88 N. W. 1062, the court adding that crosses in the squares under such circumstances not only do not add to the effect of the mark in the circle, but do not detract from it; in short, they have no consequences whatever. These cases, however, did not involve the point under annotation.

On the other hand it was held in Young v. Simpson, 21 Colo. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 254, 42 Pac. 666, that a general designation by the marking of a ballot with a cross opposite the emblem of a party, indicating an intention to vote for all its candidates, was controlled by a particular designation by the marking of crosses opposite the names of part of the candidates under such emblem, and ballots so marked could not be counted for a candidate of that party opposite whose name no cross appeared.

dicating the candidates for whom he desires to vote by stamping in the square immediately preceding their names, and, if he desires to vote for all the candidates of one political party, he may stamp in the square surrounding the device at the head of the list, and that the vote shall then be counted for all the candidates under that device, unless the square in front of the name of one or more candidates under another device shall also be stamped, in which case the names of the candidates so stamped shall be counted, and the names of other candidates for the same office under the other device on the ballot shall not be counted. This section of the statute was amended by § 4, art. 1, chap. 17, p. 233, Sess. Laws 1905, in which it was provided: "The voter shall then and without leaving the room go into any booth which may be unoccupied, and indicate the candidates for whom he desires to vote by stamping a cross in the square immediately to the left of their names, and indicate his preference on any question or constitutional amendment or other special matter by stamping in the square immediately to the left of and preceding the words 'yes' or 'no' under such question; provided, however, that if the voter shall desire to vote for all the candidates of one political party or group of petitioners, he may stamp a cross in the circle which is under the device and in the column above the candidates of the party or group for whom he desires to vote, and such ballot when so marked shall be counted as a straight ticket for all the candidates in the column under said circle." And § 9, art. 1, chap. 17, p. 240, of the same laws, provides, under instructions of how to vote, that "to vote a straight ticket, stamp in the circle beneath the device. To vote a mixed ticket, stamp in the square to the left of the name of each candidate you desire to vote for."

By the change made in the law as indicated above, it appears to us that it was the intention of the legislature to make the controlling stamp, in the law as it existed at the time of the election held in this case, to be the stamp placed at the head of the list of candidates, and to provide that, where a mixed ticket was to be voted, it was necessary, in order to accomplish this result, and to manifest this intention, each individual candidate to be voted for should be stamped. This rule does not appear to us to have been manifested in the law under which cases such as Young v. Simpson, 21 Colo. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 254, 42 Pac. 666, and Howser v. Pepper, 8 N. D. 484, 79 N. W. 1018, and perhaps some other cases which appear to follow that rule, were decided. It will be noted that the language of the act is mandatory, and that, when the stamp is placed in the circle under the device, such ballot shall be counted as a straight ticket for all the candidates under the column in such circle, and this intention it appears to our minds is emphasized by the language of the instructions noticed. The question of the effect of the stamp and cross opposite the names of the persons voted for, in the same column, over which a stamp had been placed in the device, was dealt with by the supreme court of the territory of Oklahoma in the case of McClelland v. Erwin, 16 Okla. 612, 86 Pac. 283. In the discussion of this question in that case, Justice Irwin, who wrote the opinion for the court, said: "It is next contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that ballots stamped in the device, and then stamped in the square opposite the names of the persons voted for on the same ticket should not be counted. In other words, it is claimed that where the voter puts another stamp upon the ballot which is unnecessary, or makes more stamps than is necessary on the ballot, that this constitutes a distinguishing mark, and that for this reason the ballots should have been rejected. We do not think this is the correct rule." To our minds it seems clear that under this statute a stamp in the circle at the head of the list of candidates is the statutory method provided whereby a voter may manifest his intention to vote for every candidate under that stamp. If this is true, and, after having placed the stamp there, the voter has succeeded in voting for all of these candidates, then the placing of additional stamps in front of the different names on that same list would either constitute distinguishing marks or be without any effect whatsoever. These are held not to be distinguishing marks in the McClelland v. Erwin Case, supra. Hence we conclude they are without effect. Our conclusion herein seems to be supported by the cases of Dickerman v. Gels-thorpe, 19 Mont. 249, 47 Pac. 999; Spurrier v. McLennan, 115 Iowa, 461, 88 N. W. 1062; Whittam v. Zahorik, 91 Iowa, 23, 51 Am. St. Rep. 317, 59 N. W. 57; McKittrick v. Pardee, 8 S. D. 39, 65 N. W. 23. This holding necessarily results in the reversal of the judgment of the lower court.

The cause is accordingly remanded, and action is directed to be taken in accordance with the views herein expressed.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

THOMAS F. DALY, Respt.,

v.

WILLIAM W. OLD et al., Respts.,

and

Surety — change of contract — liability.

The change of the state in which a solicitor of life insurance is to work, after the execution of a bond conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties, will not, although it enlarges his responsibilities, release the surety, where the bond provides that it shall not be annulled or revoked without the consent of the obligee, but shall remain in force, whether under the agent's existing appointment or any future one, and the agency contract provides that the agent shall have authority in the original state, and shall give a satisfactory bond which shall hold good "under this or any future agreement."

Note. — Effect upon bond conditioned for fidelity of employee or agent, of a change in the latter's field of operation or the nature of his duties.

It is generally held that permitting or requiring an employee or agent to perform other duties in addition to those in respect of which the security is given will not discharge the surety if the additional duties are not such as to prevent or hinder the faithful performance by the principal of those for which the bond was given. *Shackamaxon Bank v. In Kellogg v. Scott, 58 N. J. Eq. 344, 44 Atl. 190, affirmed without opinion in 62 N. J. Eq. 811, 48 Atl. 1117, however, it was held that the sureties of a bookkeeper and collector were released by the increase of his duties which required him to act as cashier, so that he had charge of all the cash, though the default was accomplished by false entries as bookkeeper.

In Lane's Appeal, 112 Pa. 499, 5 Atl. 776, where the duty of an employee was to perform all work assigned to him, it was held that the surety was not discharged, though the employment in which the default occurred was in a different branch from that in which he was employed at the time the bond was given.

APPEAL by defendant W. Mont Ferry from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover upon a bond of an insurance solicitor. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richards, Richards, & Ferry for appellant.

Messrs. Snyder & Snyder, for respondents:

Surety contracts will be so construed as to give force and effect to the manifest intention of the parties, and to give force and meaning to the words employed.

In American Teleg. Co. v. Lennig, 139 Pa. 594, 21 Atl. 162, it was held that the surety of the bookkeeper was not relieved, as a matter of law, because the principal was appointed cashier temporarily, in which position he committed the default, which he concealed by a false entry as bookkeeper, but that, if the jury determined that the temporary duties as cashier were not incidental to the employment as bookkeeper, the surety would not be liable.

But Fourth Nat. Bank v. Spinney, 120 N. Y. 560, 24 N. E. 816, affirming 47 Hun, 293, which was similar to the Conkling Case, was distinguished therefrom by the wording of the bond, in which the clause providing for faithful performance of the duties of bookkeeper continues: "Or if" he "shall be appointed to any other office;" and it was held that the appointment of the bookkeeper to other duties did not release his sureties.

A change in the duties of an employee or agent, as distinguished from a mere increase of responsibility under the same duties, or an addition of other duties, will, as a rule, discharge his sureties, and it has been so held under the following circumstances:

Frick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment against appellant, entered by the district court of Salt Lake county.

The judgment is based upon substantially the following facts, as found by the district court: That on the 28th day of October, 1901, the respondent Daly appointed in

—where an agent was removed from the place where he was employed when the bond was given, and transferred to another state, under a new contract. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Armstrong, 7 Kan. App. 314, 54 Pac. 571;

—where the duties of the principal and the place of his employment were changed without the knowledge or consent of the surety. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Hibbs, 21 Mo. App. 574;

—where an agent was appointed to an entirely different position, with greater responsibilities, though the bond contained a clause as follows: "During his employment by said company, in whatever capacity in which he may be engaged, the duties and emoluments of which may be changed from time to time by the company, without notice to the sureties." Iliff v. Western-Southern L. Ins. Co. 11 Ohio C. C. 426;

—where an agreement with a sales agent was changed so that he became a conditional purchaser instead of a mere agent for sales to third parties. Gass v. Stinson, 2 Sumn. 453, Fed. Cas. No. 5,260;

—where a bookkeeper was changed to note teller and discount clerk, where large amounts of money were received by him daily. First Nat. Bank v. Gerke, 68 Md. 449, 6 Am. St. Rep. 453, 13 Atl. 358.

But in the similar case of Rollstone Nat. Bank v. Carleton, 136 Mass. 226, where it was found that the duties as clerk, contemplated in the bond, embraced receiving and paying out money, and not merely those of bookkeeper, it was held that the imposition of such duties was not, as a matter of law, such a change as would discharge the sureties.

That merely increasing the duties of an employee or agent, without changing their nature, will not release the sureties, was held in the following cases:

—Strawbridge v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 14 Md. 360, 74 Am. Dec. 541, where a railway station was changed from second to first class, which increased the responsibility of the agent, because of the increased amount of freight paid there, but did not change the nature of his duties;

26 N. E. 175, where the duties of the cashier were enlarged without changing their nature;

—Collier v. Southern Exp. Co. 32 Gratt. 718, where the sureties for a freight clerk gave a bond conditioned for the faithful performance of all duties required of him in forwarding packages of all kinds, and he was subsequently made the principal agent at that point;

—Kellogg v. Farquhar, 55 Hun, 604, 8 N. Y. Supp. 208, where an agency to sell goods in New York and Brooklyn was construed not to limit the agent to business in those cities, but merely to give him the exclusive sale there, and he made sales elsewhere.

But the contrary was held in the following cases:

—Pybus v. Gibb, 6 El. & Bl. 902, where a statutory increase of the jurisdiction of the court enlarged the responsibility of the bailiff, though his default was in a matter within the former jurisdiction;

—Mumford v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 2 Lea. 393, 31 Am. Rep. 616, where a ticket agent of one of two stations in a city was placed in charge of both stations, which were consolidated; —And Monroe County v. Clark, 92 N. Y. 391, affirming 25 Hun, 282, where the duties of the treasurer were increased by the legislature and supervisors, and it was held that the sureties were not liable for defaults concerning the new duties, but were for those concerning the old.

An increase of responsibility of an officer or member of a firm merely upon an increase of the capital of the firm will not release his surety from liability for his subsequent defalcations. Bank of Wilmington v. Wolleston, 3 Harr. (Del.) 90; Lionberger v. Krieger, 88 Mo. 160; McAuley v. Cooley, 47 Neb. 165, 66 N. W. 304.

And to the same effect is Coombs v. Harford, 99 Me. 426, 59 Atl. 529, where an increase of responsibility of a lodge trustee, because of an increase of the membership, was held not to discharge his sureties.

But in Grocers' Bank v. Kingman, 16 Gray, 473, it was held that the increase of responsibility of a cashier by an increase of the capital stock of the bank was sufficient to release his sureties.

writing one William W. Old as Daly's agent to solicit and procure applications for life insurance, and to perform such other duties in connection therewith as should be intrusted to said agent; that, under the original appointment, said Old was permitted to solicit and procure said applications within the territory of the states of Oregon and Washington; that thereafter, on the 10th day of November, 1901, the territory in which such applications were to be solicited and procured was changed from the states of Oregon and Washington to the states of Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming; that said Old acted under said appointment, and solicited and procured applications within the territory last above named, and did not solicit or procure applications within the states of Oregon and Washington; that on the date first above named, the said Old, as principal, and the appellant, Ferry, and one R. H. Officer, as sureties, executed and delivered to the respondent their obligation in writing, which, among other things, contained the following conditions: "The condition of this obligation is such that whereas the above-named bounden William W. Old has been, under an instrument in writing of even date herewith and hereby referred to, appointed by said Thomas F. Daly, manager, as his agent, for the purpose of procuring applications for life insurance, and performing such other duties in connection therewith as may be intrusted to him: Now, if the said William W. Old shall pay or hand over all moneys payable in any event to Thomas F. Daly, manager, aforesaid, which shall at any time be received by him, or for which he shall be accountable or liable, whether the same shall be or shall have been received by him personally and solely, or by, through, or together with a copartner, coagent, or other persons, including all money so received prior to the date of this instrument (if any such shall be), as well as those received thereafter, as also all moneys which he now owes, or hereafter may owe, said Thomas F. Daly, manager, aforesaid, on account of advances made to him or otherwise, . . . and shall also on the 10th day of each month hereafter account for, remit, and pay over to said Thomas F. Daly, manager, or his successors, or whenever otherwise required so to do by said Thomas F. Daly, manager, or his successors to his office, all moneys due by him (not previously remitted and duly accounted for), as such agent, less his commission and allowances as expressly authorized by his written appointment, or such other written instructions as he may receive, and shall also, on the 25th day of each month make and render to said Thomas F. Daly, manager, or his successors, or whenever otherwise requested so to do, a full, just, and true account of said moneys and the sources from whence they shall have been received, then this obligation shall be void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect. It being agreed and understood that this obligation shall not be annulled or revoked without the consent of the above-named Thomas F. Daly, manager, aforesaid, but shall be and remain in force so long as said William W. Old shall continue to be the agent of said Thomas F. Daly, manager, aforesaid, whether under his existing appointment or any future one, and whether such present or future agency be sole, or whether said William W. Old be joined with any other person or persons, and until all transactions under such agency shall have been finally adjusted and settled, and all liabilities of said William W. Old by reason thereof shall have been discharged; it is, however, expressly agreed that neither forbearance nor the extension of time for the payment of moneys due or to become due, or failure to notify said sureties hereunder, shall operate as a waiver of their liability, but that their liability shall continue as long as said Thomas F. Daly, manager, shall have a valid demand against said William W. Old." The court also found "that said undertaking was executed in consideration that plaintiff (respondent) would appoint defendant Old as agent within the states of Oregon and Washington, or for any other territory; . . . that the sureties intended when they executed the bond to become bound as sureties for the defendant Old under such new or additional appointment." The court also found that Old had defaulted; that the other surety on the bond had been released by reason of his death, and for a failure to file a claim against his estate, and that the bond was in force against Ferry; and that the sum of $1,413.33 was due thereon, for which he was liable, and the sum of $2,827.46, for which Old was liable, and entered judgment accordingly, from which Ferry alone appeals.

Counsel in their brief state the errors to be reviewed by us as follows: "Objections were made to the sufficiency of the evidence, and to the sufficiency of the findings, all of which raise the sole question whether this provision in the bond was sufficiently broad in its terms to hold the sureties for a default of the principal, Old, in writing insurance in a territory not covered by the contract referred to. All other assignments of error, not being fatal to the plaintiff's recovery on retrial, numerous though they were, are abandoned." It is asserted by counsel for appellant that, under the original contract, the defendant Old was appointed agent to solicit and procure applications for life insurance within certain specified territory; that this territory was abandoned and the states of Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming substituted without the knowledge or consent of appellant; and that this constituted such a change or departure from the agreement upon which appellant obligated himself for the default of Old that it avoids the bond. In order to arrive at a correct conclusion, the provisions of the contract of appointment and the bond must be considered and construed together. As we view it, paragraphs 6 and 14 of the contract are the only ones that contain provisions which are material to a determination of the scope of the obligations assumed by appellant. Paragraph 6 is as follows: "It is agreed that the district within which said party of the second part shall have permission to operate is within the states of Oregon and Washington; but said district is not assigned exclusively to him." The 14th paragraph reads as follows: "It is agreed that said party of the second part shall keep deposited with said party of the first part a satisfactory bond for the faithful performance of all duties pertaining to his agency, and that said bond shall hold good under this or any future agreement." By referring to the 6th paragraph it will be observed that the territory in which Old is given permission to solicit applications for life insurance is specified to be within the states of Oregon and Washington. For the purpose of this decision, we will assume that within the purview of the clause in the original contract, now under consideration, the appointment of Old was a limited one so far as the territory in which he was to operate was concerned, although the clause does not in terms limit the appointment to those states, but simply gives Old permission to solicit insurance therein. If we now consider the language used in the two paragraphs quoted above in connection with what is expressed in the bond, what was the intention of the parties with regard to the scope of the obligations assumed by appellant? Is it not as clearly stated as it well could be that a new or future agreement and appointment is permitted and contemplated? Is it not just as clearly expressed that the bond in question should apply to such future agreement and appointment? Up to this point, therefore, there cannot be any room for either construction or doubt.

But it is asserted that the agreement and appointment referred to were intended to be limited to some agreement or appointment operative within the states of Oregon and Washington only. By referring to the terms of the contract and bond, it will be seen that no such a limitation is therein expressed. If it exists at all, therefore, it must be implied. What is there in either the contract or bond from which such a limitation may be implied? It seems to us the parties have in terms provided against such an implication, in view of the language contained in the 14th paragraph of the contract, and in further view of what is said in the bond itself. In the contract the particular agency for which the bond is to be in force is expressly stated. The agency there referred to is, and can be, no other than the agency under which applications for life insurance were to be solicited, and such transactions as are naturally and necessarily connected therewith. This, to our minds, is clearly and unambiguously expressed. This being so, there is no room for the application of the doctrine that where general terms are used in any instrument, which, if standing alone, would extend the obligation thereby assumed beyond the subject-matter of the contract, such general expressions must be strictly limited to the subject-matter of the contract. This is good law and good sense, for the reason that the parties contracted and became obligated with regard to the business mentioned in the contract, and not with regard to matters pertaining to any and every kind of business or calling. To so construe general language in any obligation would be to extend the obligation beyond the intention of the parties, and would bind when neither party, at the time of entering into the obligation, intended such a result. In this case, however, the parties have expressly provided that a future agreement and appointment with regard to soliciting applications for life insurance might be entered into, and when entered into, the bond should cover such future agreement and appointment as well as the existing ones. This right is given in the most general terms without restriction or limitation of any kind.

In view of the right thus conferred upon Daly and Old, can it be said that they did not have authority to enlarge the duties and responsibilities of Old in the future agreement and appointment? The right to do this inevitably follows from the mere fact of being authorized to enter into a new or future agreement and to make a new appointment. While the future agreement and appointment in the contract was limited to a life insurance agency, as we have pointed out, it was not limited otherwise. If it be conceded, as we think it must be, that Daly and Old could change or modify the existing provisions and conditions of the old contract and appointment, or add new provisions, and thereby enlarge the duties and responsibilities of Old in the future agreement and appointment, as compared with the old one, how can it be reasonably contended that such enlarged duties and responsibilities should be limited to one thing rather than another, so long as such conditions and responsibilities pertained to the agency expressly referred to in the contract? In what way did the fact of extending the territory in which Old might solicit affect appellant's obligation, except, perhaps, to enlarge Old's duties and responsibilities? A mere enlargement of the duties and responsibilities of Old could not affect appellant's right, because to do this was expressly authorized by him. We say this because the right to enter into a new or future agreement and to make a future appointment was expressly given. The agreement which was authorized therefore must have meant just what the term "future agreement" signifies, viz., the right to formulate and agree upon terms and conditions when limited to the business of soliciting applications for life insurance, and the matters incident thereto; in other words, to the agency referred to in the 14th paragraph of the contract. In any contract or obligation the terms and conditions control, and any change in any one of them, without the consent of all the parties thereto, if material, voids the agreement, because it no longer constitutes the actual agreement entered into. But if a party to any agreement expressly agrees that he will be bound by any future agreement with regard to the subject-matter covered by the existing one, it is not easy to perceive why he should be bound by some, and not by all, of the provisions contained in the new agreement. If he wanted to limit his liability, it was an easy matter to have expressed it in the agreement; but, not having done so, how can a court place a limitation upon one provision rather than upon another of the new agreement which was entered into with his consent? If in such a case he is bound by all of the provisions agreed to by him in the old agreement, why is he relieved from any that are contained in the new one, so long as the provisions of the new agreement relate to the business covered by the old one? To hold that appellant expressly authorized the future agreement and appointment, but that he is relieved from the new responsibilities imposed by the new agreement, is tantamount to holding that the same rule applies to the obligation in question as would apply to an ordinary contract or obligation where new duties are imposed without the consent of the party to be bound. Such a holding would, in our judgment, be contrary to the express provisions of the contract and bond in question, and also to the law applicable thereto. The law undoubtedly relieves a party from any obligation not assumed by him, but it just as certainly enforces those that he has assumed. If, in the first instance, the law refuses to bind, it is because the party did not bind himself; and in the second instance the law simply enforces that which the obligor promises or undertakes to do. If the courts should enforce the obligation in the first instance, it would be an act of injustice and wrong to the obligor. If it refused to enforce it in the second, it would amount to the same thing as against the obligee. The only thing, therefore, that the courts are concerned with, is to ascertain the intention of the parties to any contract; and when this is ascertained, the duty to enforce such intention admits of no escape. A primary canon of construction is to construe the language of the parties when applied to the subject-matter of the contract. The language used, when applied to the subject-matter, must be given its usual and ordinary meaning, unless it is clear that certain words or terms are employed in a technical sense. If the intention of the parties cannot readily be ascertained from the language alone, then the court must have recourse to the situation, conditions, and circumstances which affected the parties, and from the language, when considered in the light that those matters afford, determine the real intention of the parties.

From hasty and careless expressions in the books it is sometimes assumed that a different and stricter rule of construction is applied to surety or indemnity contracts than to others. Neither principle nor authority support such an assumption. Mr. Justice Straup in the case of Smith v. Bowman, 32 Utah, 38, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 889, 88 Pac. 688, has very clearly and tersely stated the general rule with regard to the application of such contracts in the following language: "In determining the question, it is well to bear in mind that sureties are favorites of the law, and that their liability is not to be extended by implication beyond the terms of their contract. They are bound by their agreement, and nothing else; and they have a right to stand upon the strict terms of their obligations." It must be remembered, however, that the rule there stated applies to the application of the contract when the intention of the parties is ascertained, and not to the rule applicable in ascertaining such intention. The rules of construction in ascertaining the intention of the parties are the same whether applied to one kind of a contract or another. 22 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 84. This is well expressed by Mr. Justice Rumsey in the case of Gamble v. Cuneo, 21 App. Div. 414, 47 N. Y. Supp. 549, where it is said: "It is quite true that in one sense the contract of a surety is strictissimi juris, and it is not to be extended beyond the express terms in which it is expressed. This rule, however, is not a rule of construction of a contract, but a rule of application of the contract after the construction of it has been ascertained. Where the question is as to the meaning of the language of the contract, there is no difference between the contract of the surety and that of anybody else. . . . In the case of a surety, as in the case of anybody else, when it becomes necessary to construe the contract, the usual rules are to be used, and it is to be interpreted like any other paper." This case was affirmed in 162 N. Y. 634, 57 N. E. 1110. The authorities in support of this doctrine are stated in the opinion there, and need not be referred to here.

If we apply the foregoing rules to the contract and bond in question, it seems to us that there is no room for doubt that the parties, including appellant, intended to cover the acts set forth in the complaint in this case, and to which the trial court applied the bond. If the bond in question had simply in general terms referred to the contract of appointment, and had then stated that the obligor bound himself to indemnify Daly as against the wrongful acts of Old, as stated in the contract, we would have to look to the contract for the purpose of determining what Old was required to do, and the obligation would be limited to such acts. But the bond in question speaks for itself, and in apt terms states just for what acts appellant bound himself. Appellant had the right to enlarge upon the matters enumerated in the contract. The appointment of Old was sufficient consideration for such an enlarged undertaking. But, apart from this, when appellant executed a bond to indemnify against the acts of the agent named in the contract, and in which the duties of the agent were specified, and in which it was further provided that the bond should cover any future agreement, then appellant bound himself by the terms of the future agreement, so long as the future agreement covered the business or agency referred to in the original contract. This is just what the parties expressed in the 14th paragraph of the contract. We therefore are not confronted with a case where nothing is said about what the future agreement shall cover. In this case the contemplated future agreement was limited to the business or agency of soliciting applications for life insurance only. The parties, therefore, fixed their own limitation; and since no other was expressed, what right have we to imply one? If nothing had been said in the contract with regard to what the future appointment should relate to, then, under the general rule that general expressions, however broad they may be, must nevertheless be limited to the things which constitute the subject-matter of the contract, would apply.

But how can such a rule be applicable when the contract expressly provides against it? All of the acts complained of are expressly covered by the bond. True, they arose under a future agreement and appointment, but they all come within the agency expressly referred to in both the contract and the bond. As we have seen, to extend the agency of Old to the states of Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming, in addition to those of Oregon and Washington, was no more than to enlarge upon the duties and responsibilities of Old, and the authority to do this was as clearly given as was the right to enter into a future contract and to make a future appointment, either or both of which the bond was intended to cover. To say that the future agreement and appointment was intended to be operative within the states of Oregon and Washington only not only robs the language used of its full force and effect, but a limitation placed thereon would be unreasonable in view of the circumstances. By the original contract Old was permitted to operate in the states of Oregon and Washington. What reason, therefore, was there to enter into a future agreement or make a future appointment limited to those states only? So far as the record discloses, there was no reason for this whatever. The right to enter into any future agreement, and to make a future appointment, in the absence of any limitation in the original agreement or in the bond, must therefore be held to mean just what it implies; namely, to make an agreement and appointment to solicit applications for life insurance in a place or places not already covered by the original agreement. No new appointment was necessary to authorize Old to solicit in Oregon and Washington. He had this right; but a new appointment and additional permission were necessary if his agency was to be extended to some other territory. Are we to say that the bond was to be limited to an appointment which was not necessary, but not to be extended to one which was necessary if any new agreement or appointment was made? It is quite true that either Mr. Old or Mr. Daly might become dissatisfied with some of the other provisions of the original contract, and might have desired the right to modify or change them. But this is mere conjecture. It is just as likely that the place wherein permission was given to carry on the business of the agency would prove undesirable as that any other provision of the contract might do so. The right to change, extend, or modify any provision of the original contract was given, if any right was given at all. We therefore have no right to place a limit upon one of the obligations rather than upon another, all of which are contained in the contract, when the parties have not indicated by apt language, either in express terms or by necessary implication, that a limitation was intended.

But it may be suggested that if it be held that the future agreement and appointment given extended the agency of Old to the states of Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming, then it could for the same reasons be extended to France, Germany, China, Japan, or Africa, and the appellant would still be bound. The appellant had a right to so bind himself if he wanted to, and, if he did, the courts could not relieve him simply because it may seem unreasonable for him to do such a thing in advance. It is easy at times to be led away from the real question by having recourse to extreme cases as illustrations for the purpose of applying well-known legal principles. But the suggestion is not such that cannot be answered. One answer is that we have no such a case before us at this time. Another answer is that the thing suggested would not necessarily follow, even though we gave full scope and effect to the language employed in the contract and bond before us. As we have seen, in arriving at the intention of the parties to any contract, the surrounding circumstances and conditions by which the parties are affected are always to be considered. These matters may be made to appear by proper evidence, and from the language used, when considered in the light of the matters referred to, the real intention of the parties must be ascertained; and it would not be assumed that they intended a future agreement and appointment to apply to conditions and circumstances entirely foreign to and different from those surrounding them and which affected the contemplated business concerning which they were contracting. It frequently occurs in arriving at the true meaning of language used in a statute, and of the real intention of the legislature in using it, that courts must give words, phrases, and even clauses either an enlarged or restricted meaning, so as to make the law conform to the real intention of its authors, as the same is gleaned from the whole law or statute. This is, if possible, more often the case with regard to written contracts. The ordinary meaning of certain language must, in some instances, be enlarged, and in others restricted, so as to make the contract, when considered as a whole, conform to the real and manifest intention of the parties, notwithstanding that the literal meaning of a word, phrase, or clause, when considered by itself, would be given a different meaning. 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 376; Hilton v. Thatcher, 31 Utah, 370, 88 Pac. 20. In view of this rule, any court might thus be justified in holding that foreign countries were not, and could not have been, within the contemplation of the parties, and that it was not their intention to cover them, or any one of them, by the terms used in the agreement. If, therefore, it were manifest that such was not the intention of the parties, then the court would hold it not their contract, and hence would not enforce it as literally written. But would it not be somewhat unreasonable to contend that, because certain language used was not intended to apply to the whole world, therefore it was not intended to apply to any part of it outside of the particular place where the contract was made? We take judicial notice of the general scope and extent of the territory named in the contract, and to which the appointment applied, and of the general history and the number of inhabitants, and of their general condition, so far as this is a matter of common or general knowledge. Are the conditions prevailing in Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming so different from those existing in Oregon and Washington that it may be assumed that the parties, because of such difference, did not intend to extend the agency of Old to those states? We think not. There is nothing in the conditions, therefore, from which a limitation could be implied.

The only ground, therefore, upon which a limitation can rest, is that the scope of Old's duties and responsibilities was enlarged, and that therefore the appellant's obligation should not be extended to such new duties and responsibilities. If appellant had so limited his obligation either in express terms or by language from which such a limitation could reasonably be implied, then he could not have been held upon this bond. He did not do so; but, upon the other hand, there are numerous expressions in the bond which clearly forbid us to make such a limitation without disregarding the ordinary rules of construction, and doing violence to the ordinary sense to be imputed to the language used. In dealing with this question we have considered the term "future agreement," as used in the contract, as referring to a future appointment, which is referred to in the bond. We think that to do this is not only permissible, but is necessary, in view of the circumstances. The contract was executed first, and the bond expressly refers to the contract. In the bond it is said that the bond shall remain in force "whether under his [Old's] existing appointment, or any future one." This was a construction by the parties themselves of what was meant by the term "future agreement," used in the contract. Appellant is bound by this construction, and therefore must be held to have consented to a future agreement and appointment. The future appointment, therefore, must have been intended to be other than the existing one, but with reference to the business of soliciting applications for life insurance. That it was limited to an agency for that purpose only is made clear in the 14th paragraph, wherein it is said that the bond should be given for the "faithful performance of all duties pertaining to his [Old's] agency, and that it should hold good," etc. This, thus, was a limitation only with regard to the business intrusted to the agent, and not upon the duties and responsibilities that might be imposed under a future agreement and appointment.

We are not unmindful of the rule invoked by counsel for appellant, and as illustrated in the case of Singer Mfg. Co. v. Hibbs, 21 Mo. App. 574. In that case the territory for which the agent was appointed was clearly defined, and no right was there given to extend the scope of the agency. Under such circumstances, the court in that case properly held that the bondsmen were not liable for the defalcations of the agent, occurring in some other place than the one for which he was appointed. Under such circumstances, the bond is limited to the place or territory for which the agent is appointed as well as to the acts contemplated by the appointment. Not so in this case. A future agreement and appointment are expressly provided for. It would therefore be just as unreasonable to say that the bond in question does not extend to the acts occurring under the future appointment, as it would have been to have held in the Hibbs Case that the bond in question in that case did so extend. While counsel for respondents have not cited any case, and we have found none, which is exactly parallel in its facts with those of the case at bar, we nevertheless think that the following cases cover and are decisive of the principles involved and which we have discussed: New York L. Ins. Co. v. Hamlin, 100 Wis. 17, 75 N. W. 421; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Reynolds, 168 Mass. 588, 60 Am. St. Rep. 417, 47 N. E. 438; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Stiles, 82 App. Div. 441, 81 N. Y. Supp. 664; Western New York L. Ins. Co. v. Clinton, 66 N. Y. 326. All of the foregoing cases except the last one relate to indemnity bonds where the right was given to make changes in the original contract of appointment, or to make a new agreement or appointment. In view of such a right being given, it is held that the obligations of the bond extended to the acts under the new agreement or appointment. It is clearly held that where the right is given to enter into a future agreement or to make a new appointment, it makes no difference that the responsibilities and duties of the agent are enlarged under the new appointment. The bond, it is held, applies to the acts under 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the new agreement or appointment to the same extent as it did to those of the original agreement or appointment. Every question was involved in those cases that is involved here except the change of territory; but, as this change of territory can involve nothing except an enlargement of the duties and responsibilities of the agent Old, there is no escape from the conclusion that the cases referred to above are decisive of the principle which is involved in this case.

In considering all of the terms of the contract and bond in question, we are clearly of the opinion that the parties intended to extend the bond to the acts of Old which are involved in this case, and that the trial court committed no error in its findings, conclusion, and judgment.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs to appellant.

APPEAL by J. P. Watt, Executor, from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Manitowoc County adjudging invalid the will of James Kavanaugh, deceased. Reversed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This proceeding was brought in the county court to construe the will of James Kavanaugh, deceased, which is as follows:

I, James Kavanaugh, of Maple Grove, Wisconsin, being of sound mind and memory and undersanding, but considering the uncertainties of human life, do make and declare this to be my last will and testament.

First. After the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, I give, devise, and bequeath all the rest of my property, both real estate and personal property, for masses for the repose of my father's and mother's and sister's and brother's and my own soul. The masses will be said according to the directions of Thomas J. Fenlon and J. P. Watt, of Maple Grove, Wis., and I hereby appoint them to direct where and when to say said masses. I hereby appoint J. P. Watt, of Maple Grove, Wis., as executor of this my last will and testament.

Signed and acknowledged this ninth day of March, 1908. his

mark

Signed and acknowledged by said testator in the presence of us who hereunto subscribe our names in the presence of said testator and of each other. John E. Mullens.

M. J. Kavanaugh.

The county court held that the provision in the will, which provides that "after the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, I give, devise, and bequeath all the rest of my property, both real and personal, for masses for the repose of my father's and mother's and sister's and brother's and my own soul," is wholly void and of no effect. On appeal the circuit court affirmed the judgment of the county court and entered judgment accordingly, from which this appeal was taken.

Messrs. E. L. Kelley and P. H. Martin, for appellant:

A bequest for masses is a valid public charity.

Mr. J. S. Anderson, with Messrs. Burke & Craite, and Nash & Nash, for respondents:

The will attempts to create a private trust, in violation of statute.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondents, heirs at law, attack the will under consideration upon the grounds: (1) That it is void, independent of any statute, for uncertainty and indefiniteness; (2) that it attempts to create a private trust in violation of statute; and (3) that, if it attempts to create a public trust, it is nevertheless void because, under the equity powers of the court, it is too indefinite and uncertain to be enforced. On the part of the appellant it is insisted that the will is simple, the intent plain, and the purpose lawful; that it creates a public charity and as such is valid. Respondents rely mainly upon McHugh v. McCole, 97 Wis. 166, 40 L.R.A. 724, 65 Am. St. Rep. 106, 72 N. W. 631. Starting with the proposition laid down in McHugh v. McCole, supra, that the trust was private and, therefore, too indefinite and uncertain to be enforced by a court of equity, the court easily reached the conclusion that the bequest for masses was void. No proof was made in the McHugh Case that the masses were not private in their nature, and for the sole benefit of the souls of the giver and others specifically mentioned. No evidence was offered as to the nature of the masses, whether public or private, and the court rested its opinion upon the idea that the trust was purely private. Had the court started with the proposition that a bequest for masses is a public charity, a different conclusion, doubtless, would have been reached in the McHugh Case.

Counsel for respondents insist that the bequest violates § 2081, Stat. If, as was assumed in the McHugh Case, the trust were private, there would be much force in this contention, since under this section the trust must be fully expressed and clearly defined on the face of the instrument creating it. But this argument is based upon the proposition that the trust created in the case before us is a private trust, not a public charity. So we are brought to the question whether a bequest for masses is a "public charity." Bequests for religious purposes date very far back in judicial history. Some reference is made to them, and cases collected, in a quaint old book entitled, "Law of Charitable Uses, Revised and Much Enlarged; with Many Cases in Law Both Ancient and Modern," printed in 1676 under the censorship of Francis North. At page 35 of this work is found a will dated January 17, 1524, from which we quote some of the "items."

"Item, I Will, after my decease, that A., my wife, have my House called C. during her natural Life, and she to keep up the reparations of said House, and the Lords Rent to pay, and she to find four Tapers of four pounds of Wax; that is, one before the Rude under the Rude Loft, and another before our Lady; another before St. Thomas, and one before St. Anthony.

"Item, I Will, That she keep mine Obit every year during her Life, and to have every year three Priests, and they to have Eight pence a piece, and two dozen of Bread, and a Kinderkin of double Beer, and two Cheeses, price of Twenty pence.

"Item, I Will, and appoint after my decease That all and singular my Evidences, and my Copies, that they be delivered into the custody of the Churchwardens of the Parish of Peter and Paul, of T. aforesaid.

"Item, I Will, That after the natural life of A., my wife, that them my House called C. with all the Appurtenances belonging thereunto, as is more plainly specified by my deeds; that it shall remain evermore unto the Church aforesaid; First, to keep mine Obit yearly, and the four Tapers of four pounds of Wax. Moreover, I Will, That after the decease of A., my wife, that the Churchwardens do buy six pounds of Wax, and make the common Light, and the Taper before the Rude, to the full of two pounds of Wax apiece, and so to continue for evermore; and the residue of the Rent to remain to the reparations of the Church aforesaid."

Also, on page 41, another will, dated July 1, 1523, by the terms of which there was given

"several of her Lands to the use of the Priests Service, in the Church of St. Peter in Stowe-Market, to pray for her Soul, and the Souls of her Husbands and others, for 99 years and the Lands to be sold by her Co-Feoffees, and the one half of the Money to go to the making of the High-way, between Stowe and Ipswich; and the other to be divided, one part to a Priest, to say Prayers in the said Church of S. Peter, for her Soul, and the Souls of the afore-rehearsed. . . ."

The following authorities also relate to charitable bequests pertaining to religious purposes: Baker v. Sutton, 1 Keen, 224; Felan v. Russell, 4 Ir. Eq. Rep. 701; Powerscourt v. Powerscourt, 1 Molloy, 616; Moggridge v. Thackwell, 1 Ves. Jr. 464; Doe ex dem. Phillips v. Aldridge, 4 T. R. 264; Tysen, Charitable Bequests, chap. 10, p. 118; Re Michel, 28 Beav. 39; Tudor, Charities & Mortmain.

There is much conflict in the early and some in the late cases as to what is and what is not a "public charity." Many of the bequests in England were held void as being to superstitious uses; but no such rule or principle obtains in this country. Hence the decisions declaring gifts or bequests void as gifts to superstitious uses have no application here. McHugh v. McCole, supra. The doctrine of superstitious uses under the statute of 1 Edw. VI. chap. 14, under which devises for masses were held void, has never obtained in the United States, where there is absolute religious equality. Webster v. Sughrow, 69 N. H. 380, 48 L.R.A. 100, 45 Atl. 139, and cases cited.

Indeed, the question is not new in this state. In McHugh v. McCole, supra, it was held that, had the bequest been direct to a bishop or priest for masses for the repose of the souls of the persons named in the will, it would have been valid, but that the contested provisions of the will were void trusts and not valid personal bequests. No claim is made by appellant that the trust is private. The main questions for determination, therefore, are whether the bequest for masses is a public charity and sufficiently definite for enforcement by a court of equity. No proof was made in the McHugh Case that masses are public in their nature, or for the benefit of mankind generally, and whether the court should have taken notice of this fact without proof we need not consider here, because in the case before us such proof was made. It was shown by competent evidence that the sacrifice of the mass is a public service, not alone for the repose of the souls of the deceased members mentioned, but for the benefit of all mankind, and so understood by all members of the Catholic Church. So, while the masses may be intended to benefit the souls of the departed mentioned, the benefits are public as well, therefore, come within the designation of a public charity. Masses are religious observances, and come within the religious or pious uses which are upheld as public charities. Re Schouler, 134 Mass. 426; Rhymer's Appeal, 93 Pa. 142, 39 Am. Rep. 736; Hoeffler v. Clogan, 171 Ill. 462, 40 L.R.A. 730, 63 Am. St. Rep. 241, 49 N. E. 527; Webster v. Sughrow, supra; Seda v. Huble, 75 Iowa, 429, 9 Am. St. Rep. 495, 39 N. W. 685; Sherman v. Baker, 20 R. I. 446, 40 L.R.A. 717, 40 Atl. 11. A gift to be applied consistently with existing laws for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their hearts under the influence of education or religion, is a "charity." Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 539. In Hoeffler v. Clogan, supra, the bequest was of certain property "to sell the same and expend the proceeds of said sale in saying masses for the repose of my soul and the souls of my deceased wife, Margaret Clogan, my mother-in-law, Ellen Hurley, and my brother-in-law, James Hurley." The bequest was held valid, and many cases are cited and discussed in the opinion. The tendency of the courts is to uphold charitable trusts, in accordance with the intent of the donor and consistently with rules of law, and this court has asserted the doctrine in no uncertain terms in several cases. The question has been so exhaustively treated in Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 70, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1103, and Harrington v. Pier, 105 Wis. 485, 50 L.R.A. 307, 76 Am. St. Rep. 924, 82 N. W. 345, that further discussion seems unnecessary.

According to the doctrine of the Catholic Church as established by the proof in this case, the whole church profits by every mass, since the prayers of the mass include all of the faithful, living and dead. The sacrifice of the mass contemplates that all mankind shall participate in its benefits and fruit. "The mass is the unbloody sacrifice of the cross, and the object for which it is offered up is, in the first place, to honor and glorify God; secondly, to thank Him for His favors; third, to ask His blessing; fourth, to propitiate Him for the sins of all mankind. The individuals who participate in the fruits of this mass are the person or persons for whom the mass is offered, all of those who assist at the mass, the celebrant himself, and for all mankind, within or without the fold of the church." So, it seems clear upon reason and authority, under the doctrine of the Catholic Church, as established by the evidence in this case, that a bequest for masses is a "charitable bequest," and valid as such, although the repose of the souls of particular persons be mentioned. But it is said that the present bequest is too indefinite and uncertain to be enforceable, and is void under the statutes of this state, and independent of any statute. The contention that the will is void for uncertainty, independent of any statute, is without foundation under the authorities. The fundamental principle to observe in the construction of wills is to seek out the intention of the testator. This rule has been so often stated by this court that citation of authority is unnecessary. The intention of the testator in this case is plain from the terms of the will, namely, that his property be applied, first, to the payment of his debts, and the residue devoted by Fenlon and Watt to the celebration of masses. The bequest for masses being, as we have seen, a charitable bequest and for the benefit of mankind in general, the statute relating to trusts (§ 2081) does not apply. Dodge v. Williams, and Harrington v. Pier, supra. It is true, as stated by this court in Webster v. Morris, 66 Wis. 366, 57 Am. Rep. 278, 28 N. W. 353, and again in Harrington v. Pier, supra, that some degree of certainty must be observed in charitable bequests. "The scheme of charity must be sufficiently indicated, or a method provided whereby it may be ascertained, and its object made sufficiently certain, to enable the court to enforce the execution of the trust according to such scheme and for such object. It must be of such a tangible nature that the court can deal with it. The mere direction to expend money 'for charitable purposes' at large is too indefinite to be carried into execution." The certainty must be determined not with reference to § 2081, Stat., or that which is required in regard to private trusts, "but with reference to those liberal rules for judicial construction applicable to charitable trusts." Harrington v. Pier, supra.

Counsel also contend that, since the estate of the testator consisted principally of real estate, and the will not providing for a disposition of the lands to anyone, it is void. But this contention brings us again to the distinction between a private trust and a public or charitable bequest. In the former, statutory certainty is required, while in the latter it is not. The certainty of beneficiaries holding the title in cases of private trusts does not obtain in cases of public trusts. And this is necessarily so from the nature of public trusts as distinguished from private trusts. This subject has been fully covered in Harrington v. Pier, supra. At page 514 of 105 Wis., the court said: "It follows that indefiniteness of beneficiaries who can invoke judicial authority to enforce the trust, want of a trustee if there be a trust in fact, or indefiniteness in details of the particular purpose declared, the general limits being reasonably ascertainable, or indefiniteness of mode of carrying out the particular purpose, does not militate against the validity of a trust for charitable uses. Given a trust, with or without a trustee, a particular purpose,—as education, or relief of the poor, as distinguished from a bequest to charity generally,—and a class great or small, and without regard to location, necessarily, as 'worthy indigent females' or 'indigent young men studying for the ministry' or 'resident poor,' or 'indigent children of Rock county,' or 'the boys and girls of California' (People ex rel. Ellert v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 35 L.R.A. 269, 45 Pac. 270), and we have a good trust for charitable uses. The court, through its strictly judicial power, may fill the office of trustee if necessary, the trustee can select the immediate beneficiaries or objects within the designated class and scheme; he can determine upon the details necessary to effect the intention of the donor within the general limits of his declared purpose, and execute the trust accordingly; and the proper public agencies, if necessary, can invoke judicial power to enforce such execution."

Section 2075, Stat., which provides that "every disposition of lands, whether by deed or devise, hereafter made, except as otherwise provided in these statutes, shall be directly to the person in whom the right to the possession and the profits shall be intended to be vested, and not to any other, to the use of or in trust for such person, and if made to one or more persons in trust for or to the use of another, no estate or interest, legal or equitable, shall vest in the trustee,"—is also relied upon by respondents as rendering the will void. But this statute is not controlling in cases of public trusts where indefiniteness is of the essence of the charity; nor is it controlling in this case, because the will created an equitable conversion, and the estate of the testator must be treated as personal property. The terms of the will could not be carried out without converting the real estate into personalty. The evidence shows that the estate left amounted to about $6,000, consisting of real and personal property. The real estate was mortgaged for $1,200 or $1,500. The debts allowed by the county court amounted to about $917. The amount of money left was $400, and the personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts. So it is apparent that conversion of the real estate was necessary to carry out the terms of the will. Consequently the doctrine of equitable conversion applies. Harrington v. Pier, 105 Wis. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Harrington v. Pier, supra, page 492 of 105 Wis., quoting from Given v. Hilton, 95 U. S. 591, 24 L. ed. 458, this court said: "The blending of real estate and personal property in one fund for all the purposes of the will is generally regarded as evidencing intent that the whole estate shall be treated as personal property, even though a necessity therefor does not exist; but such evidence is not conclusive on the question."

It seems clear that the testator intended an equitable conversion. The main question in the case before us, therefore, is whether a bequest for masses is a charitable bequest, and, this being determined in the affirmative, we easily reach the conclusion that the will is valid. In Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 70, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1103, and Harrington v. Pier, supra, it is determined, after an exhaustive review of the authorities, that chancery had jurisdiction over public trusts or charities in England before the statute of 43 Elizabeth, chap. 4, and such chancery jurisdiction became a part of our jurisprudence, and, therefore, charitable trusts may be enforced, and are not controlled by our statutes of uses and trusts. In the nature of things this was held necessary because a public trust or charitable use is necessarily indefinite and uncertain, especially as to beneficiaries; that a public trust begins where a private trust ends as regards certainty and definiteness. Of course some degree of certainty must obtain even in a public trust. The scheme of charity must be sufficiently indicated, or a method provided whereby it may be ascertained and its objects made sufficiently certain to enable the court to enforce an execution of the trust according to the scheme. Webster v. Morris, 66 Wis. 366, 57 Am. Rep. 278, 28 N. W. 353; Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 70, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1103; Harrington v. Pier, 105 Wis. 485, 50 L.R.A. 307, 76 Am. St. Rep. 924, 82 N. W. 345. In charitable bequests no trustee need be named, as a charity will not be allowed to fail for want of a trustee. The person named in the will to execute the charity will be held to be the trustee, and, if necessary that he hold the title for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the will, he will by implication hold such title. Kemmerer v. Kemmerer, 223 Ill. 327, 122 Am. St. Rep. 169, 84 N. E. 256; Harrington v. Pier, supra. Since there was equitable conversion in the instant case, the statutes respecting perpe-tuities need not be considered even if applicable to charitable bequests.

After the decision of this court in Danforth v. Oshkosh, 119 Wis. 262, 97 N. W. 258, the legislature passed chapter 511, Laws 1905, which amends § 2039, Stat., by adding to the exceptions from the operation of that section real estate devised to a charitable use. So that since the passage of this amendment the statute against perpetuities (§ 2039) does not include devises to a charitable use. However, we need not consider the effect of this amendment, because of the doctrine of equitable conversion we are only dealing with personal property. In so far as McHugh v. McCole, 97 Wis. 166, 40 L.R.A. 724, 65 Am. St. Rep. 106, 72 N. W. 631, conflicts with anything said in this opinion, it must be regarded overruled.

It follows that the bequest for masses is valid, and that the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Marshall, J., concurring (filed June 10, 1910):

I choose to add a few words to the able opinion for the court by my Brother Kerwin, in order to make more significant that preservation of the public trust intended by the donor does not depend upon the doctrine of equitable conversion, and treat, briefly, some suggested infirmities in the trust, made during our consideration, which might otherwise cause doubt as to the soundness of the court's conclusions.

The full reintrenchment in the jurisprudence of this state of the common-law doctrine of charities was significantly commenced in Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 70, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1103, and though thrown, unfortunately, into some confusion thereafter, was so cleared up, as was supposed, for all time in Harrington v. Pier, 105 Wis. 485, 50 L.R.A. 307, 76 Am. St. Rep. 924, 82 N. W. 345; Hood v. Dorer, 107 Wis. 149, 82 N. W. 546, and Danforth v. Oshkosh, 119 Wis. 262, 97 N. W. 258, as to leave no vestige of the supposed application to charities of our statutory restrictions upon conveying property in perpetuity, except as to real estate. In that situation, as suggested in the opinion of the writer, concurred in by my Brother Siebeck, in the Danforth Case, legislative assistance was necessary to enable the court to rescue our system from the exceptional interference to one conveying his property to charitable uses. It was confidently thought that the people of this state, with a full understanding of such interference, would promptly, through the proper channel, and speedily make the public policy of our commonwealth conform to the well-nigh world-wide conception of the importance of promoting the wishes of possessors of privately accumulated wealth to devote the same to the betterment of mankind. At the very first opportunity thereafter chapter 511, Laws 1905, was passed, exempting real estate from the limitations upon the right to suspend the absolute power of alienation. So, now, one can freely convey his property in perpetuity, real or personal, in trust for any designated charitable use upon any general scheme to that end. Charity, sweet charity, has thus come into its own. This is deemed to be such a valuable consummation to the people of this state that, in a case like this, the doctrine of equitable conversion, so many times resorted to as a convenient way of avoiding the once supposed infirmity in our system hampering owners of property in their efforts to devote the same to the public good, no longer cuts any figure. In my judgment, if referred to at all, it should be relegated to an insignificant place. Here the donor had an undoubted right to devote his real estate to his chosen charity. True, if there was any doubt about it, in view of the statute, but there is none, he had an undoubted right to leave his property to be administered as personalty, in respect to which there has never been any interference in our written law with the power to convey in perpetuity.

An idea was advanced that the constitutional right of immunity from interference in religious matters stands in the way of public enforcement of a trust of the character created. The answer to that is that no public enforcement would ever in any event be required, except as to contractual features. The Constitution does not exempt religious orders or ministers of the Gospel from their obligations of contract. In that field they are amenable to the law of the land the same as individuals in any other field. If one should devise his property to a minister of the Gospel or a church society to build a church edifice, and the devisee should accept the trust, could such donee be heard successfully to claim immunity from legal coercion to carry out the agreement? That simple proposition, it would seem, shows clearly that, if the donee of a trust for masses accepts the offer, he thereby makes a promise subject to enforcement, like any other promise. He could not for a moment in any court be heard to say, I will not keep my agreement and am entitled to protection in my breach, under my constitutional immunity from interference in religious matters. The attorney general in proceeding to enforce such a trust is merely asserting the inviolability of a public contract.

The suggestion is that the title to the property, considered as realty, by force of the statutes (§§ 2072 and 2073, Stat. 1898), is in the beneficiaries, since there is no power of disposition. That view overlooks the fact that the statutes have nothing to do with trusts for charity; that in such cases the legal title is always in the trustees and the equitable title in the beneficiaries. Many mistakes have been made by confusing private with charitable trusts, as shown in Harrington v. Pier, supra. In the latter, though the trustees have no duty whatever to perform, except to hold the title and preserve it for the designated public purpose, the nature of the right is strictly legal while the equitable interest is in the beneficiaries, which, from the very nature of the trust, must be indefinite. Any other view would defeat the law of 1905 and perpetuate the very difficulty the legislature intended, by it, to abolish. I take it that there is no room for fair controversy but what the equitable, not the legal, title, is vested in the beneficiaries, and the legal title rests in the trustee. That is the logic of Harrington v. Pier, supra, and of authorities generally on the subject. So, notwithstanding the form of the donation is for the repose of souls of the departed, the beneficiaries include the living as well,—the great public,—and the state, through its law officer, possesses full authority to invoke judicial remedies to prevent any abuse of the trust.

This further reason why a conveyance of realty in trust for perpetual charitable uses is not valid was advanced,—that the very constitutional status of titles to real estate precludes such a trust. In that reference was made to article 1, § 14, of the Constitution, declaring that “all lands within this state are declared to be allodial, and feudal tenures are prohibited.” By that, it is suggested, “all hindrances and obstacles in the way of free and ready sale of real property are nugatory.” The logic of that idea would render void all restraints upon the conveyance or use of real estate. No one would possess authority to hold, convey, or enjoy such property for a limited purpose or period. That doctrine was advanced in Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 367, but rejected as unsound though ingenious. The argument of counsel who contended for the doctrine which is contrary to the practice, under our Constitution, since its adoption and similar Constitutions elsewhere, reasoned from the lexical meaning of the word “allodial” standing alone. This court rejected counsel’s logic, holding that the use of the term, “and feudal tenures are prohibited,” following and in close connection with the term, “all lands within this state are declared to be allodial,” gave to the whole the meaning that the ownership of realty is free from those restraints which were characteristic of the feudal system; that the possessor of the title no longer is to be regarded as merely holding by the grace of a sovereign lord and subservient to “homage or fealty or military service,” but as holding by right. Properly understood the allodial character of title to real estate, instead of suggesting incapacity to convey the same to charitable uses, rather suggests absolute freedom in that regard. The contrary idea advanced during the discussion of this case, as inimical to the validity of the trust in question, would, of course, defeat any trust in real estate, whether for a limited period or in perpetuity. It would strike the public as passing strange if they were confronted with a judicial declaration that no man could hold or transfer any other than an unrestricted title to real estate characterized by unrestricted right of disposition. It seems that the idea was most emphatically rejected as unsound, some forty years ago, in Barker v. Dayton, supra. As there said, in effect, the only meaning of the constitutional provision is that titles to realty in this state are free from any encumbrance in the nature of rent or service or fealty to a superior, as under the feudal system.

Timlin, J., dissenting:

Eighty acres of presumably agricultural land worth $6,000, mortgaged for $1,500, personal property of a value not disclosed, and $400 in money,—subject to unsecured debts of $917,—were disposed of by the testator by will in these words: “After the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, I give, devise, and bequeath all the rest of my property, both real estate and personal property, for masses for the repose of my father’s and mother’s and sister’s and brother’s and my own soul. The masses will be said according to the directions of Thomas J. Fenlon and J. P. Watt, of Maple Grove, Wis., and I hereby appoint them to direct when and where to say said masses. I hereby appoint J. P. Watt, of Maple Grove, Wis., as executor of this my last will and testament.”

The testator was a member of the Roman Catholic Church. It will be noticed that the property is not devised or bequeathed to any designated person nor expressly in trust, nor is there any suggestion on the face of the instrument that the testator himself intended any public benefit. This last may have been supplied, however, by proof of the fact that he was a Roman Catholic, and that according to the tenets of that faith the celebration of masses, although expressly for the souls of certain designated deceased persons, nevertheless inures to the benefit of all participants in the ceremony and to the benefit of all mankind. A power, however, is given to two named persons to direct when and where the masses shall be said. It is further provided that the masses are to be said according to the direction of these two persons; but this cannot be taken to mean that they are to alter or modify the ceremony, but, as appears from the evidence, merely to designate whether low mass or high mass is to be said, and when and where. There appears to be a wide discretion vested in these two persons with respect to the exercise of the power. There are no active duties which require the intervention of a trustee or which might change the disposition of the property from a mere passive use to an active trust, unless we infer from the will a necessity for selling and converting the land into money. It also appears from the testimony of a priest of this church that the mass is a ceremonial prayer and sacrifice, which must be celebrated by an authorized or ordained priest, but in which any member of the public may participate. The doctrine of the church is that not only the souls of the departed for which the mass is specially offered, but all present and participating in the ceremonies, and, indeed, all mankind, derive spiritual benefit therefrom. The priest is bound to say the masses within a fixed time (not given), unless the individual ordering and paying for the masses grants unlimited time, and the stipend for a low mass is $1, for a high mass $5 and upward. The designation of one low mass per year as an obit would continue this trust several thousand years. I have no doubt that any person in this state, by private bequest, can devote all or any part of his property to pay for masses, by giving it to some designated person competent to take.

I have no doubt that the celebration of masses for the souls of the dead constitutes a "public charity" or a "pious use" within the meaning of these terms at common law; and I have no doubt that the court will not permit a charitable trust to fail for want of a trustee, but will appoint one to carry it out; and I have no doubt that, under the statutes of this state relating to perpetuities, charitable uses are exempted from the rules against remoteness. That statute is as follows: "The absolute power of alienation shall not be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever for a longer period than during the continuance of two lives in being at the creation of the estate and twenty-one years thereafter, except in the single case mentioned in the next section, and except when real estate is given, granted, or devised to a charitable use or to literary or charitable corporations which shall have been organized under the laws of this state, for their sole use and benefit, or to any cemetery corporation, society, or association." Section 2039, Stat. 1898, as amended by chapter 511, Laws 1905. This is as far as the case was presented by the appellant, and so far I agree with him. But we have in our state Constitution (§ 18, art. 1) as follows: "The right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed; nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; nor shall any control of or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted, or any preference be given by law to any religious establishments or modes of worship, nor shall any money be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies or religious or theological seminaries."

Under this constitutional provision, can this state through its courts or legislature compel, direct, or regulate the celebration of masses? Could the attorney general on relation of any of the beneficiaries of this trust, or on his own motion, maintain an action to compel or direct the saying of these masses? I think not. If he could not, the charitable trust, if one is created, is invalid, because a charitable trust that cannot be enforced is not valid. 2 Perry, Trusts 4th ed. §§ 708, 711. This question has usually arisen with reference to such great degree of indefiniteness that it has been found impossible for the courts to ascertain and enforce the wishes of the testator. But the basic principle is the inability of the state to enforce the trust. Where that inability exists, the charitable trust is void. Heiss v. Murphey, 40 Wis. 276; Tilden v. Green, 130 N. Y. 29, 14 L.R.A. 33, 27 Am. St. Rep. 487, 28 N. E. 880; Bridges v. Pleasants, 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 26, 44 Am. Dec. 94, 101, and cases in note. The Constitution prohibits any control of or interference with the right of conscience. It is manifestly no answer to this to say that there is no likelihood that the masses will be refused nor no likelihood that they will be celebrated outside of this state, whereby the people of this state will have no benefit from the charity. The question is: Can the state regulate the saying of masses, and compel, if occasion requires, the saying of such masses in this state? If the state can enforce the saying of masses for the spiritual benefit of non-Catholics who are, according to the majority opinion, with Catholics the beneficiaries of this charitable trust, the trust is valid; if not, it is invalid. It is quite idle to cite precedents upon this point from the courts of states which have no such constitutional restriction. The decision of the majority of the court, in effect, decides that the state has such power. This difficulty exists if we take the most favorable view of the devise, namely, that the will requires the real estate to be sold and converted into money and the proceeds of the sale used in paying for masses. If there is no such equitable conversion, we run into additional difficulties. If under our statute of uses (§§ 2071 and 2073, Stat. 1898) the title of the trustee to be appointed by the court is merely nominal, and is connected with no power of actual disposition or management of the land, because there is no requirement of the will that the land be sold and converted into money, then the legal title, by force of these statutes, rests in the beneficiaries. But the beneficiaries must be either the departed souls, the public, i. e., the state of Wisconsin, or the priests who receive the value of the use for saying masses. The souls cannot hold real estate, and the state cannot take title for the purpose of having its people receive this religious instruction, under the constitutional prohibition mentioned, so the title must be in the Roman Catholic Church, or in the persons who take the rents and profits for their services in celebrating the masses, or in no one. Sullivan v. Bruhling, 66 Wis. 472, 29 N. W. 211; Ruth v. Oberbrunner, 40 Wis. 238, 258; Webster v. Morris, 66 Wis. 366, 57 Am. Rep. 278, 28 N. W. 353; Holmes v. Mead, 52 N. Y. 332.

If, however, it be contended that the court may change the nature of the charitable trust by not only appointing a trustee, but also by imposing upon him active duties (other than sale and conversion into money), not found in the will, or if it be considered that charitable uses are not executed by the statute, then we have a case where the use of land is held in this state upon a tenure long ago obsolete, also forbidden by our state Constitution. If the land is not required to be sold, but may be held in trust indefinitely, and the rents and profits devoted to paying for masses for the designated souls, and incidentally for all mankind, the legal title must be in the trustee appointed by the court, the beneficial use in the religious association which receives all the rents and profits and says the masses for the public, or in the public. This is a replica of the tenure of frankalmoin or the tenure of divine service. The use of land cannot be held on any such tenure in this state, as I understand the law. "Tenure in frankalmoin. in libera eleemosyna, or free alms, is that whereby a religious corporation, aggregate or sole, holdeth lands of the donor to them and their successors forever. The service which they were bound to render for these lands was not certainly defined; but only in general to pray for the soul of the donor and his heirs, dead or alive; and therefore they did no fealty (which is incident to all other services but this), because this divine service was of a higher and more exalted nature. This is the tenure by which almost all the ancient monasteries and religious houses held their lands, and by which the parochial clergy hold them at this day. . . . And even at present, this is a tenure of a nature very distinct from all others; being not in the least feudal, but merely spiritual. For if the service be neglected, the law gives no remedy by distress or otherwise to the lord of whom the lands are holden; but merely a complaint to the ordinary or visitor to correct it. Wherein it materially differs from what was called tenure by divine service; in which the tenants were obliged to do some special divine services in certain; as to sing so many masses, to distribute such a sum in alms, and the like; which, being expressly defined and prescribed, could with no kind of propriety be called free alms; especially as for this, if unperformed the lord might distrain without any complaint to the visitor. All such donations are indeed now out of use; for, since the statute of quia emptores (18 Edw. I), none but the King can give lands to be holden by this tenure." 1 Cooley's Bl. Com. Bk. 11, pp. 101, 102, § 5; People v. Van Rensselaer, 9 N. Y. 334 and 336.

The Constitution of this state, like that of New York, Minnesota, and Arkansas, provides (§ 14, art. 1): "All lands within this state are declared to be allodial, and feudal tenures are prohibited." Allodial is defined by Blackstone as "land possessed by a man in his own right, without owing any rent or service to any superior." 2 Bl. Com. 104. "Held in free and absolute ownership," as contradistinguished from feudal tenures, which are prohibited in the same sentence and by the very next words, and the prohibition of which, with their servitudes and reservations, and all the attendant hindrances and obstacles in the way of free and ready sale and transfer of real property, constituted the chief object of the provision." Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 367, 384, 385. I do not think the words "feudal tenure" in the Constitution should be given any such strict construction as to permit all tenures of the feudal age which were not according to the distinctions then made strictly feudal. Neither does it necessarily limit the associated word "allodial;"

but the latter word broadens the meaning of the sentence. I think the word "feudal" relates to the age and the system, rather than to specific tenures among the multi-form tenures then in existence. Under such a constitutional provision, we surely are not at liberty to revive a species of tenure which the foregoing quotation from Blackstone shows to have been long obsolete, even in this day. Conditions, rents, and services may no doubt be exacted as a consideration for a lease, but a grant in fee of the whole land or of the use thereof cannot be upon any such tenure. Someone must own the land as an allodium. The statute quia emptores is part of the common law of this state, and that statute, by construction long settled, does not permit any such tenure as that attempted to be created by this will if we find no mandatory requirements that the land be sold and converted into money. 1 Reeves, Real Prop. §§ 290, 291; Gray, Rule against Perpetuities, §§ 26, 28; Van Rensselaer v. Hays, 19 N. Y. 68, 75 Am. Dec. 278. There could not be, as I understand this constitutional provision, any rent or service reserved out of a grant or devise in fee, whether such transfer be of the title or merely of the use.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

KATE CLARK et al., Appts.,
v.

ALBERT MACK, Admr., etc., of Betsy C. Sellmann, Deceased, et al.

(— Mich. —, 126 N. W. 632.)

Will — life estate — use of property.

1. A bequest of property to testator's sisters to be used and controlled by them during their joint lives and that of the survivor, and then over, gives a life estate only to them.

Note. — Right of persons claiming through deceased relative to participate with those standing in equal degree of relationship with such relative, in provision for "next of kin," etc.

While the question above stated usually arises in connection with wills, some of the most important decisions thereon have been made in the construction of settlements. Both kinds of cases are included in this note, since, as remarked in Avison v. Simpson, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 43, and Rook v. Atty. Gen. 31 Beav. 313, no reasonable distinction can be taken between such a limitation occurring in a deed and a similar limitation occurring in a will.

With reference to the phraseology construed, this note may be said to include 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Same — change of circumstances — effect.

2. Where one who has willed property to her sister for life with remainder to her nearest of kin permits the will to stand for two years after the death of the sister, until her own death, without alteration, the property will pass to the nearest of kin.

Same — nearest of kin — representatives of decedent.

3. Under a bequest to the nearest of kin of testator, his brothers and sisters will take to the exclusion of children of deceased brothers and sisters.

Same — remaindermen — time for determining.

4. Under a gift of property to one for life, remainder to testator's next of kin, the remaindermen will be determined at the death of testator, and not at that of the life tenant.

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County in defendants' favor in a suit to distribute the estate and to construe the will of Betsy C. Sellmann, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. S. Powers, with Messrs. Frost & Farrell, for appellants:

The legatees took an absolute estate in fee simple.

cases where the words "next," "near," or "nearest" are used in connection with some word indicating relationship; but it does not include cases where, though property is limited to a class of persons described by some word simply indicating relationship, with or without some other qualification, such as "poor relations," the words "next," "near," or "nearest" do not appear.

Where instrument contains no other indication of intention.

The divergent conclusions reached in the decisions upon the question under discussion are due to a difference of opinion as to whether the term "next of kin," or an equivalent expression, unaccompanied by any other language indicative of the user's intention, is to be taken as having been used in its ordinary signification, as referring to those nearest in blood to the propositus, or as having been used in a certain technical sense, supposed to have been imparted to it by the statute of distributions, as referring to those of the blood of the propositus who would be entitled to share in case of intestacy. On the one side is the natural meaning of the phrase; on the other, the probability that the testator had no intention of excluding from his bounty the offspring of persons who, had they survived, would have participated therein.

The English decisions show a fluctuation of judicial opinion before the question was finally settled. Beginning with a dictum to the same effect in Stamp v. Cooke, 1 Cox. Ch. Cas. 234, it was held in Phillips v. Garth, 3 Bro. C. C. 64, that since the statute of James the words "next of kin" have had a particular sense in which the testator must be supposed to have used them, if it does not appear that he used them in some other; and, therefore, that the children of deceased brothers and sisters were entitled to share with testator's surviving brothers in a residuary bequest to his next of kin. The decision seems to have been based also upon an earlier case to the effect that participants in a bequest to "relations" must be limited to those who would take under the statute of distributions.

This decision, while followed in Hinckley v. Maclarens, 1 Myl. & K. 27, was disapproved in several decisions prior to the time when it was finally overruled. See Garrick v. Camden, 14 Ves. Jr. 372; Smith v. Campbell, 19 Ves. Jr. 400; Brandon v. Brandon, 3 Swanst. 312.

The question was at length definitely settled in the leading case of Elmsley v. Young, 2 Myl. & K. 780, which involved the construction of a settlement by which property was limited upon certain contingencies to such person or persons as should, at the time of the decease of the settlor, be his next of kin. It was contended that the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A will speaks from the death of the testator.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the bill of complaint was filed to obtain the construction of the will of Betsy C. Sellmann, deceased. The will is holographic, and was made while the testatrix was in Kansas City, Missouri, on December 1, 1890. The following is a copy of term "next of kin" means, by force of its own natural import, the persons who take as next of kin by the statute of distributions; but the court, in ruling adversely to such contention, said that such has not been the understanding of conveyancers, and that the statute itself takes notice that persons who are to take shall be the next of kin and some other persons besides. And it was accordingly held that the only surviving brother of the settlor took to the exclusion of children of a deceased brother.

And this ruling was confirmed by a decision of the House of Lords in the case of Withy v. Mangles, 10 Clark & F. 215, in which it was said by Lord Cottenham that if "next of kin" means those who would take under the statute, it must include in many cases those who are not next of kin, and a gift to a class which in all other cases gives an equal portion to each member of the class must in this particular case be governed by a different and altogether artificial rule of construction; that the rule of the statute cannot be adopted without doing violence to the description, proximity not being exclusively a qualification under the statute; and that it had not been proved that the term "next of kin," used simpliciter, has, by a technical or conventional construction, obtained the meaning of "those who would be entitled in case of intestacy under the statute of distributions." But Lord Campbell, although feeling himself constrained to concur in view of the decision in Elmsley v. Young, did so with considerable reluctance, feeling that the result was to put a construction upon the terms of the settlement which could not by possibility have entered into the contemplation of the parties.

In conformity with the doctrine of the two cases immediately preceding, it has been held in a number of cases that where property is limited to "next of kin," without other indication of intention, those in the nearest degree of relationship take to the exclusion of those in a more remote degree, although the latter are the children of those who stood in the same degree of relationship as the former. Avison v. Simpson and Rook the substantial portion of the will: "In consideration of the duty I owe those near and dear to me by ties of blood and friendship, and my desire to benefit, pecuniarily, those among them who, not having children to care for them, are likely to be most in need of help as age creeps on, and helplessness: I therefore this day, December 1, 1890, in the city of Kansas City, Missouri, in presence of these witnesses, do solemnly will and bequeath all my earthly possessions, real estate and personal property, to my two sisters, Emily A. Coe and Esther A. Coe, widow of Rubin Coe, to be equally used and controlled by them both, while both live, and should one of them die first, the one that is left shall use and control all that remains until her death, when, if anything remains,

Testatrix was a single woman, without children, and died April 23, 1907. At the time the will was made all of the brothers and sisters of the testatrix were living, viz., Lafayette Coe and Walter Coe, brothers, and Jane Coe, Esther A. Coe, Emily A. Coe, and Ursula Gilfillin, sisters. After making this will, and prior to the death of the testatrix, Lafayette Coe, Jane Coe, Esther A. Coe, and Emily A. Coe died. Lafayette and Jane left children; Esther and Emily left no children. At the time of the death of the testatrix one brother, Walter Coe, and one sister, Ursula Gilfillin, were living. Ursula Gilfillin has since died, leaving children. The will was duly admitted

v. Atty. Gen. supra; Re McVicar, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 671; Harris v. Newton, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 268; Swasey v. Jaques, 144 Mass. 135, 59 Am. Rep. 65, 10 N. E. 758; Fargo v. Miller, 150 Mass. 225, 5 L.R.A. 690, 22 N. E. 1003; Jones v. Oliver, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 369; Simmons v. Gooding, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 382; Harrison v. Ward, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 240.

So, also, in Redmond v. Burroughs, 63 N. C. 242, in which it was argued that "next of kin" are technical words used in the statute of distributions, and so must be given such signification, rather than as meaning nearest of kin, it is said: "If next of kin were the technical words so used in the statute, it would be difficult to resist the argument. But there lies the error. Next of kin are not the words used in said statute to denote those who take. If they were, then only the living nieces and nephews would take as being next, nearest of kin, as between them and the children of deceased nieces and nephews. But the words used are not 'next of kin,' but next of kin who are equal in degree, and those who legally represent them. It will be seen, therefore, that to bring the terms used in the will within the technical words used in the statute of distributions, the words, 'and those who legally represent them,' would have to be added. We are of the opinion that the terms used in the will, 'next-of-kin,' mean 'nearest of kin,' and that the living nieces and nephews take to the exclusion of the legal representatives of deceased nieces and nephews."

But decisions are not wanting which decline to follow the rule finally adopted in England. Thus, in Pinkham v. Blair, 57 N. H. 226, where a testator had provided that, upon certain contingencies, his estate should go to his next of kin, the court declined to follow Elmsley v. Young, upon the ground that the conclusion therein reached was in conflict with their decision in Varrell v. Wendell, 20 N. H. 431, in which the question was as to the validity of an execution of a power to apportion certain property among "the relations" of the testator, and in which it was held that by his relations the testator must have intended his next of kin according to the statute. In view of the difference in the phraseology under construction, it is difficult to see why Varrell v. Wendell should have been considered as controlling. The real reason of the decision seems to have been the avowed reluctance of the court to adopt a construction which would have given the estate to testator's surviving brothers and sisters to the exclusion of children of deceased brothers.

And in Slossom v. Lynch, 43 Barb. 146, 28 How. Pr. 417, which involved the construction of a marriage settlement by which property was limited to the next of kin of the settlor, in default of appointment and of issue, the court, after an extensive review of the English decisions, adopted the view that the words "next of kin" have had a technical meaning since the statute of distributions, and that this statute originated and gave a technical meaning to them, saying that it is doubtful whether the words have ever acquired an ordinary, popular meaning, synonymous with nearest relations or nearest of kin.

The foregoing decision is referred to with approval in Murdock v. Ward, 67 N. Y. 387.

While there is a statement in the headnote to Wright v. Methodist Episcopal Church, Hoffm. Ch. 202, to the effect that the phrase "next of kin," when used simpliciter, does not mean those entitled under the statute of distributions, but the next of blood, this statement is wholly unauthorized by the decisions of the court, which merely mentions the case of Elmsley v. Young as bearing on the question.

In Graham v. Whitridge, 99 Md. 290, 66 L.R.A. 408, 57 Atl. 609, 58 Atl. 36, it is held that nephews and nieces, to the exclusion of grandnephews and nieces, children of deceased nephews and nieces, will take an estate limited in trust for one for life and upon her death to be distributed amongst her "next of kindred;" but as it appears that the same persons would have been entitled whether the phrase "next of kindred" is to be interpreted in the sense of nearest blood relations, or in the sense of relations who come in under the statute of distribu-to probate. Defendant, Albert Mack, was appointed administrator with the will annexed of the estate, and is still acting in that capacity. The joint and several answer of Albert Mack, administrator, and Walter Coe admits all the material allegations of fact in the bill, and asks for a construction of the will. None of the other defendants appeared or answered. Defendant Walter Coe claims the advantage of a cross bill, and asks that the will be so construed as to give him one half of the estate, as one of the nearest of kin of the testatrix. The complainants claim that the legatees, Emily A. Coe and Esther A. Coe, under the will, took an absolute estate in fee simple, and that, by reason of both of the said legatees having died before the death of the testatrix, the legacy lapsed, and the estate became intestate, and should be divided among the heirs of the deceased as provided by the statutes of this state in case of intestate estates. The claim in behalf of defendant Walter Coe is that Emily A. Coe and Esther A. Coe were entitled to a life estate in the property had they lived until the death of the testatrix, and that it should now be equally divided between himself and the heirs of his sister Ursula Gilfillin; and that he and said sister were the nearest of kin of the said testatrix at her death. The learned circuit judge took this view of the case, and decreed one half of the estate to said Walter Coe, and the other one half to the heirs of Ursula Gilfillin. The complainants have appealed.

1. We are unable to agree with the contention of counsel for complainants in the tions, the decision cannot be regarded as taking either side of the controversy developed in the foregoing cases.

—"nearest of kin."

In Brandon v. Brandon, supra, where property was limited by a marriage settlement, upon certain contingencies, to the "nearest and next of kin" of the wife in equal shares, it was held that a brother took to the exclusion of nephews and nieces, children of deceased sisters, the master of the rolls saying that the words of the settlement are too explicit and definite to require or admit, for their construction, reference to the statute of distributions.

So, also, in Boys v. Bradley, 10 Hare, 389, it was held that under a limitation to testator's "nearest of kin," a sister took to the exclusion of the children of deceased sisters. Other decisions to the same effect are Keniston v. Mayhew, 169 Mass. 166, 47 N. E. 612; and Leonard v. Haworth, 171 Mass. 496, 51 N. E. 7.

—"near" or "nearest relations."

In Whithorne v. Harris, 2 Ves. Sr. 527, it was held that only such relations as would be entitled to take under the statute of distributions might share in a bequest to "near relations," this construction being adopted in conformity to cases where the bequest was simply to "relations," rendering it necessary to draw a line somewhere.

So, also, in Edge v. Salisbury, 1 Ambl. 70, and Goodinge v. Goodings, 1 Ves. Sr. 231, bequests to such of testator's nearest relations as should seem to be objects of charity were likewise held not to extend further than to such as would take under the statute of distributions. "Otherwise," said Lord Hardwicke, "it would be endless to find out everybody that were relations."

But in Marsh v. Marsh, 1 Bro. C. C. 293, where property was limited upon certain contingencies to testator's "nearest relation, and the nearest relations of such nearest relation, forever," it was held that his sur-living half-sister was entitled to take to the exclusion of a son of a deceased half-brother.

And in Locke v. Locke, 45 N. J. Eq. 97, 16 Atl. 49, where a testator directed that after the marriage or decease of his wife; the real estate and personal property given to her should be equally divided between his "nearest relations," share and share alike, it was held that his surviving brothers were entitled to take to the exclusion of nephews and nieces, on the ground that such was the plain meaning of the language used.

Where other language used.

In some cases the language employed by the testator or settlor has been held to leave no room for doubt that those most nearly related to the propositus were entitled to take to the exclusion of the children of deceased persons who stood in the same degree of relationship,—as in Wimbles v. Pitcher, 12 Ves. Jr. 433, and anonymous, 1 Madd. Ch. 36, where the limitation was to "the next of kin in equal degree;" and in Smith v. Campbell, 19 Ves. Jr. 400, where the limitation was to testator's "nearest surviving relations."

But where it appears from other language used that a different meaning from that which the courts would imply in the absence of such language was intended, such meaning will be given effect.

Thus, in Stamp v. Cooke, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 234, where a testator directed the residue of his estate to be parted to "his next relations, as sisters, nephews, and nieces," it was held to be clearly the testator's intention that the children of a deceased brother and sister the relation of innkeeper and guest has sisters.

So, also, in Garrick v. Camden, 14 Ves. Jr. 372, where a testator left his residuary estate "to be divided amongst my next of kin as if I had died intestate," it was said that it would be difficult to say that children of deceased brothers and sisters would not be entitled to participate therein with those surviving.

A similar conclusion was reached in Nich- construction of this will. It is their claim that the question is controlled by the cases of Jones v. Jones, 25 Mich. 401; Moran v. Moran, 143 Mich. 322, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 323, 114 Am. St. Rep. 648, 106 N. W. 206, and kindred cases. It is our opinion that Mrs. Sellmann did not intend to will the property to the sisters so that it would be theirs absolutely, but that it was the manifest intention of the testatrix to give to the sisters Emily A. Coe and Esther A. Coe, who had no children to care for them, a life estate therein; they to have the use and control thereof jointly, so long as they both should live, and the survivor to have the use and control of what should remain until her death, when, if anything remained, it should be divided among the nearest of kin. This will does not in our opinion present a case of a gift with a repugnant clause, as was found in many of the cases cited by complainants. The disposing clause of this will is embraced in one sentence. The same form of words that is employed in bestowing the use and control of the property upon the sisters while they live is employed in bestowing the remainder upon the nearest of kin when the sisters have died. We think that the express terms of the gift created a life estate in the sisters named, and that the case is controlled by our own decisions, a part only of which are here cited. Morford v. Dieffenbacher, 54 Mich. 593, 20 N. W. 600; Gaukler v. Moran, 66 Mich. 353, 33 N. W. 513; Glover v. Reid, 80 Mich. 228, 45 N. W. 91; Cousino v. Cousino, 86 Mich. 323, 48 N. W. 1084; Jones v. Deming, 91 Mich. 481, 51 N. W. 1119; Defreese v. Lake, ols v. Haviland, 1 Kay & J. 504, where a testamentary gift was made in default of appointment, "unto and to the use of the person or persons who at the decease of my said daughter shall be her next of kin according to the statutes of distribution of personal estate, and in the like shares and proportions as if she had died without being married."

In Re Thompson, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 607, it was held, construing a bequest of personalty "to the heirs or next of kin" of a certain person, that an alternative gift was not intended, but that both terms applied to one class; and that, in view of the use of the word "heirs" with relation to personal estate, such class comprised the statutory next of kin.

In Re Gray [1896] 2 Ch. 802, where property was settled in trust "for the person and persons who shall be next of kin in blood to [the person for whose benefit the settlement was made] at the time of her decease, in case she had so died intestate and unmarried," it was held that a reference to the statute of distributions was intended, so that children of deceased brothers and sisters were entitled to share with living brothers and sisters,—such construction being strengthened by the circumstance that by a previous clause it was provided that certain furniture and effects comprised in the settlement should "go and belong to the next of kin in blood of . . . [the person for whose benefit the settlement was made] at her decease in the manner directed by the statutes for distribution of intestates' effects, as if she had died intestate and unmarried."

In Duffy v. Hargan, 62 N. J. Eq. 588, 50 Atl. 678, affirmed without opinion in 63 N. J. Eq. 802, 52 Atl. 1131, where property was limited by will, in event of the first taker's failure to make a testamentary disposition thereof, "to his next of kin according to the laws of the state of New Jersey," the court said: "If to the word 'next' in the will under consideration the literal construction of 'nearest' should be given, the result would be that the nearest of kin would take, not the whole, but only their shares, and the testator would die intestate as to the residue. To avoid a result so plainly opposed to the intention, the courts give to the words 'next of kin,' when used in connection with the expression, 'according to the statute of distribution' (and I take it that 'according to the laws of New Jersey' is a precisely equivalent expression), the meaning 'statutory next of kin;' that is, next of kin who are in fact nearest, and those persons, also, who by statute represent or stand in the place of those who are nearest."

In Simmons v. Gooding, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 382, it is said that if to the words "next of kin" the words had been added "as in case of intestacy," or "as by the statute of distributions," or if the language of that statute had been adopted, "to the next of kin in equal degree or to those who legally represent them," the children of a deceased daughter would have been entitled to participate with sons and daughters surviving.

On the other hand, in Harris v. Newton, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 268, where a testator directed that the property left to his daughters should remain as a jointure for their use, in case of their marrying untouchable by their husbands, "but to descend to their legal or next of kin," it was contended that the language of the bequest contained a distinct reference to some legal mode of distribution, and necessarily, therefore, to that which is prescribed by the statute of distributions; but it was held that such language was insufficient to prevent the phrase "next of kin" being given its accepted meaning of nearest in blood.

And in Halton v. Foster, L. R. 3 Ch. 505, where a testator gave a legacy to his daughter for life, and in default of issue in trust "for her next of kin in blood as if she had died unmarried," it was held that no sufficient inference could be drawn from the language employed which would vary the settled meaning of the words "next of kin."

109 Mich. 415, 32 L.R.A. 744, 63 Am. St. Rep. 584, 67 N. W. 505; Gadd v. Stoner, 113 Mich. 689, 71 N. W. 1111; Robinson v. Finch, 116 Mich. 180, 74 N. W. 472; Austin v. Hyndman, 119 Mich. 615, 78 N. W. 663.

2. Bearing in mind that the legatees, Emily A. Coe and Esther A. Coe, both died in the lifetime of the testatrix (Esther having died in April, 1904, and Emily in March, 1905, more than two years before the death of the testatrix), what is to become of the property? The will says: "It shall then be divided among the nearest of kin." It is fair to suppose that Mrs. Sellmann knew of the death of her two sisters, yet she allowed over two years to elapse without making any change in her will, and we think that she intended the last clause of the will to be effective. When a will fairly construed is susceptible of two constructions, one of which would render it inoperative, and the other give effect to it, the duty of the court is to adopt the latter construction. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 667, and cases cited in note. In Den ex dem. Micheau v. Crawford, 8 N. J. L. 97, Ewing, Ch. J., in giving the opinion of the court said: "It is only when a reasonable construction and the discovery of the intent of the testator are utterly hopeless that all effect should be denied to a will." The lapse here was not in the residuary clause; and it is held that, where the lapse is not in the residuary clause, lapsed gifts of both personal property and real estate pass under that clause. Remsen, Wills, 221, and cases there cited; Mann v. Hyde, 71 Mich. 278, 39 N. W. 78. "The law in regard to lapsed legacies of personalty has always treated them as part of the general body of the estate, so that they pass to the residuary legatees." We think that the testatrix intended that the property, upon the death of Emily and Esther, should go to her nearest of kin.

3. This brings us to the question, Who were the nearest of kin? In the absence of a contrary intent, a gift to next of kin is a gift to the nearest of kin in the strictest sense, excluding persons who under the statute of distribution would be entitled to take by representation. Thus, a brother or sister would take to the exclusion of the children of a deceased brother or sister. Remsen, Wills, 101; Jarman, Wills, 6th ed. 953; Underhill, Wills, § 626; Rood, Wills, § 456.

The term "nearest of kin" in the will signifies those who stand in the nearest relationship to the testatrix according to the rules of the civil law for computing degrees of kinship. In this will there are no words suggesting that anyone is to take by the right of representation. But that idea is excluded by the words employed: "It shall then be divided among the nearest of kin." They were the brother, Walter Coe, and the sister, Ursula Gilfillin, surviving at the death of the testatrix. Van Cleve v. Van Fossen, 73 Mich. 342, 41 N. W. 258. The death of the person whose next of kin is mentioned determines the membership of the class. "Thus, if the gift be to A for life, and after his decease to the next of kin of the testator, the persons to take as next of kin are to be ascertained at the death of the testator, and not at the death of A." Hawkins, Wills, 2d Am. ed. 99, 100; Minot v. Harris, 132 Mass. 528; Letchworth's Appeal, 30 Pa. 175; Welsh v. Crater, 32 N. J. Eq. 177; Remsen, Wills, 102. A will speaks from the death of the testator, and the estate vests at that time, unless the will contains some provision to the contrary. Rood v. Hovey, 50 Mich. 395, 15 N. W. 525; Hibler v. Hibler, 104 Mich. 274-281, 62 N. W. 361.

We conclude, therefore, as did the court below, that the property under the will in question should be divided between the defendant Walter Coe and the heirs of Ursula Gilfillin; the said Walter Coe taking one half, and the said heirs one half thereof.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed, but without costs.

Bankruptcy — set-off — trust fund.

1. A bank which, through its president, as one of the creditors of a manufacturing company, has agreed with it and the other creditors that the assets of the company shall be collected and deposited in the bank, to be divided among all creditors pro rata, cannot, upon the institution of bankruptcy proceedings against the corporation, set off the fund so accumulated against its own claim, since the fund is a trust deposit for specific purposes, created with the knowl-

(November 13, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Hamilton County in complainant's favor in a suit to recover certain bank deposits alleged to constitute a trust fund for the creditors of the insolvent Wilcox Furniture Company. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pritchard & Sizer, for appellant:

The bank was entitled to set off deposits which it had received with knowledge of the insolvency of the depositor, against the indebtedness of the depositor.

New York County Nat. Bank v. Massey, 192 U. S. 138, 145, 148, 48 L. ed. 380, 383, 384, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 199; Clark v. Northampton Nat. Bank, 160 Mass. 26, 35 N. E. 108; Lowell v. International Trust Co. 86 C. C. A. 137, 158 Fed. 781; Harris v. Second Nat. Bank, 110 Tenn. 239, 75 S. W. 1053.

In order to constitute a special deposit, it must distinctly appear that the identical money or thing deposited is to be kept by the bank and returned to the depositor.

The trustee in bankruptcy cannot enforce payment of his creditors generally, such funds are impressed with a trust in favor of the creditors, and the bank cannot apply same to a claim held by it against the depositor; and if such agreement is invalid as to a subsequently appointed trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor, it cannot hold such funds as against such trustee, nor can it apply same upon its own claim against the bankrupt. Lyman v. Belfast Nat. Bank, 98 Me. 448, 57 Atl. 799; Re Davis, 119 Fed. 950; WAGNER v. CITIZENS' BANK & TRUST Co.

This doctrine is also recognized in Clark v. Northampton Nat. Bank, 160 Mass. 26, 35 N. E. 108, which was, however, disposed of upon a finding of fact by the lower court, that the deposits made by a debtor were not made under an implied contract or understanding that same were to be applied to the creditors of the depositor generally, he being at the time insolvent. the interests of the creditors, for the trustee is not vested with the rights or titles of the creditors, but only with those of the bankrupt.

Messrs. White & Martin, for appellee:

Defendant bank is not entitled to set off, as against the fund in controversy, the notes which the Wilcox Furniture Company owed it at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed.

The rule that the trustee takes the estate of the bankrupt in the same plight as the bankrupt held it is not applicable to liens which, although valid as to the bankrupt, are invalid as to creditors.

First Nat. Bank v. Staake, 202 U. S. 141-149, 50 L. ed. 967-970, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 580.

Messrs. Burkett, Miller, & Moore also for appellee.

McAllister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complainant, as trustee in bankruptcy of the Wilcox Furniture Company, a bankrupt with Lowell v. International Trust Co. 86 C. C. A. 137, 158 Fed. 781, which holds that a subsequently appointed trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of an insolvent depositor in a bank has no interest in an arrangement theretofore made between the creditors of the bankrupt, including the trust company with whom he carried his account, by which he was to continue his business until it could be profitably closed out, and deposit the proceeds with the trust company, to be applied upon his indebtedness generally, and hence the trust company, as against his trustee, was entitled to apply money deposited under this arrangement upon its claim against the bankrupt.

For a more extended discussion and analysis of the cases considered herein, see the opinion in WAGNER v. CITIZENS' BANK & TRUST Co., wherein the question is considered at length, and these cases extensively commented on.

corporation, filed the present bill to recover the sum of $6,110.98, alleged to be due the bankrupt. The bill alleges that at the date of the adjudication of bankruptcy against said Wilcox Furniture Company, and also at the date of the appointment of the complainant as trustee in bankruptcy of said company, there was on deposit in the custody of the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company a fund, amounting to $6,110.98, belonging to said Wilcox Furniture Company, and which fund was a part of its assets. It is alleged that said fund was impressed with the character of a trust fund, and was accumulated under circumstances which fixed upon defendant Bank & Trust Company the character of trustee in relation to said fund. It is alleged in the bill that said money was accumulated as the result of an agreement among the creditors of the said bankrupt, including defendant bank, to the effect that the assets of the bankrupt should be collected, and the proceeds deposited in the defendant bank, and distributed pro rata among all the creditors. It is alleged that at the meeting of the creditors the defendant, Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, was represented by its president, G. N. Henson, and he concurred in the course then adopted, and agreed to act with the local creditors in pursuing whatever plan might be devised, and to share with them pro rata in the division of the proceeds which might be realized from the sale of the assets of the said Wilcox Furniture Company. It is then alleged that, after the appointment of a temporary receiver in the bankruptcy case, the defendant "set up a claim to said trust fund then on deposit in the bank, and claimed the right to set off, as against said fund, a large amount of indebtedness owing to it from the Wilcox Furniture Company."

It is then claimed that, under the facts set forth in the bill, the defendant is "estopped from appropriating said funds to its own use, to the exclusion of other creditors, or from setting up any adverse claim to the said fund, or from withholding the same from your complainant."

The defendant bank, in its answer, admitted that on the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy there was a balance of $6,110.98 due from it to the bankrupt, on deposit in its bank; but it averred that the bankrupt was indebted to the defendant by notes in an amount exceeding said balance, and that said credit balance in favor of the bankrupt was applied pro tanto to the payment of said notes. The bank denied that it held any trust fund belonging to the Wilcox Furniture Company at the time of its adjudication in bankruptcy, or that it was a trustee of said bankrupt with relation to any fund. It admitted that it had refused to pay said credit balance to complainant, and denied the allegations of the bill asserting a right in complainant to recover the same.

Proof was taken, and on the hearing the chancellor decreed that the deposit account in the defendant bank was impressed with the character of a trust fund for the benefit of all the creditors of the Wilcox Furniture Company, and that defendant bank was estopped from appropriating the same to its own use, to the exclusion of the other creditors. He accordingly pronounced a decree in favor of the complainant and against the defendant bank for the sum of $5,810.98, but declined to allow any interest on the recovery, and adjudged the cost against the complainant.

The defendant bank appealed, and has assigned the following errors:

(1) That the bank is clearly entitled to the right of set-off claimed in its answer; and

(2) That the trustee in bankruptcy has no right to enforce the alleged trust in behalf of the creditors, even if one existed.

The material facts necessary to be noticed are that, in the spring of 1907, the Wilcox Furniture Company was indebted to various creditors in the sum of about $40,000, and had also become delinquent in the payment of its current bills. The resident creditors, after securing inventories and examining into the condition of the company, extended to it further time on its past-due indebtedness, receiving from it notes therefor, and during the summer of 1907 the company succeeded in paying to each of the Chattanooga creditors about 25 per cent of their respective claims. In the fall of 1907, on account of the financial panic that was then prevailing, the furniture company became still further embarrassed, and about October 1st the local creditors of the concern had another meeting in the city of Chattanooga, and after conferring with the officers of the company, determined, with their consent, to convert the assets of the furniture company into cash, which should be deposited in the defendant bank, and only so much thereof used as might be necessary to defray current expenses and satisfy the claims of persistent creditors, and the surplus, after the accumulation of sufficient funds, should be divided pro rata among all the creditors, both local and foreign. A committee of three was appointed to represent the interests of all the creditors, and especially to see that the policy adopted by the meeting should be faithfully executed. It was also determined at the said meeting that the committee so selected should appoint a competent bookkeeper, by and with the consent of the Wilcox Furniture Company, who should be placed in the office of that company to represent the interests of the creditors, but who at the same time should be on the pay roll of the furniture company. It should be stated that the defendant bank, as a creditor of the furniture company, was represented at said meeting by its president. At a subsequent meeting a rule was adopted, with the consent of the defendant bank, whereby all the checks drawn by the president of the Wilcox Furniture Company against its bank deposit should be countersigned by the representative of the creditors' committee, and without such signature should not be honored by the bank.

The clear weight of the proof is that Mr. G. N. Henson, president of the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, attended a number of meetings held by the creditors of the Wilcox Furniture Company, and definitely agreed to the policy adopted by the committee, of husbanding the resources of the furniture company, which should be deposited in the defendant bank, and after a sufficient accumulation the fund should be divided pro rata among all the creditors of the furniture company. We cannot, of course, undertake to detail the testimony establishing this proposition, and can only state our conclusion as to the weight of the testimony from an examination of the record. We think it undeniable on this record that the Wilcox Furniture Company was insolvent, at least from the date of the appointment of J. L. Morrison as the representative of the committee, and that this fact was known to the bank. The fact is, the Wilcox Furniture Company was unable to meet its obligations as they matured in the usual course of business during the spring, summer, and fall of 1907. The proof shows that J. L. Morrison, the representative of the creditors' committee, prepared weekly financial reports of the condition of the furniture company, which he submitted to the creditors' committee. These reports commenced November 21, 1907, and continued down to the close of the week ending January 4, 1908. Mr. Morrison testifies that he kept Mr. Henson advised daily as to the condition of its affairs, and that Mr. Henson approved of the policy of the committee. The trustee in bankruptcy testified that claims amounting to $33,718.90 had been proven against the bankrupt mercantile corporation. He further testified that all the assets of the furniture company had been disposed of, and the entire amount that came into his hands was $9,941.02. It appears that the furniture company was indebted to the defendant bank, when the bankruptcy proceedings were commenced, in the sum of $7,363, and that 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) after the present suit was commenced the defendant bank applied the sum of $6,110.98, standing to the credit of the furniture company on the books of the bank at the close of banking hours on January 17, 1908, to the indebtedness of the Wilcox Furniture Company, leaving the sum of $1,252.50 as the balance due the bank, which it filed as a claim against the bankrupt. It appears that on January 7, 1908, the cash balance standing to the credit of the Wilcox Furniture Company in the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company was only $217.17. It appears that the receipts from the total sales of the business, conducted in the usual manner, were not more than sufficient to defray the current expenses. The creditors of the company were becoming impatient, and some were threatening litigation. In this crisis the creditors' committee determined to throw the stock of goods on the market, and dispose of them at auction sale. This mode of converting the stock of the company into cash was approved by the creditors, including the defendant bank. Accordingly, auction sales were commenced on January 8th, and were continued from day to day until January 11th, when certain nonresident creditors of the Wilcox Furniture Company filed a petition of involuntary bankruptcy against it. At this date there was on deposit in the defendant bank the sum of $4,761.25, which had been accumulated as the result of the first three days of the auction sale. Application was made to the trustee in bankruptcy to allow the sales to continue, and under an arrangement with the trustee the sales were continued for two or three days after the petition in bankruptcy was filed. The sum of $2,301.72 was realized from the auction sales after the petition in bankruptcy was filed. We find from the proof that the fund which the bank is now seeking to set off against the indebtedness due it from the furniture company was accumulated as the result of the auction sales, and that it was understood by the defendant bank that this fund was being deposited with it as a special fund for pro rata distribution among all the creditors of the Wilcox Furniture Company.

The defendant bank bases its right to a set-off on § 68a of the bankruptcy act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 565, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3450), as follows: "In all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the estate of a bankrupt and a creditor, the account shall be stated and one debt shall be set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid."

In the case of New York County Nat. Bank v. Massey, 192 U. S. 138, 48 L. ed. 380, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 199, the Supreme Court of the United States, in dealing with the clause just mentioned, says: "Section 68a of the bankruptcy act of 1898 is almost a literal reproduction of § 20 of the act of 1867."

In Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 731, in construing § 20 of the act of 1867 (act March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. at L. 526, chap. 176), the court said as follows: "This section was not intended to enlarge the doctrine of set-off, or to enable a party to make a set-off in cases where the principles of legal or equitable set-off did not previously authorize it."

The general rule is that the relation of the bank to the depositor is that of debtor and creditor, and the bank is the debtor of the depositor. Harris v. Second Nat. Bank, 110 Tenn. 249, 75 S. W. 1053.

"The bank holds a lien upon the deposits in its hands to secure the repayment of the depositor's indebtedness, and may enforce that lien as the debts mature by applying the debtor's deposits upon them, thus setting the two off against each other." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 835.

It is also stated: "The right of the bank to apply deposits to the extinguishment of the depositor's indebtedness as it matures grows out of the doctrine that the relationship between the bank and depositor is that of debtor and creditor." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 835.

But it is well settled that a bank does not have "a lien upon special deposits or moneys deposited for a specific purpose, as for collateral security, or for the payment of a particular debt." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 837, and cases cited.

Again it is said: "The proposition that there is no right of set-off against a trust deposit, nor any lien for the trustee's personal debts, is axiomatic." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 837, and cases cited.

In State ex rel. Carroll v. Corning State Sav. Bank, 128 Iowa, 597, 105 N. W. 159, it is said: "Where a bank which was a creditor of an insolvent estate received a deposit of funds from the receiver, it could not apply such funds on its claims, nor plead such claims as an offset against the deposit."

In State Bank v. McCabe, 135 Mich. 479, 98 N. W. 20, it is said: "Where a bank deals with a depositor as a trustee, and recognizes funds standing in his name as trust funds, knowing them to be such, it cannot appropriate them to the payment of the trustee's individual indebtedness to the bank."

This question arose in Re Davis (D. C.) 119 Fed. 950, wherein an insolvent partnership sold its stock of goods, and, by its direction, the purchaser deposited its price in the bank, taking a receipt therefor, showing that the money was to be prorated among the several creditors of the firm, as their interests might appear. Subsequently, on petition of creditors, the partnership was adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt. After said adjudication, the bank undertook to apply the money so deposited on certain notes of the firm held by it and another creditor, without the consent of the depositor or the bankrupt, and to refuse the demands of the trustee therefor. Held, that the bank held the deposit in a fiduciary capacity as a trust fund, which precluded it from asserting an adverse claim thereto after the bankruptcy, as against the trustee.

Among other things, the court said: "Upon the merits of the controversy, would the bank be in a position to successfully contest the right of the trustee to the money? Its ability to do so would depend upon its right to apply the fund to its own use. While a general deposit by a merchant of money in a bank creates the relation of debtor and creditor, and authorizes the bank to use the money as its own, such result does not obtain when the deposit is made for a special purpose, as, for example, to be paid to creditors, as was the case here."

In Wilson v. Dawson, 52 Ind. 515, it was said: "It is a general rule that funds deposited in a bank for a special purpose, known to the bank, cannot be withheld from that purpose, to the end that they may be set off by the bank against a debt due to it from the depositor."

In Lyman v. Belfast Nat. Bank, 98 Me. 448, 57 Atl. 799, it appeared that in June, 1902, the Standard Granite Company sent to each of its creditors, including the Belfast National Bank, a circular letter stating that it was unable to meet its obligations. A few days later in the same month it called a meeting of its creditors, at which meeting the Belfast National Bank was represented by one of its directors. At this meeting a committee of three creditors was appointed, with instructions to secure, if possible, the discharge of certain attachments which had been placed upon the property of the granite company. On September 4th, following, the directors of the granite company passed a resolution, admitting the inability of the company to pay its debts, and its willingness to be adjudged a bankrupt on that ground. On the day following, the granite company sent to the Belfast National Bank a deposit of $800. At that time the granite company had a balance of $1.04 standing to its credit on the books of the Belfast National Bank. The intention of the Standard Granite Company in making this deposit of $800 was that it should be held by the bank until a trustee in bankruptcy for the granite company should be appointed; but no notice of such intention was given to the bank, and the deposit was credited to the account of the granite company and added to the balance of $1.04 then standing on the books of the company.

At the time this deposit was made, the granite company was indebted to the bank to the amount of several thousand dollars. On the day following the making of this deposit of $800, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the granite company, and it was duly adjudged a bankrupt, and one Lynam was appointed and qualified as its trustee in bankruptcy. Said trustee made a demand on the bank for the $800, which demand was refused; the bank claiming that it would offset the deposit on the past-due notes of the granite company.

For some time past, all the efforts of the granite company "and that of its creditors had been to obtain a distribution of its assets equitably, and to that end the first attempt was to discharge the attachments. Honest dealing on the part of the granite company, which is to be presumed, required that all of its assets should be husbanded for the benefit of all its creditors. Pending the effort to obtain an assignment or adjudication of bankruptcy, it had $800 in money, which it intended to retain, and ought to retain, as part of its general assets. As some time would elapse before it could be thus administered, it was deposited in the bank, really for safekeeping. All these facts were well known to the bank when it received the deposit. It knew it was not intended as a payment, and did not treat it as such. The bank could not fail to understand that it was intended that this money should be added to the other assets for the general benefit, as it equitably ought to be. It certainly understood that the granite company, under the then-existing circumstances, would not voluntarily subject this portion of its assets to a set-off by the bank, to the injury of other creditors.

"Upon consideration of all the circumstances, and the situation of the parties, we think it a fair inference that the bank understood that the deposit was intended only for safe-keeping, to be ultimately appropriated for the benefit of all the creditors of the granite company, and that in fact it was a deposit in trust for that purpose. And it being charged with such trust, the plaintiff, as trustee in bankruptcy, is entitled to recover."

distinctly appears on this record that the funds accumulated in the defendant bank were deposited for a special purpose, with the knowledge and consent of the president of the bank; that the funds could not be checked out by the president of the furniture company without the signature of J. L. Morrison, representative of the creditors' committee. The fund thereby became a trust deposit for specific purposes, with the knowledge and consent of the bank, and the latter had no right of set-off in said fund against the bankrupt's indebtedness to the bank.

Counsel for the bank relies on several cases as announcing a contrary doctrine; namely, New York County Nat. Bank v. Massey, 192 U. S. 138, 48 L. ed. 380, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 199; Clark v. Northampton Nat. Bank, 160 Mass. 26, 35 N. E. 108; Lowell v. International Trust Co. 86 C. C. A. 137, 158 Fed. 781.

In New York County Nat. Bank v. Massey, supra, the court said: "It cannot be doubted that, except under special circumstances, or where there is a statute to the contrary, a deposit of money upon general account with a bank creates the relation of debtor and creditor. The money deposited becomes a part of the general fund of the bank, to be dealt with by it as other moneys,—to be lent to customers and parted with at the will of the bank; and the right of the depositor is to have this debt repaid in whole or in part by honoring checks drawn against the deposits. It creates an ordinary debt, not a privilege or right of a fiduciary character."

But in that case the facts did not show a deposit for a special purpose, with the knowledge and consent of the bank, but only a deposit in the ordinary course of business. In such a case the authorities are uniform that the bank has the right to set off its notes against the deposits.

In Clark v. Northampton Nat. Bank, supra, the case seems to have turned on a finding of fact by the lower court. The court said as follows: "The amount of the notes is to be set off against the balance due on account of the deposits at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, unless the deposits made after March 8, 1892, are to be considered as made with a view to give a preference or to effect a fraudulent transfer of property, contrary to the statute relating to insolvency, or as made upon a trust for creditors. . . . Whether these deposits were made in violation of either § 96 or § 98 of Pub. Stats. chap. 157 was a question of fact, and the court, trying the case without a jury, has found that they were not so made. . . . On the facts found by the court, the rulings on this part of the case were right.

"We are not certain that the exceptions set out all the evidence. Enough, however, is recited to show that the plaintiff had some ground to contend that after March 8th the bank knew that the business of the Florence Tack Company was being carried on with a view of converting its assets into cash, for the benefit of its creditors, and that the company must either effect a compromise with its creditors or go into insolvency. The money received after March 8th ought, perhaps, to have been specially deposited; but this was not done, and the account of the tack company with the bank continued unchanged in form. There is evidence that the defendant's cashier understood that, after March 8th, checks were to be drawn only to 'pay the help' of the company; but there is also evidence that checks were in fact drawn for other purposes and were paid. There appears to be no doubt that the officers of the bank knew of the insolvency of the company on March 8th. Still, it is a question of fact whether the transactions between the company and the bank after March 8th were had under an implied contract or understanding on the part of both parties, different from that which existed before. The [lower] court has in effect found that after March 8th the money continued to be deposited and checks to be drawn upon the same understanding as that which existed before that time; that is, upon the understanding that the relation of the parties continued to be the ordinary one of a depositor with a bank of discount and deposit. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that this finding was wrong. It was for the court below to draw the proper inferences of fact, and the exceptions disclose no errors of law."

In Lowell v. International Trust Co. supra, it was said: "Portions of the propositions submitted to us by the trustee allege that the bankrupt had been insolvent for a considerable time, and that during that period it had been struggling along with its business, with some support from its creditors, and with an understanding between the International Trust Company and some other creditors, by virtue of which all of them, including the International Trust Company, should receive certain pro rata benefits out of whatever funds might come from the Thomas & Pike Coal Company. Therefore it is claimed that the funds now sued for are held by the International Trust Company in a quasi trust, enforceable by the trustee."

The court held: "A trustee in bankruptcy has no interest which he can enforce for the benefit of general creditors in an arrangement between the bankrupt and certain creditors, by which money deposited with one, which was a bank, was to be held in trust and distributed pro rata between them, and which was not prohibited by the bankruptcy statute."

The facts appearing in Lowell v. International Trust Co. are very different from the facts presented on the present record. There the trustee was seeking to enforce a contract between the bankrupt and certain creditors. In the present instance, the fund was accumulated in defendant bank for the benefit of all the creditors, and the bank had become a party to the arrangement. In the present case, the trustee clearly has a right to recover a fund which had been deposited by the bankrupt for the benefit of all the creditors.

We are therefore of opinion that the bank is estopped, by its conduct and by its agreement with the other creditors, from asserting any right to a set-off against the funds derived from the sales of the stock of the furniture company, and that the decree of the chancellor, so holding, was correct; and the same is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

A. O. FOX, Respt.,

v.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE COMPANY,
NY, Appt.

(138 Wis. 648, 120 N. W. 399.)

Conflict of laws — telegram — breach of contract.

The courts of the forum will not, in an action to recover damages for nondelivery of a telegram, enforce a provision of a contract for transmission of the message limiting the liability of the company, which is void under the public policy of the forum, although it is valid in the state where the contract was made and in that where the breach occurred, so that no action could have been brought for the breach in either state.

Note. — Law governing liability of telegraph company.

This note is supplementary to notes in 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 751, and 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 648. These notes treat the question simply from the point of view of private international law, and do not deal with the applicability of local statutes or rules as affected by the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fuel (Ala.) 51 So. 571, an action by the sender for breach of a contract to transmit and deliver a telegram sent from a point in Ten-APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dane County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by negligent failure promptly to deliver a telegram affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action for damages for negligence respecting delivery of a telegram.

These facts were stated for a cause of action: Defendant, a New York corporation, at the city of New York, December 19, 1906, at about noon, eastern time, received from plaintiff a message to be transmitted by its telegraph system to a person in the city of Chicago, at 100 Washington street, for the purpose of avoiding having such person make a useless trip from such city to the city of New York, as he contemplated doing, starting on the 2 o'clock P. M., central time, train on such day. The message was important, which fact defendant was duly notified of at the time it was delivered for transmission. Defendant was also fully informed of the necessity of the message reaching the person to whom it was addressed before the leaving time of such train on such day.

Had the message been expeditiously transmitted and delivered, it would have been received by the person to whom it was addressed before 12 o'clock noon, central time, December 19th aforesaid, and in ample time to have prevented the addressee from starting on the journey to New York. It was received at defendant's office at the Palmer House in Chicago at forty six minutes past 11 A. M., central time, on the day it was sent, but was not delivered at the place to which it was addressed until noon of the next day. By reason thereof the addressee started and made the journey to New York when he otherwise would not have done so, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $157.37.

Defendant for a defense pleaded, among other things, that plaintiff wrote his message on one of defendant's ordinary blanks, containing on the face this language: "The Postal Telegraph Cable Company . . . transmits and delivers this message subject to the terms and conditions printed on the nessee to a point in Alabama, the court referred the question as to the right to recover for mental anguish to the law of Alabama as the place of performance of the contract. This is in accord with other decisions in Alabama, but, as shown in the earlier notes is contrary to the weight of authority elsewhere.

Thus, no recovery can be had for mental anguish from delay in transmission of a telegram sent from a point in Missouri to a point in Arkansas (the law of which allows such damages), the negligence having occurred in Missouri, by the law of which no recovery can be had for mental anguish alone. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crenshaw (Ark.) 125 S. W. 420.

So, damages cannot be recovered for mental anguish for negligence in transmission of a telegram sent from a point in Kansas to a point in Arkansas, where the delay occurred either in Kansas or Missouri, neither of which states permits recovery for mental anguish. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. See (Ark.) 126 S. W. 78.

In Brown v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (S. C.) 67 S. E. 146, the statute of South Carolina permitting recovery for mental anguish was held applicable in an action by the sendee of a telegram sent from a point in South Carolina to a point in the District of Columbia, without reference to the place where the actual negligence occurred. From some parts of the opinion it would seem that the decision is referred to the general rule sustained by the two cases just cited and by many others cited in the earlier notes, that the contract is governed by the law of the place in which it is made and from which the telegram is sent; but other parts of the opinion seem to indicate that the decision was on the ground that the delict was to be regarded as having its situs in South Carolina, from which state the telegram was sent, irrespective of the place where the negligence actually occurred. The latter view would seem to be opposed to the position in Balderston v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 79 S. C. 160, 60 S. E. 435 (cited in the note in 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 651), that the situs of the delict is in the state in which the telegram is to be delivered, irrespective of the place of the actual negligence. If the decision in the Brown Case may be regarded as referable to the principle above stated with reference to the contract of the telegraph company, it is reconcilable with the result reached in the Balderston Case, which was an action ex delicto, and was governed, as the court expressly said, not by the principles applicable to contracts, but by those applicable to torts. See, in this connection, the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Griffin, 92 Ark. 219, 122 S. W. 489 (discussed in the note in 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 652).

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Burris, 179 Fed. 72, an action by the addressee of a telegram sent from a point in Oklahoma addressed to a point in Arkansas, which, because of the negligence of the company, never reached destination, the court held, in effect, that the rule of the Federal court which denies recovery against a telegraph company for mental anguish caused by delay in the delivery of a message would govern except so far as the question might be affected by local statute, and further, upon the authority of Arkansas cases cited in the previous notes, that there could be no recovery under the Arkansas statutes under the circumstances of the case, the negligence not having occurred in Arkansas, but in Missouri, by the law of which there can be no recovery for mental anguish alone, un-back of this blank. . . . Send the following message without repeating subject to the terms and conditions printed on the back hereof, which are hereby agreed to." The indorsement contained this language: "To guard against mistakes or delays, the sender of a message should order it repeated, that is, telegraphed back to the originating office for comparison. For this one-half regular rate is charged in addition. It is agreed between the sender of the message written on the face hereof and the Postal Telegraph Cable company, that said company shall not be liable for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery, or for nondelivery, of any unrepeatd message beyond the amount received for sending the same; nor for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery, or for nondelivery, of an unrepeatd message beyond fifty times the sum received for sending the same, unless specially insured. . . ." Plaintiff did not request to have the message repeated nor to have it insured. The sum paid for the service was 40 cents.

The case turned on whether the language of the indorsement was binding upon plaintiff as a part of his contract with defendant respecting the transmission and delivery of the message. In respect thereto the trial court decided in plaintiff's favor, and also found all matters of fact set forth in the complaint, and held, by reason thereof, that plaintiff was entitled to judgment as prayed for in the complaint. Judgment was accordingly rendered.

accompanied by personal injury or pecuniary loss. (The question, however, whether the right to recover damages for mental anguish, or other questions affecting the contract, are to be determined in accordance with the rule of the state courts or in accordance with the rule of the Federal courts, is not within the scope of these notes.)

In Stone v. Postal Teleg. Co. (R. I.) 76 Atl. 762, it was held, in an action by the sendee, that the validity and effect of regulations printed on the back of the form on which the message was written, making the filing of a written notice of claim within sixty days a condition of liability, and exempting the company from liability beyond the cost of the message unless the same is repeated, were to be determined by the law of another state where the message originated, notwithstanding that the delay occurred in Rhode Island in the delivery of the tele-

The transmission of the telegram in question was business done outside of the forum by contract made outside thereof, was entirely to be performed outside thereof, and is not governed by the public policy, nor by the express law thereof, since it is a New York contract and falls within the approval of the public policy of the United States relative to the control of interstate commerce.

gram in that state. The court said that the plaintiff's action, though in tort, could only be maintained because he was able to show the violation of some duty which the company owed to him arising out of the contract between the company and the sender of the message, and that the action was, therefore, founded upon and limited by that contract.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Douglass (Tex. Civ. App.) 124 S. W. 488, the validity of a stipulation in a contract to transmit a message from a point in Alabama to a point in Texas, requiring notice of claim to be given within sixty days, was referred to the law of Texas, by which it was invalid, upon the ground that the stipulation was one of limitation affecting the remedy as distinguishable from the substantive rights of the parties, and was, therefore, governed by the law of the forum.

No question of interstate commerce is involved in denying validity to a contract as against public policy, especially where it is invalid by the principles of the common law.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It may be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that the place of the contract between plaintiff and defendant was New York, and that by the law of such state the provision on the back of the message was a valid part of the agreement. Elwood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 45 N. Y. 549, 6 Am. Rep. 140; Breese v. United States Teleg. Co. 48 N. Y. 132, 8 Am. Rep. 526; Young v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 65 N. Y. 163; Kiley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 109 N. Y. 231, 16 N. E. 75; Pearsall v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 124 N. Y. 256-267, 21 Am. St. Rep. 662, 26 N. E. 534. In connection with that, it must be conceded, since the tort was committed in the state of Illinois, the cause of action, such as there was, grew out of a violation of the laws of that state. But neither of such concessions nor the fact, if it be a fact, that an action on the claimed liability could not be maintained in the courts of New York or those of Illinois, settles the question of whether it was proper for the courts of this state to entertain it.

It has long been settled here that such a provision as that in question is void as contrary to public policy. Hibbard v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 33 Wis. 558, 14 Am. Rep. 775; Candee v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 34 Wis. 471, 17 Am. Rep. 452. So we turn to this question: Can a contract which is so contrary to the public policy of this state as to be void if made here, be, nevertheless, judicially enforced here, if valid in the state where it was made or breached?

The general rule is that a contract is governed by the law of the place thereof. If by such law it is valid, it is likewise valid everywhere. That, like most general rules, is not universal. It has exceptions. The doctrine as to such exceptions is stated in 2 Kent's Com. 14th ed. 458, to the effect that the courts of one state will not enforce contracts which, though valid in the place where made, contravene their policy. Bartlett v. Collins, 109 Wis. 482, 83 Am. St. Rep. 928, 85 N. W. 703.

The doctrine as to recognition of foreign contracts in the courts of a state, if invalid by the laws of the home jurisdiction, rests in comity. Therefore, it must necessarily rest in sound judicial discretion to limit it, and its general limitations exclude those agreements which are injurious to public rights, or offend against public morals, or contravene public policy, or violate public law as recognized in the place of the forum. Many illustrations of this are found in the books, some of which are cited to our attention by counsel for respondent. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Gardiner, 51 Neb. 70, 70 N. W. 508; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Vandeventer, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 366, 107 S. W. 560; Building & L. Asso. v. Griffin, 90 Tex. 490, 39 S. W. 656; Northern P. R. Co. v. Kempton, 71 C. C. A. 246, 138 Fed. 992; Union Locomotive & Exp. Co. v. Erie R. Co. 37 N. J. L. 23; Commonwealth Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Hayden Bros. 60 Neb. 636, 83 Am. St. Rep. 545, 83 N. W. 922; Pennsylvania Co. v. Kennard Glass & Paint Co. 59 Neb. 435-445, 81 N. W. 372; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. (The Montana) 129 U. S. 397, 32 L. ed. 788, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469; Knott v. Botany Worsted Mills, 179 U. S. 69-71, 45 L. ed. 90-93, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 30; The Guildhall (D. C.) 58 Fed. 796; The Glenmavis (D. C.) 69 Fed. 472; The Kensington, 183 U. S. 263-269, 46 L. ed. 190-193, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 102; Story, Conf. L. §§ 38, 244.

An examination of those authorities will leave no doubt respecting the principle stated. Every state, within certain limitations not necessary here to indicate, has a constitutional right to establish its own peculiar policy. That may be done by legislative enactment or by judicial conception and interpretation of the common law. When done its courts should, and always aim to, administer the public will by giving effect to such policy. "The general principle that the lex loci governs as to the validity of contracts is subordinate to and qualified by," as said by White, Justice, in the Kensington, supra, the supreme principle which inheres in the very nature of sovereignty, that comity cannot set at naught the public policy of a country. Under that principle courts have uniformly regarded the public policy of the place of the forum as superseding the right of a defendant to the benefit of a defense which he might have at the place of the contract, but which is directly contrary to the public policy of the jurisdiction where it is sought to be enforced. That doctrine has at times been vigorously attacked as contrary to the Constitution of the United States, but never successfully, and it has been nowhere more uniformly applied than by the Federal Supreme Court.

What has been said, necessarily, disposes of this appeal in favor of respondent. The stipulation against responsibility for negligence, as we have seen, would be void in a Wisconsin contract by the settled unwritten law of the state, supposed to be reasonably necessary for the protection of our citizens and all persons submitting to our laws or invoking their aid through the instrumentality of our courts. It would not only be void by state policy, judicially declared, but by the written law as well. Section 1778, Stat. 1898, provides that "any person, association, or corporation operating or owning any telegraph or telephone line doing business in this state shall be liable for all damages occasioned by the failure or negligence of their operators, servants, or employees in receiving, copying, transmitting, or delivering despatches or messages." Therefore, the courts will not lend their aid to enforce such a stipulation, regardless of where made, either as a basis for attack or defense.

The judgment is affirmed.

JOHN R. CAMERON et al., Appts.,

v.

CITY OF CARBONDALE.

(227 Pa. 473, 76 Atl. 198.)

Injunction — municipality — extinguishment of fire.

A mandatory injunction will not be issued to compel a municipal corporation to extinguish a fire in a mine within its limits, which is on private property and was started without any wrongdoing on its part.

(March 14, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Lackawanna County dismissing a bill filed to compel the city of Carbondale to extinguish a subterranean fire upon certain private property within its limits. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Vosburg & Dawson, for appellants:

A municipality can be compelled to abate a public nuisance consisting of an immense

Messrs. Louis Gramer and O'Brien & Kelly, for appellee:

The city not only is not bound to act in this matter, but it actually has no authority to act, and if it attempted to expend a large sum from the public moneys in an effort to put out the mine fire, regardless of the question of constitutional limitations, it would be an attempt to make an illegal expenditure of the money of the taxpayers.

The city authorities at most have a discretionary power to take action, and such discretion cannot be controlled by the courts.

19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 721, 732.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Carbondale was not a party to the litigation which led to the decision of this court in McCabe v. Watt, 224 Pa. 259, 73 Atl. 455, and the question of the legal obligation resting upon the city to extinguish the flames of a subterranean fire upon private property within its limits was not before the court for decision. It is a mistake, therefore, to assume that the legal duty of the city to cut off or extinguish the fire under such circumstances was passed upon or decided in that case. What the authorities of a municipality ought to do, in the exercise of a sound discretion, when it comes to grappling with a disastrous underground conflagration, is one thing, and the power of a court of equity to supervise or control the exercise of that discretion is another.

The case was heard upon bill and answer, and from the answer the following facts appear, which must be taken as established:

(1) There are no methods in common and ordinary use which can be utilized to put out the fire complained of in the plaintiffs' bill. (2) Whether the fire can be extinguished at all or not is a question of mining engineering, and a question of which the defendant has no knowledge. (3) Before any intelligent effort can be made to extinguish the fire, an expense amounting to approximately $100,000 would have to be incurred, and that without any assurance that such effort, involving such a large sum of money, would be successful. (4) The defendant has no apparatus by which it or any of its officers are able to extinguish the fire, there is no department of defendant city in any way equipped for the purpose of extinguishing it, and there are no officers of the city competent to undertake to extinguish or confine it. (5) The defendant is entirely without means with which to put out the fire in question.

Upon the facts, which are undisputed, the court below refused to award a mandatory injunction against the city. Nothing appears in the record to indicate that the officers of the city are not acting in good faith, or in the exercise of their best judgment. They cannot be required to do an impossible or an impracticable thing. It may be that the cost of the effort demanded by appellants to extinguish the underground flames would exceed the damage resulting from the fire. It must be remembered that the city of Carbondale is in no way responsible for the existence of the fire. It started upon, and is still confined to, private property. The situation is an extraordinary one, and the record presents nothing to indicate that the city authorities have gone beyond their discretionary power in refusing to act in the premises. It is not for the courts to supervise or control the fair exercise of judgment or discretion by the city authorities.

A further good and sufficient reason why a mandatory injunction should be refused under the circumstances of this case is that its enforcement would require close and continuous supervision by the court for an indefinite time. As our Brother Elkin said in McCabe v. Watt, 224 Pa. 253, 258, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 274, 73 Atl. 453: "A mandatory injunction should never be granted when its enforcement will require too great an amount of supervision by the court. It needs no citation of authorities to sustain this proposition. It is a fundamental principle, and of general application in this and other jurisdictions." He then pointed out that the enforcement of the injunction asked for in that case would "require the employment and supervision of a large force of men for a long period of time. Skilful and experienced men must be employed to direct the work, all of which involves the doing of something from day to day for an indefinite period, and this is what the courts have said will not be undertaken in the enforcement of their decrees, and, if foreseen, no such decree will be entered." This language aptly described what would be called for in the present situation, and fully justified the court below in refusing a mandatory injunction against the city of Carbondale.

As stated by counsel for appellee, it is a matter of common knowledge that mine fires in the anthracite coal regions present perplexing and baffling questions of mining engineering, most difficult to deal with, and at times impossible to grapple with successfully. The principle under which municipalities may be compelled to abate nuisances upon a public highway, or arising out of their own neglect of duty, does not apply here. The defendant city committed no tort. The fire was not permitted to start upon any property under her control, and she is innocent of any wrongdoing in connection therewith. The court below very properly refused a mandatory injunction in this case.

The appeal is dismissed, at the cost of appellants.

Innkeeper — Liability for money deposited.

A guest departing from a hotel acts at his own risk in leaving money with the clerk, to be deposited in the safe until he calls for it, and cannot hold the hotel keeper responsible in case it cannot be found when he returns for it.

(February 7, 1910.)

The duty of an innkeeper with reference to the care which he is bound to exercise ov-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the County Court for the City and County of Denver in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover certain money alleged to have been deposited in defendant's safe. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Doud & Fowler, for appellant:

A gratuitous bailee is liable for gross negligence only.

Messrs. George F. Dunklee and O. E. Jackson, for appellee:

Good faith requires a bailee without reward to take reasonable care of the deposit.

er the baggage and other effects of one who has become a guest is considerably modified as to effects left upon the premises after the relation of innkeeper and guest has terminated. Wear v. Gleason, 52 Ark. 364, 20 Am. St. Rep. 186, 12 S. W. 756. Immediately upon the termination of that relation the liability of the former, as innkeeper, does not, however, cease, but he remains responsible for a reasonable time thereafter, the duration of which is to be estimated by the circumstances of each case, to enable the guest to remove his property. Baehr v. Downey, 133 Mich. 163, 103 Am. St. Rep. 444, 94 N. W. 750; Maxwell v. Gerard, 84 Hun, 537, 32 N. Y. Supp. 849; Kaplan v. Titus, 64 Misc. 81, 117 N. Y. Supp. 944; *Clark v. And this doctrine holds true even though he receives no additional compensation, since the profit received from the entertainment of the guest is regarded as sufficient consideration for the innkeeper's promise to check baggage or deliver it to the place directed by the guest. Giles v. Fauntleroy, 13 Md. 126; Towson v. Havre-de-Grace Bank, 6 Harr. & J. 47, 14 Am. Dec. 254; Miller v. Peeples, supra.

But after a reasonable time for the removal of baggage has elapsed, the liability of the innkeeper, as such, terminates, and the care which he must thereafter exercise with reference to the property of a former guest is that of a gratuitous bailee, liable only for gross negligence. Adams v. Clem, 41 Ga. 65, 5 Am. Rep. 524; Glenn v. Jackson, 93 Ala. 342, 12 L.R.A. 382, 9 So. 259; Clark v. Ball, supra; Murray v. Marshall, 9 Colo. 482, 59 Am. Rep. 152, 13 Pac. 589; Whitemore v. Haroldson, 2 Lea, 312; O'Brien v. Vaill, 22 Fla. 627, 1 Am. St. Rep. 219, 1 So. 137.

Thus, an innkeeper, as such, is not liable for delivering to the wrong person a trunk left by a guest who stated that he would return in three or four days for it. Hays v. Turner, 23 Iowa, 214. The court intimated, however, that the plaintiff might, if he was so advised, bring a new action charging the defendant as an ordinary bailee.

Nor is an innkeeper liable for the loss of a sum of money which a guest, upon leaving, deposited with the clerk, taking his receipt therefor, but which the guest did not return to demand until more than seven weeks had elapsed. Whitemore v. Haroldson, supra.

A similar decision was rendered in McDaniels v. Robinson, 28 Vt. 387, 67 Am. Dec. 720, with reference to an innkeeper's liability for the loss of a bag containing about $4,000 in gold left with the innkeeper for safe-keeping, after its owner had ceased to be a guest and while he was staying at his brother's house. As was well stated in Arcade Hotel Co. v. Wiatt, 44 Ohio St. 32, 58 Am. Rep. 785, 4 N. E. 398, it is beyond the ordinary duties of an innkeeper to undertake to run a bank for the benefit of guests carrying large sums of money.

And in Gelley v. Clerk, Cro. Jac. 188, one who left his property at an inn while he went to another place on business, saying that he would return for it in two or three days, was denied the right to recover the value of the goods which had been stolen. The court stated that the rule as to the innkeeper's liability as follows: "Where he [the guest] leaves goods to keep, whereof the defendant [innkeeper] is not to have any benefit, and goes from thence for two or three days, although he saith he will return, yet he is at his liberty, and therefore is not a guest during that time, nor is the innkeeper chargeable as a common hostler for the goods stolen during that time, unless he make a special promise for the safe-keeping of them; and the action ought to be grounded upon it."

An innkeeper is liable only for gross negligence in the loss of a valise left by a departing guest in the office of the hotel, without calling the attention of the clerk thereto, who not knowing to whom it belonged, placed it in a room where baggage was usually stored. Stewart v. Head, 70 Ga. 449.

And in Hoffman v. Roessle, 39 Misc. 787, 81 N. Y. Supp. 291, the court held that the

A gratuitous bailee is responsible for any loss occurring through the want of that degree of care which good business men should exercise in keeping property of such value.

Musser, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Inasmuch as there was a verdict in favor of the plaintiff below, who is appellee here, the testimony given in his behalf, mainly his innkeeper was not liable for the loss of the valise of a guest who had paid his bill and departed, leaving the valise, with other baggage, in the charge of an employee of the hotel, which valise was afterwards delivered by the clerk upon the presentation of a forged order by a person whom the clerk had frequently seen in the company of the former guest. The clerk was not familiar with the signature of the guest, and did not compare the signature in the order with that on the hotel register. It does not appear how soon after the guest's departure the order referred to was presented. The court said that the baggage was stored purely for the accommodation of the plaintiff, and the defendant was therefore liable only for gross negligence. One judge dissented from the decision, on the ground that the innkeeper did not exercise the care expected of such a bailee, by delivering the baggage upon the forged order of one who had lately been a guest. This case was criticized in Kaplan v. Titus, supra.

The court in the Hoffman Case followed the doctrine laid down in Wintermute v. Clark, 5 Sandf. 242, in which it was held that a guest who leaves property behind him upon terminating his relation with the hotel does so at his peril.

A guest who deposited with the clerk a large sum of money a short while after he had surrendered his room cannot recover for the loss of the same, from the innkeeper, on the ground that the deposit was not made for its security while the plaintiff was a guest, but was made so as to be available when he should desire the same to defray the expenses of a proposed visit. DeLapp v. VanCloster, 136 Mo. App. 475, 118 S. W. 120.

An innkeeper was not held liable, as such, in Palin v. Reid, 10 Ont. App. Rep. 63, for the loss of a box containing papers and books left by a guest after severing his relation with the hotel, with the consent of the innkeeper, in a room used for the storage of luggage, etc., with the understanding that the owner would remove it the following day, but which, owing to illness, was not called for for several weeks thereafter, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) own, will alone be considered. From this it appears that the plaintiff came to the hotel of the appellant at 7 or 8 o'clock in the evening of June 9th, engaged a room, paid for it, and occupied it during the night. The plaintiff was in ill health. After engaging his room, and during the same evening, the proprietor of a sanatorium called upon him at the hotel, and arrangements were made whereby the plaintiff was to go to the sanatorium, and the proprietor was to send a conveyance to the hotel to take him there between 9 and 10 o'clock the next morning. During that evening he counted his money and separated it into two parts. The one part consisted of $200, which he intended to deposit in a bank. The other part consisted of $175, which he was going to take with when it was discovered that the box could not be found. The action was not based on negligence, but the declaration merely averred that the goods were lost; this, the court held, did not disclose a good cause of action, as the box might have been lost without the defendant's negligence.

Gross negligence on the part of an innkeeper was held not to have been shown in O'Brien v. Vaill, supra, in which it appeared that an innkeeper, after the departure of the guest, removed from the room the latter's trunk, which the guest requested the innkeeper to keep for him until his return in some seven or eight days, and placed the same in the main hall way of the hotel, from which it was stolen, and which the proof showed was the place where baggage was usually stored. It further appeared that the only entrance to the upper rooms was through the hotel office, in which someone was always on guard. The court in this case, as it apparently did in the Hoffman Case, took the view that the liability of the innkeeper, as such, terminated at once when the guest paid his bill and left the hotel.

The doctrine above stated with reference to the liability of the innkeeper as a gratuitous bailee was applied with reference to the care of the baggage of a guest who was ordered to leave the hotel for failure to pay for his board, and who did leave without taking his baggage with him. Lawrence v. Howard, 1 Utah, 142.

Culpable indifference on the part of the landlord to the safety of the property committed to his care, rendering him liable for its loss, was shown in Wear v. Gleason, supra, in which it appeared that the trunk claimed to have been lost was delivered to the innkeeper after the guest had surrendered his room and paid his bill, either pursuant to an understanding that it should be held as a pledge for money loaned or in part payment for hotel accommodations. Soon after the delivery of the trunk to the innkeeper a stranger called at the hotel, claimed the trunk as his own, and ordered it to be sent to the baggage room of the depot to be checked. The innkeeper delivhim to the sanatorium. About 8 o'clock the next morning he left his room and went to the hotel counter. He there told the clerk that he was going away; that he did not want his room any more, and asked for the proprietor, by whom he wanted to send some money to a bank for deposit. The clerk asked him why he did not leave it in the safe at the hotel. The plaintiff asked if it would be all right, and the clerk assured him that it would be. Thereupon the plaintiff handed the clerk the $200 which he had intended to bank. The clerk put it in an envelope, which he sealed and on which he wrote the plaintiff's name, put it in the safe, and told the plaintiff if he (the clerk) was not there another clerk would be to give him the money when plaintiff came for it. After this, and between 9 and 10 o'clock, he left the hotel, as arranged the evening before, and proceeded to the sanatorium, where he paid $50 in advance for two months' board and lodging, and deposited the other $125 with the proprietor. Here he became quite ill, and about a month after he had left the hotel he returned for the money he had deposited there. No one then employed at the hotel knew anything about the money. The clerk to whom he had given it was not then in the employ of the hotel. The plaintiff then told the manager of the hotel about the deposit of the money with the clerk. This ered the trunk as requested, and it was never heard of thereafter.

An innkeeper who undertakes to deliver the baggage of a guest to the depot, or on board a steamer, after the guest has paid his bill, is liable for its loss because taken to the wrong place. Sasseen v. Clark, 37 Ga. 242, dictum. Thus, in Giles v. Fauntleroy, supra, it was held that a guest who was entitled to his room for the whole day, but directed that his trunk be taken to a certain steamer in the afternoon of that day, is entitled to recover of the innkeeper for loss of the contents of the trunk due to the failure of the hotel porter to take it to the place directed. The fact that a portorage fee had been paid by the guest, and therefore, as the defendant claimed, the loss was caused by one carrying on an independent employment, was considered by the court not to affect the innkeeper's liability, since the profits received from the entertainment of the guest were held to afford a sufficient consideration for the undertaking to deliver the trunk as requested.

An innkeeper may also become liable for the loss of property which he has agreed to forward to a departed guest. This liability was enforced in Baehr v. Downey, supra, on the ground of breach of contract. The proof showed that a traveling salesman, at the time of severing his relation as guest, requested the hotel clerk to forward any packages which might be received at the hotel directed to the former; the clerk promised to do as requested, in accordance with the general custom on the part of hotel keepers. The court held the innkeeper liable for the loss of a package which afterwards came to the hotel for the guest. The court said that "it is no hardship to hold innkeepers to this liability. . . . Proper protection for the property of agents and their principals demands that this common-law liability attach until the innkeeper has complied with his contract for forwarding."

And in Maxwell v. Gerard, 84 Hun, 537, 32 N. Y. Supp. 849, the innkeeper was held liable for the loss of a trunk which the guest left in his room upon departing from the hotel, under an arrangement with the clerk of the hotel to deliver the same to the express office for the purpose of having it sent home. The trunk was never delivered as requested, and it does not appear what became of it. It was not disputed in the case that no custom existed for innkeepers to perform such acts for departing guests, nor was it contended that the promise of the clerk was outside the ordinary routine of his work as clerk of the hotel. The court said that the innkeeper's liability continued until the trunk should have been delivered to the expressman, which was at once upon the departure of the guest, as agreed.

The unexplained loss of the baggage of a guest who has left the hotel raises a presumption of negligence against the innkeeper, and he will be held liable as a bailee, for want of ordinary care. Heiser v. Berger Catering Co. 128 Mo. App. 210, 106 S. W. 579; Murray v. Clarke, 2 Daly, 102; Hoyt v. Clinton Hotel Co. 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 297. This doctrine was also applied in Murray v. Marshall, 9 Colo. 482, 59 Am. Rep. 152, 13 Pac. 589, in which it appeared that the guest, upon leaving, handed his valise to the clerk, telling him that he would call for it; the clerk took the bag and put it behind the counter. In about forty-eight hours the guest returned, paid his bill, and demanded his baggage, but it could not be found. In holding the innkeeper liable, the court said that if the liability of the innkeeper is that of a bailee without compensation, guests would have but little or no protection, and the court held that a greater degree of care was imposed upon the innkeeper by the fact that the guest's bill was unpaid and that the former, therefore, had a lien on the property.

Likewise, in Adams v. Clem, 41 Ga. 65, 5 Am. Rep. 524, the proof showed that the guest, at the time of paying her bill, informed the innkeeper that a certain person would call for her trunk within ten minutes, to which the latter replied, "Very well." The one engaged to remove the trunk failed to do so, and the former guest sent her son about four days thereafter to get the property, but it was nowhere to be found. In an action for its value the court held that the guest had not delayed an unreasonable length of time before sending for her trunk, and since, in this case, the law presumed was the first the manager knew of it. The former clerk was found, and he informed the manager and plaintiff that he could not remember that the plaintiff had deposited any money. The manager sought for the money, but it was not found. What became of it is not known. During the month after he had left the hotel the plaintiff thought of his money frequently and worried about it, but he told no one about it, nor made any effort to procure it until he went to the hotel about a month afterwards. He brought this action against the hotel company to recover his money. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which motion was denied, and this ruling of the court is one of the assignments of error.

The plaintiff did not deposit his money with the clerk as a guest ordinarily deposits money with an innkeeper for safe-keeping while he is at an inn. He had separated this $200 from his other money and intended to deposit it in a bank. The other money he intended to, and did, take with him to the sanatorium, to pay his expenses there and to supply himself with what he might otherwise need. The $200 was to be put in a bank for safe-keeping. At the last moment he substituted the safe of the hotel for the bank, but the safe was to answer the same purpose as the bank, namely, a safe repository for his money for an indefinite period after he left the hotel. The only further use which plaintiff intended to make of the hotel was as a want of proper care on the part of the innkeeper because of the loss, he must respond in damages.

Liability was imposed in Clark v. Ball, 34 Colo. 223, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 100, 114 Am. St. Rep. 154, 82 Pac. 529, upon one member of a partnership engaged in conducting a hotel, for the theft of a sum of money by a copartner, to whom it had been delivered for safe-keeping by the owner at the time she became a guest, although the guest had severed her relation as such to the hotel and become an employee thereof before a demand was made for the return of the money. The doctrine of the extraordinary liability of innkeepers was held to be inapplicable, and liability was imposed on the defendant on the theory that all members of a firm are liable for property received by one member thereof within the actual or apparent scope of his authority, and misappropriated by him, although the firm never received any benefit therefrom.

If, however, the guest himself is guilty of negligence with reference to his baggage he will not be permitted to recover for its loss. Thus, in Glenn v. Jackson, 93 Ala. 342, 12 L.R.A. 382, 9 So. 259, it appeared that the guest when about to leave the hotel gave his valise to a boy who responded to the bell call, with directions to take it downstairs and check it (although the employee had no authority to check the valise), and leave the check at the clerk's desk. The guest soon thereafter settled his bill with the clerk, without making any mention of his baggage. Some two or three days thereafter he returned, presented the check, and called for his valise, which could not be found, the number corresponding to the check, however, being found on its proper hook. The former guest did not pay for the keeping of his baggage, and there was no evidence to show that it had ever been placed in the check room. In denying the liability of the innkeeper for the loss, the court said: "It is not in the power of a bailor to force upon another the custody of his goods. It must be a duty voluntarily assumed, or one imposed by law. A deposit received by a servant, not in the line of his duty and without the expressed or implied consent of his principal, and against positive instructions, cannot impose a liability upon the principal. In such case, the deposit is a mere personal trust in the servant." It was, however, expressly stated that the defendant would have been liable if the guest, before paying his bill, had called for his valise and it had then been stolen or lost.

Negligence on the part of the guest defeated his recovery in Lawrence v. Howard, supra. In this case the guest was ordered to leave, for failure to meet his hotel bills. Upon his departure he did not take his baggage with him, nor did he make any demand for it at that time, although it would have been delivered to him without hesitation if he had asked for it. The baggage was left for sometime in the room formerly occupied by the guest, but subsequently removed to the room which was the usual place for keeping baggage not called for. Sometime after, the guest demanded his property, but only one trunk could be found, and that was delivered to him. In denying a right to recover, the court said that "although the goods were not, at the time the defendant was turned away from the hotel, tendered to him, and the failure so to do may have been negligence, yet we cannot look upon it as gross negligence. . . . The defendant's own negligence contributed to the loss. Had he asked for his property when he quitted the hotel, he would have received it, and this defense would never have been set up."

And in Miller v. Peeples, 60 Miss. 819, 45 Am. Dec. 423, the court refused to hold the innkeeper liable for the loss of a valise left by one who had been a guest, in the room of a friend, while the former was absent in another town on business, intending to return later to remove the valise.

The act of one who had been a guest, in leaving his valise unfastened in an unfastened room, which he had occupied merely for the purpose of changing his clothes in preparation for visiting a friend, was held in Lynar v. Mossop, 36 U. C. Q. B. 230, to be negligence, defeating his right to recover of the innkeeper for the theft of the baggage.

place of deposit in lieu of a bank. An innkeeper is not bound to receive the goods of a person who desires the use of the inn only as a place of deposit. Arcade Hotel Co. v. Wiatt, 44 Ohio St. 32, 46, 58 Am. Rep. 785, 4 N. E. 398. To make a hotel a substitute for a bank, and to use the hotel for no other purpose, does not ordinarily occur in the course of hotel management. Such a transaction is without the ordinary duties of an innkeeper, is foreign to the ordinary management of an inn, and must therefore be based upon a special contract. The plaintiff had done all that was necessary to do so far as this deposit is concerned, at least, in order to sever the relation of innkeeper and guest, which had existed between him and the defendant. He had made arrangements to go elsewhere. He had paid for his room and had given it up. He was going away with no intention of returning as a guest. The deposit of the money was made as in a bank, and not in view of, nor in connection with, the relation of innkeeper and guest. All this he communicated to the clerk before or at the time of the deposit, and by communicating it he then and there severed his relation as a guest of the hotel, so far, at least, as such deposit was concerned.

In Wear v. Gleason, 52 Ark. 364, 20 Am. St. Rep. 186, 12 S. W. 756, Boddy, a salesman of the plaintiff, was a guest at defendant's hotel. He paid his bill, obtained a loan of $25, leaving a trunk as security. Boddy then gave defendant a duebill for the $25 received, and defendant offered to give a check for the trunk, which was declined. Boddy gave defendant a railroad check for the trunk, and the latter sent and got it. The court said: "There is no evidence to show that Gleason received the trunk in the capacity of innkeeper. Boddy had severed his personal connection with the hotel by surrendering his room and paying his bill before the trunk was delivered to Gleason. It was subsequently delivered to him, either under an understanding that it should be held as a pledge for money loaned by him to Boddy, or only for the accommodation of Boddy." So in the case at bar, after the plaintiff, by his own acts and declarations, had severed his personal connection with the defendant, the clerk received the money for the accommodation of the plaintiff, without regard to his relation as guest. In the case of McDaniels v. Robinson, 28 Vt. 387, 67 Am. Dec. 720, the plaintiff was a guest of defendant, and on the evening of March 5th plaintiff delivered to the defendant a bag of gold, and immediately thereafter the plaintiff left the inn without any intention of returning, and intended to terminate his personal stay there. In that case the court plainly holds that the deposit of the gold with the defendant had no connection with the original relation of landlord and guest, so that such relation must have ceased at the time the gold was deposited; for the court on page 390 of 28 Vt., says: "The leaving of the bag of gold in the custody of the defendant had no connection with the original relation of landlord and guest between the parties; and, when the money was lost, the plaintiff had ceased to be personally the guest of the defendant, and, indeed, we are to understand from the case that, when the plaintiff handed the gold to the defendant, he had made up his mind to leave the defendant's inn, not to return again to it as a guest, and that he did immediately thereafter leave, with the intention not again to return, and in no proper sense could the plaintiff be said to be the personal guest of the defendant at the time of the loss." In the case at bar the plaintiff had not only made up his mind to leave the hotel, and not to return to it again as a guest, but he actually communicated that fact to the clerk at or before the time of depositing the money, and he deposited the money, not as a guest ordinarily deposits something with an innkeeper, but, as we have seen, in lieu of a bank. So that, as in the Vermont case, the deposit of the money with the clerk had no connection with the original relation of innkeeper and guest. Under the special facts and circumstances of this case, the authority of the clerk to receive such deposit, so as to bind the defendant, was not within the apparent scope, nor within the ordinary course, of the clerk's employment, and the plaintiff had failed to show any special authority in the clerk to receive the deposit. The plaintiff knew, or ought to have known, that the clerk had no such authority arising from the ordinary course of his employment as a hotel clerk. That the plaintiff at least doubted such authority in the clerk is evidenced by the fact that he asked for the manager of the hotel, with whom to intrust his money for deposit in the bank. The authority which the clerk assumed was an unusual one, because it was without the apparent scope and ordinary course of the clerk's employment, and ought to have put the plaintiff on his guard; and it was a duty incumbent upon the plaintiff to act with ordinary prudence and reasonable diligence under such circumstances if he desired to hold the defendant responsible for his money. Mechem, Agency, § 290. The law of agency in general applies to bailments. The bailee is answerable for the acts of those he employs under him, so far as those acts are committed within the real or apparent scope of the agent's employment. Schouler, Bailm. 3d ed. § 19. "While an individual proprietor of an inn may incur a liability as bailee for the safe-keeping of goods, which he has voluntarily undertaken to keep for others than guests, it is not within the course of employment of a mere clerk of such innkeeper to receive on deposit the goods of any except guests of the inn, and, if he does so, it is a transaction between him and the owner, and no liability for the loss of such goods attaches to the innkeeper." Arcade Hotel Co. v. Wiatt, 44 Ohio St. 32, 49, 58 Am. Rep. 785, 4 N. E. 398, 405. In the cases of Murray v. Marshall, 9 Colo. 482, 59 Am. Rep. 152, 13 Pac. 589; Clark v. Ball, 34 Colo. 223, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 100, 114 Am. St. Rep. 154, 82 Pac. 529, and Brown Hotel Co. v. Burckhardt, 13 Colo. App. 59, 56 Pac. 188, referred to in the briefs, the facts, circumstances, subjects, and purposes of the bailments, are so essentially different from those in the present case that those opinions do not appear to be at all applicable here one way or the other.

From all of the foregoing, it appears that the clerk was without authority to receive plaintiff's money, so as to bind the defendant, and the plaintiff failed to connect the defendant with the loss of his money so as to make the company responsible for its loss. It follows, therefore, that it was error to overrule defendant's motion for nonsuit, and, as that error was not cured by any subsequent testimony, the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE BANK OF MOORE, Appt.,

v.

JOHN R. FORSYTH, Respt.

(— Mont. —, 108 Pac. 914.)

Note — want of consideration — defense.

1. Want of consideration is a defense to the enforcement of a note by the payee against the maker, although it purports on its face to have been given for value received.

Bank — authority of cashier — promise to maker of note.

2. The cashier of a bank has no authority to bind the bank by his promise that one signing paper without consideration, to replace that of the cashier, to enable the bank to pass inspection, shall not be held liable thereon, and one signing such paper is chargeable with notice of such want of authority, and acts at his peril in relying on the promise.

Note — substituted paper — surrender of note.

3. The surrender by a bank of paper 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which it holds against its cashier, in exchange for that of a stranger, is sufficient consideration to enable it to enforce the substituted paper.

Principal — knowledge of agent — notice — individual transaction.

4. A bank whose cashier induces a stranger to substitute his note for his own, which is held by the bank, is not, by reason of the cashier's knowledge, chargeable with notice that the maker received no consideration for the note.

(April 30, 1910.)

Note. — Power of bank officer to bind bank by agreement that liability of party to commercial paper shall not be enforced.

This note is confined to the power of the executive officers of the bank, such as president, cashier, etc., and does not include cases involving the power of bank directors as such.

As to power of bank officer to bind bank by agreement varying the liability of parties to commercial paper from that imported on its face, see note to First Nat. Bank v. Lowther-Kaufman Oil & Coal Co. post, 511.

It is a general rule recognized by the great majority of the cases, that the president or cashier or any other similar executive officer of a bank has no authority, simply by virtue of his office, to bind his bank by an agreement made with the maker or indorsers of commercial paper payable to the bank, that their liability on such paper will not be enforced. The rule applies whether the agreement is made before the paper has been signed, or after; but for convenience, the cases have been grouped according to the time the agreement was made.

Of course, if the bank ratifies the action of its officers, or fails to repudiate it within a reasonable time, then the bank will be liable,—the same as any principal who ratifies or acquiesces in the acts of his agent. Cases turning merely upon the question of ratification have not been included in this note.

Attention is called to the several cases fully set out in the foregoing opinion, which assert the general rule laid down above.

Agreement that no liability will be incurred.

The general rule has been frequently applied where a party to commercial paper claims that previous to the execution of the paper a bank officer told him that he would incur no liability.

Thus, an agreement made by the president of a bank that the defendant would not be liable if he indorsed certain notes to the bank was held, in Loomis v. Fay, 24 Vt. 240, not to be binding on the bank.

So, the representations by the president of a bank that the maker of a note payable to him, but discounted at the bank, will not APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Fergus County in defendant's favor and from an order denying a new trial in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certain promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. W. Belden for appellant.

Messrs. Blackford & Blackford for respondent.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff began this action in the district court of Fergus county to recover judgment against the defendant on a certain promissory note for $1,550, dated June 20, 1907, due four months after date, with in-be called upon to meet the note, are not binding upon the bank. Kennedy v. Otoe County Nat. Bank, 7 Neb. 59.

Thus, it is not within the authority of the president of a bank, when he discounts paper for the bank, to promise the maker that he need not pay it. First Nat. Bank v. Tisdale, 18 Hun, 151, affirmed in 84 N. Y. 655.

So, too, the president of a bank has no power to bind the bank by an agreement with the purchaser of the stock of the bank, that a note given in payment thereof will not be enforced. Mead v. Pettigrew, 11 S. D. 529, 78 N. W. 945.

And, in Fowler v. Walch, 119 App. Div. 542, 104 N. Y. Supp. 54, it was held that the president of a bank who procures a note made by himself and others to be discounted by said bank solely for the joint benefit of himself and of the other makers, by acting for or assuming to act for the bank, cannot make any agreement respecting such note which will in any manner relieve such makers, himself included, from their obligation to pay the same, when such agreement made by the president has not been ratified by the bank otherwise than by his acts as such president.

The maker of a note payable to a bank, given in renewal of another note which had been given for the amount of a draft indorsed by him solely for the purpose of identification, is not released from liability to the bank because he was assured by the cashier or the president, or both, before signing each paper, that he would incur no liability by signing the instrument. Thompson v. McKee, 5 Dak. 172, 37 N. W. 367.

A bank president has no inherent power as such to bind the bank by an admission to the effect that a promissory note was intended merely as a voucher. Hodge v. First Nat. Bank, 22 Gratt. 51.

In National Bank v. Williams, 46 Mo. 17, a bank cashier advanced the bank's money to the defendant to speculate in cotton, and the defendant signed a sight draft for the amount, which he claimed was without consideration so far as he was concerned and was intended only as a memorandum. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

terest after maturity at the rate of 10 per cent per annum. The defendant answered, admitting the corporate capacity of the plaintiff, and that the latter was the owner and holder of the note. He also admitted the making and delivery of the note, but denied that it was given for a valuable consideration, or for any consideration whatever. By way of affirmative defense he alleged that the note was made at the express instance and request of the plaintiff, without consideration, and for plaintiff's accommodation. He further pleaded in his answer that, at the time the note was made and delivered, it was agreed between him and the plaintiff that he should not be required to pay the note, and that he should not be in any manner liable thereon. As a further affirmative

The language of the court implies that it considered that the defendant could not escape liability because of the cashier's agreement not to hold him liable, but it was held that the bank, through its officers, had been guilty of laches in failing promptly to take proper steps to charge the defendant with liability, and consequently could not recover.

Agreement to release a party to a note from existing liability.

So, too, the general rule has been applied where a party to commercial paper has attempted to rely upon some agreement or act of the president or cashier, to release him from his liability upon the paper.

Thus, in Ecker v. First Nat. Bank, 59 Md. 291, it was held that a cashier as such has no power to accept a note signed by two parties only, in payment and discharge of a note upon which another party was also bound with the two, so as to release such third party from his indebtedness to the bank. The court said: "Such an act does not fall within the well-known range of powers and duties naturally and necessarily pertaining to the office of cashier. He cannot, virtute officii, release a surety upon a note even though the bank holds other security to which it might resort, nor make collateral contracts or agreements of any kind."

So, a cashier of a bank has no implied power, merely by virtue of his office, to receive money for interest in advance on a note owned by the bank, and agree to extend time of payment, and thus discharge an indorser from liability. Bank of Ravenswood v. Wetzel, 58 W. Va. 1, 70 L.R.A. 305, 50 S. E. 886, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 48.

And in Vanderford v. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank, 105 Md. 164, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 129, 66 Atl. 47, it was held that a cashier had no implied power by virtue of his office to alter a note by extending the time of payment without the knowledge and consent of the bank, so as to release a joint maker of the note who did not consent to the extension. The court said that this ruling was defense he alleged that the note was procured by plaintiff through false and fraudulent representations on the part of plaintiff's cashier, with intent to deceive and defraud him. This latter defense was abandoned at the trial. The plaintiff by replication denied the new matter set forth in the answer. The cause was tried to the district court of Fergus county sitting with a jury. A verdict was returned in favor of the defendant, and judgment was entered thereon. From that judgment and an order denying a new trial the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

The note purported to have been made for value received. After the same was introduced in evidence the plaintiff rested. Thereupon the defendant testified, in part, fully supported by the case of Gray v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 81 Md. 631, 32 Atl. 518, which held that a bank cashier has no authority, virtute officii, to accept a new note in place of an old one, and thus release a surety upon the old note.

So, in Merchants' Bank v. Rudolf, 5 Neb. 527, it was held that a cashier of a bank by virtue of his office is not authorized to release a surety upon a note or bill belonging to the bank, without payment.

In Cochecho Nat. Bank v. Haskell, 51 N. H. 116, 12 Am. Rep. 67, the court said: "We think the cashier of a bank has ordinarily no power to discharge a debtor of the bank without payment, or to bind the bank by an agreement that a surety should not be called upon to pay a note he had signed, or that he would have no further trouble from it."

So, in Daviess County Sav. Asso. v. Sailor, 63 Mo. 24, where a surety called upon the bank to ascertain whether a note on which he was surety had been paid by the principal, and was informed by the cashier that the note had not been paid, but that the bank had made arrangements with the principal by which the bank looked to him alone for payment, and that it did not look any longer to the surety, it was held that the agreement to discharge the surety was not within the ordinary scope of the cashier's authority.

A teller of a bank has no authority as such to erase the name of the signer of a note payable to the bank merely upon the signer's request, and his act in so doing does not operate as an alteration so as to release the other makers. Marine Bank v. Ferry, 40 Ill. 255.

The treasurer of a bank has no power to bind the bank by a promise to notify sureties upon a note of any failure to pay upon securities furnished by the principal. New Hampshire Sav. Bank v. Downing, 16 N. H. 188.

In Olney v. Chadsey, 7 R. I. 224, the court held that the president of a bank has no power by virtue of his office to surrender or release the claims of the bank against anyone.

as follows: "This note was made in the bank at Moore, at C. W. Thurston's bank. Thurston was at that time cashier of the bank. Q. How came you to make this note?" This question was objected to on the ground that any oral contemporaneous agreement would tend to vary and change the tenor of the note, and because it had not been shown that Thurston was acting within the scope of his authority as cashier. The objection was overruled, and the witness continued: "Well, Mr. Thurston asked me to make a note, sign a note, for $1,500, and I told him that I did not want to sign the note, and he asked me why, and I told him I could not pay the note if I was called upon to do so. He said that the bank would not hold me responsible. He said that his

In Payne v. Commercial Bank, 6 Smedes & M. 24, the question was raised, but not passed upon. It was contended that the court erred in charging the jury that the agent or cashier of a bank had no authority to bind the bank by any contract that would release parties from their notes. But the appellate court said that it was evident that the verdict was not predicated on a want of power in the cashier to bind the bank, but on the total absence of any binding contract.

The decision in Wakefield Bank v. Truesdell, 55 Barb. 602, is apparently to the contrary. Here it was held that the act of a bank's cashier in accepting interest in advance upon a note at its maturity was binding upon the bank, and the guarantor upon the note was thereby released. It may be, however, that this case is distinguishable upon the ground that the act of the cashier in accepting the interest for the bank was strictly within the scope of his authority.

Admissibility of parol evidence to prove the agreement.

In connection with the cases set out below, it should be borne in mind that they form but a very small portion of the cases dealing with the general question of the admissibility of parol evidence to vary the liability of parties to negotiable instruments. And any general conclusion as to the admissibility of parol evidence for that purpose, drawn from these cases, might be misleading, as possibly the rule as to admissibility of parol evidence in those jurisdictions might have been changed by later cases not within the scope of this note. The cases set out, however, present the then prevailing rule of the jurisdiction, as applied to the concrete question presented by the title to this note.

As to admissibility of parol evidence to vary liability of irregular party to bill or note from that declared by the negotiable instruments act, see note to Haddock, B. & Co. v. Haddock, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 136.

As to admissibility of parol evidence that written instrument for the payment of paper would not, that the bank would not want his paper in there, and that it would not look well to the bank examiner, and I told him that was the condition under which I would sign it, that the bank would not hold me liable or responsible on the note; and he said the bank would never ask me to pay it, and that he would look after it, and that I never need bother about it. And I signed the note, and he took it and turned it in to the teller. I did not receive any of the proceeds of the note. I was not called upon to pay the note at the time of maturity. It must have been a month after the note matured before anything was said about it. Mr. Thurston was not still cashier of the bank. Mr. Hedrick, the cashier that went in afterwards, called upon me to pay the note. It is supposed Thurston got the proceeds of the note. Of course, at that time I didn't know whether he did or not. What makes me think he did is because it has been shown that he did to my mind.

It is through matters subsequently learned that I base my answer that Thurston got the proceeds of the note. Of my own knowledge I don't know anything about the matter. I had no dealings of that sort with Thurston before. He and I were in the real estate business together at that time. We were partners at that time in the Judith Basin Realty Company. At that time I was occupying an office in the State Bank of Moore; I had a back room. The Judith Basin Realty Company did not share any of the proceeds of that note. I did most of the work of the realty company."

John N. Phillips, a former bookkeeper and teller of the bank, testified: "Mr. Thurston was cashier of the bank until September 3, 1907. When this note went into the bank it took up three of Mr. Thurston's cash items, aggregating $480.48, which had been running some little time, also two notes carried in the bank by Mr. Thurston, aggregating $423.07. These notes were given money was executed in reliance upon parol promise that payment was subject to a condition not incorporated therein, see note to Gandy v. Weckerly, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 434.

In some cases, it has been held that even if the agreement of the president or the cashier were binding on the bank, still parol evidence is inadmissible to show the existence of such agreement.

Thus, in Thompson v. McKee, 5 Dak. 172, 37 N. W. 367, it was held that an indorser or maker of a negotiable instrument cannot show by parol that he signed the instrument solely for purposes of identification and upon the assurance of the president and cashier of the bank discounting the paper that he would not be liable thereon, because the effect of such testimony is to contradict the written agreement.

And parol evidence is not admissible to show an agreement between the president of a bank and the maker of a note payable to the bank, that the latter shall not be liable upon it, because such evidence tends to prove that the defendant did not promise what the paper signed by him says that he did. First Nat. Bank v. Tisdale, 18 Hun, 151, affirmed in 84 N. Y. 655.

So, in Davis v. Randall, 115 Mass. 547, 15 Am. Rep. 146, where the defendant offered to prove as a defense that he accepted certain drafts on which the action was brought, for the accommodation of another, and that before they were accepted the president of the bank agreed orally that he should not be called upon to pay the draft, it was held that proof of such an agreement was incompetent, for the reason that it violated the rule of law that oral evidence was inadmissible to vary or control the terms of a written contract.

And in First Nat. Bank v. Foote, 12 Utah, 157, 42 Pac. 205, it was held that parol evidence is not admissible to show that, at the time the defendants signed a note payable to the bank, the cashier thereof told them that it was intended as a mere matter of form and they would not be called upon to pay it, thus negating the written promise.

Parol evidence is not admissible to show an agreement by the president and cashier of a bank that the indorser of a promissory note shall not be liable upon his indorsement thereof. Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet. 51, 8 L. ed. 316.

Parol evidence was held admissible in First Nat. Bank v. Pegram, 118 N. C. 671, 24 S. E. 487, to show that, at the time a note became due at a bank, the cashier informed the indorser that sufficient funds had been deposited by the assignee of the principal to pay the note, but that matters had not been fully arranged, and that it was necessary to renew the note so as to keep the bank's affairs straight, and that the indorser would incur no liability by indorsing the renewal note. No question, however, was raised as to the power of the cashier to bind the bank by the agreement.

In a few cases the objection to the admission of the testimony is not based on the so-called parol evidence rule.

Thus, in People's Sav. Bank v. Hughes, 62 Mo. App. 576, it was held that testimony is not admissible to prove that the cashier of a bank agreed with the surety on a note that, if the latter would procure security for a forged note which had been deposited in the bank to take up the note upon which the surety was liable, the bank would release the surety from his liability, the agreement being beyond the scope of the cashier's authority.

And a subsequent indorser is not competent to prove facts which would tend to discharge a prior indorser from the responsibility for his indorsement. Bank of the Metropolis v. Jones, 8 Pet. 12, 8 L. ed. 850.

to the bank by Thurston, and the proceeds of the Forsyth note, or part of it, took up those two notes. Four drafts issued by the bank on June 20, 1907, through Mr. Thurston, aggregating $51.40, were also paid by Thurston from the proceeds of the note. Part of the other proceeds of this note went to the credit of Mr. Thurston's account, and he took cash for some of it. Under date of June 20, 1907, Thurston's account shows a credit of $400. That $400 came from the proceeds of the Forsyth note. The balance was taken in cash. While I was employed in the bank, Mr. Thurston had charge of making the loans; that was principally his work. He made all kinds of loans. He made loans as large as the capital of the bank would stand. I don't think he consulted any of the directors of the bank. I know positively that on certain loans he did not consult with other directors of the bank. As long as he had charge of the bank he pursued that line of conduct, or making loans of that character and size without consulting the other directors or officers of the bank. He had charge of the promissory notes taken by the bank. In making payments of notes no one was consulted but the cashier. I didn't consult anyone except Thurston. If he was away I used my own judgment in the matters. The bank had a manager. Mr. Thurston was the manager. The directors of the bank held meetings once a year, on the 1st of January. They never held any meetings after that, until September of the year 1907. Mr. Hauck, the president of the bank, was about the bank there quite often, probably twice a week, or once. He usually came into the bank and talked a little while and went out again. Mr. Thurston issued the drafts of the bank exclusively. He made the loans if he was there. If he was away, I made them in his place. Mr. Thurston used his own judgment in making loans. There was no one there for him to consult with. It was the custom to make loans immediately upon application. A great many promissory notes were taken without security. Notes were usually taken by Thurston without consulting anyone else. The president of the bank resided 10 miles from Moore, and the vice president resided 50 miles away. Thurston was in charge of the bank as manager on June 20, 1907. This note came to the bank in the usual course of business. Thurston brought it to me. The rest of the banking force were working under him. He overlooked their work. He had charge of the moneys."

At the close of defendant's case the plaintiff moved for a directed verdict in its favor. The motion was overruled. Thereupon John C. Hauck, the president of the bank, was called as a witness for the plaintiff. He said: "I was supervisor of the affairs of the bank during the year 1907. Every once in a while we would go over the accounts and check them all up, I and Mr. Warr, the cashier of the Bank of Fergus County. We did that for about four months after the bank was started, and then we done it off and on ever since up to the time Thurston left. I went through everything that was in the bank several times in the two years, about five or six times I should judge. That was when Thurston had charge of the bank. I never, as president, authorized Thurston to make any collateral agreements that the paper of the bank should not be, or was not to be, collected. I don't think we directors had any meetings in the spring and summer of 1907."

At the close of all the testimony, the plaintiff's counsel requested the court to charge the jury that, if the State Bank of Moore paid any consideration for the note, their verdict must be for the plaintiff, and also that the alleged oral agreement of Thurston that the defendant would not be called upon to pay the note was no defense to the action. The court refused the requests. Over appropriate objection by the plaintiff, the court advised the jury that, as between the maker and payee of a promissory note, oral evidence touching the consideration thereof could be considered by them, and that if they found that the defendant received no consideration, and that the note was made for the accommodation of the plaintiff, their verdict should be for the defendant. The jury was also instructed, without objection, that "if Thurston owed to or borrowed from the plaintiff the amount of the note sued upon, and if, at the request of Thurston, the defendant gave to the plaintiff the note sued upon in satisfaction of such indebtedness of Thurston to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff accepted the note as such satisfaction, then the note was given upon sufficient consideration, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount due on the note."

The court also gave to the jury instruction No. 3, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the note was given upon a valuable consideration, and that, if that was doubtful upon the whole evidence, plaintiff could not recover; that the admission by the defendant of the execution of the note and its production in evidence made a prima facie case for the plaintiff upon which the jury might find a verdict for plaintiff, unless the defendant introduced evidence which showed that it was not given for a valuable consideration, or evidence to render it doubtful in the minds of the jury whether it was given on a valuable consideration, and that if not so given, or if it was doubtful whether it was given for a valuable consideration, the plaintiff could not recover." Plaintiff objected to this instruction, for the reason that it placed the burden of proving the consideration for the note upon plaintiff, whereas the burden of showing a failure of consideration was upon defendant; also because the instruction is in conflict with instruction No. 9, which reads as follows: "(9) You are instructed that the note sued upon in this case imports a consideration, and the burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support a written instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate it."

Instruction No. 7 reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury that, if you find from the evidence that the defendant signed the note sued upon in this case as an accommodation maker for the plaintiff, and delivered the note to the plaintiff, or one of its officers for the bank, the defendant cannot be held liable thereon, no matter how the bank may have dealt with the note, so long as it retained ownership and control thereof; and, even though you find that the bank, after the note was delivered to it, gave Thurston the benefit of the whole or a part of it, this fact would not render defendant liable on the note." This instruction was also objected to for several reasons; among others, that it conflicts with instructions 8, 10, and 11, given by the court. These latter instructions read as follows:

"No. 8. If you find from the evidence that the note in question was made, executed, and delivered to the State Bank of Moore by John Forsyth, for the accommodation of Mr. Thurston, and that Thurston received the benefits therefrom, then you must find for the plaintiff."

"No. 10. The plaintiff in this action is a corporation, and you are instructed that a corporation is bound by the acts of its officers or agents only so far as they act within the scope of their authority. In this action, the burden is upon the defendant to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that in making the oral agreement, if you believe that such oral agreement was made, Thurston, the cashier of the plaintiff, was acting within the scope of his authority as such cashier, or that such agreement was subsequently ratified by the plaintiff in the action. If the defendant has failed to prove these allegations by a preponderance of the testimony, your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

"No. 11. In this action the defendant claims, among other things, that the note sued upon was made for the accommodation of the plaintiff. You are instructed that an accommodation party is one who has signed the instrument as maker, drawer, acceptor, or indorser without receiving any value therefor, and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person. Such a person is liable on the instrument to a holder for value, notwithstanding such holder, at the time of taking an instrument, knew him to be only an accommodation party."

We think the foregoing extracts from the instructions fairly illustrate the theory upon which the case was tried, and that the motions and exceptions of counsel for appellant are sufficient to raise the vital questions argued in this court. We shall not analyze the instructions, but will content ourselves with the statement that, assuming that they correctly state the law, the jury failed to follow them. The testimony, however, is practically uncontradicted. There is no conflict in essentials, and, in our judgment, but one inference may be drawn from it. Therefore the cause should not have been submitted to the jury. The court should have directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

1. The first question arising is whether the defense of want of consideration in the note, pleaded and attempted to be interposed by the defendant, was a valid one. In the case of Higgins v. Ridgway, 153 N. Y. 130, 47 N. E. 32, the court of appeals, after a review of the New York cases on the subject, held that it was a valid defense to the enforcement of a promissory note against the maker, by the party to whom it was delivered, that the note was without consideration, and was delivered upon the condition that the maker should not be held liable thereon. To the same effect are the rulings of the courts in Breneman v. Furniss, 90 Pa. 186, 35 Am. Rep. 651; Burke v. Dulaney, 153 U. S. 228, 38 L. ed. 698, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 816; Benton v. Martin, 52 N. Y. 570; Garfield Nat. Bank v. Colwell, 57 Hun, 169, 10 N. Y. Supp. 864; Simmons v. Thompson, 29 App. Div. 559, 51 N. Y. Supp. 1018; McFarland v. Sikes, 54 Conn. 250, 1 Am. St. Rep. 111, 7 Atl. 408; Juilliard v. Chaffee, 92 N. Y. 529; Schindler v. Muhlheiser, 45 Conn. 153. In the case of Tacoma Mill Co. v. Sherwood, 11 Wash. 492, 39 Pac. 977, cited by appellant in opposition to the principle laid down in the foregoing cases, it appeared that there was a consideration for the note in question, and the court said: "The law will not permit the maker of a note, where there is a consideration, to show an oral agreement that he was not to be liable at all on the note." Appellant also cites the case of Dolson v. De Ganahl, 70 Tex. 620, 8 S. W. 321, but in that case the court said: "The note fixes the obligation of the appellant to pay, and his pleadings leave open to him only the defense that it was executed without consideration. Evidence tending to support that defense is admissible." The court then proceeded to show that there was a valid consideration for the note. The case of Davy v. Kelley, 66 Wis. 452, 29 N. W. 232, is also called to our attention. In that case it was held that evidence of a contemporaneous oral agreement between the parties to a note, that it was not to be enforced as between them, is inadmissible. But the opinion of the court, by Mr. Justice Taylor, discloses the fact that it was finally determined that the note in suit was given upon sufficient consideration. We are of opinion that, in view of the authorities, and in principle, the rule laid down by the New York court of appeals, in Higgins v. Ridgway, supra, is founded in sound reason, and that the court below properly followed the same.

2. Was the bank bound by the representations of its cashier that defendant should not be called upon to pay the note? The Supreme Court of the United States, in Martin v. Webb, 110 U. S. 7, 28 L. ed. 49, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 428, held that, although a cashier of a bank ordinarily has no power to bind the bank except in the discharge of his customary duties, and although the ordinary business of a bank does not comprehend a contract made by a cashier, without delegation of power from the board of directors, involving the payment of money not loaned by the bank in the customary way, nevertheless it may be inferred from the general manner in which, for a period sufficiently long to establish a settled course of business, he has been suffered by the directors, without interference or inquiry, to conduct the affairs of the bank; and when, during a series of years, or in numerous business transactions, he has been permitted, in his official capacity and without objection, to pursue a particular course of conduct, it may be presumed, as between the bank and those who in good faith deal with it upon the basis of his authority to represent the corporation, that he has acted in conformity with instructions received from those who have the right to control its operations. The matter involved was a legitimate transaction from which the bank derived an advantage. It will be observed that the principle of estoppel in pais was thus invoked against the bank.

Again, the Supreme Court of the United States, in West St. Louis Sav. Bank v. Shawnee County Bank (West St. Louis Sav. Bank v. Parmalee), 95 U. S. 557, 24 L. ed. 490, said: "Ordinarily the cashier, being the ostensible executive officer of a bank, is presumed to have, in the absence of positive restrictions, all the power necessary for such an officer in the transaction of the legitimate business of banking; . . . but certainly he is not presumed to have power, by reason of his official position, to bind his bank as an accommodation indorser of his own promissory note. Such a transaction would not be within the scope of his general powers; and one who accepts an indorsement of that character, if a contest arises, must prove actual authority before he can recover. There are no presumptions in favor of such a delegation of power." Mr. Thompson in his work on Corporations (vol. 2, 2d ed. § 1532) says: "The principal limitation on the powers of a cashier is that his acts must be within his ordinary duties. It cannot be assumed that he is authorized to do every act within the powers of the bank. His implied authority is limited to acts done in the usual and ordinary course of business, and cannot be extended to cover unusual or extraordinary transactions. For the transaction of such business, special authority must be conferred upon him by the directors." In volume 1 of Morse on Banks & Banking (Parsons 4th ed.) § 167, we find this statement: "It can never be pretended that he [the cashier] has any incidental powers to bind the bank by declarations or admissions which are made beyond the scope of his duties. Thus, his statement or promise given to a person who is about to put his name as indorser upon a note which the bank has agreed to discount, to the effect that such person will not be held liable or shall not be looked to by the bank, is altogether inoperative and void as an undertaking of the bank." See also Bolles, Modern Law of Banking, p. 361.

In the case of Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet. 51, 8 L. ed 316, the defendant offered to prove that the cashier and president of the bank gave him to understand that if he indorsed the note in suit, he would incur no risk or responsibility. The court said: "The most decisive objection to the evidence is that the agreement was not made with those persons who have power to bind the bank in such cases. It is not the duty of the cashier and president to make such contracts, nor have they the power to bind the bank except in the discharge of their ordinary duties." In Bank of the Metropolis v. Jones, 8 Pet. 16, 8 L. ed. 851, the court said: "It is unnecessary to add in this case, as was stated by the court in the case of Dunn, that the officers of the bank had no authority, as agents of the bank, to bind it by the assurances which they gave." In the Jones Case it appeared that the president of the plaintiff bank had assured the indorser, through the maker, that he would incur no responsibility on the note on account of the fact that certain property, which could be subjected to its payment, was very valuable. In the case of Thompson v. McKee, 5 Dak. 172, 37 N. W. 367, the facts were these: McKee went to the First National Bank of Sioux Falls to identify one Wolf, and at the request of the cashier wrote his name on the back of a draft, the cashier assuring him that he should not be liable on it, his name being wanted merely to show who identified Wolf. McKee afterwards gave his note to the bank for the amount of the draft it had cashed, with an understanding with the cashier that his liability on the note should not be greater than it was on the draft, and he subsequently renewed this note, with a similar understanding with the president and cashier. The court held that the facts constituted no defense, for the reason that the president and cashier had no authority to make any such contract. Mr. Justice Spencer, speaking for the court, said: "It has been repeatedly held by the highest judicial tribunals that officers of banks have not the power to excuse or limit the legal obligations of persons to the banks they represent, by agreeing with them that they shall not be held liable or called upon to pay the obligations which they make, either as principal debtors or accommodation makers or indorsers, and on the credit of which the bank has parted with its funds." In the case of Clafin v. Farmers' & C. Bank, 25 N. Y. 293, it was held that the general authority of the president of a bank to certify checks drawn upon it does not extend to checks drawn by himself. The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in Dedham Inst. v. Slack, 6 Cush. 408, held that the treasurer of an incorporated institution for savings has no authority, as such, and without being specially authorized thereto, to execute a release in the name of the corporation. In Gallery v. National Exch. Bank, 41 Mich. 169, 32 Am. Rep. 149, 2 N. W. 193, it was shown that one Irwin was president of the bank and also of a railway company. With other directors of the railway company he made a note to the bank. Evidence was introduced tending to prove that the note was not to be paid by the makers thereof, but only from the assets or funds of the railroad company. It was claimed that Irwin, as president of the bank, consented to an arrangement by which the debt was assumed by a third person and the makers released. The court said: "Even, however, had he [Irwin] assumed to act for and represent the bank, being liable as maker and indorser, he could not consent to his own release and that of his comakers, and bind the bank thereby. . . . 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

That he could not act in such a double and antagonistic capacity is well settled in this state." See also Payne v. Commercial Bank, 6 Smedes & M. 24; *Bank of Commerce v. The testimony shows that the transaction in controversy was an isolated one. The defendant testified that he had previously had no dealings of the kind with Thurston. No question of estoppel is involved. Hauck testified that he, as president, had never authorized the cashier to make the arrangement testified to by the defendant, and there is no evidence that the board of directors did so. We conclude, therefore, that the promise of Thurston was, on its face, beyond the scope of his authority, and that the defendant was chargeable with notice thereof. We hold that the cashier of a bank, by virtue of his office, has no authority to make such an arrangement as that testified to by the defendant, and that whoever accepts such an agreement and acts upon it does so at his peril.

3. But it is contended that the note was in fact given without consideration. If so, this was an available defense against the payee, regardless of whether the cashier had authority to promise that defendant should not be called upon to pay. The testimony shows conclusively that the plaintiff in fact parted with full consideration for the note, and, to our minds, the evidence of the defendant himself proves that a valid consideration passed, and that he was aware of the fact that certain assets of the bank were to be withdrawn and his note substituted in place thereof, at the time he executed and delivered the same. How otherwise can his statement that "the bank would not want to have Thurston's paper in there" be explained? The only reasonable construction to be placed upon his testimony is that he knew that Thurston was personally desirous of withdrawing his paper. But it is immaterial what phraseology was employed. The very fact that Thurston proposed to withdraw his own paper was notice to the defendant that he was acting for himself.

And there are other reasons why the judgment cannot stand. The whole transaction shows on its face that Thurston was in fact acting for himself, and not for the bank, and that the defendant either knew the fact, or should have known it: Thurston was engaged in a palpable attempt to defraud the bank of which he was cashier, and the defendant by his acts made it possible for him to consummate the fraud. In the case of Pauly v. O'Brien (C. C.) 69 Fed. 460, Judge Ross said: "It is said for the defendant that the note sued on was without consideration. Not so, according to the agreed statement of facts, for it is there stated that it was executed in place of and to take up the note of Naylor, then represented by the bank officers to be past due and to be secured by collaterals which were believed to be ample to pay it, and which they represented the bank wanted to get 'out of the past-due notes,' and which, together with the collaterals, were to stand as collateral to the note executed by the defendant, upon the execution of which the Naylor note was entered as paid on the books of the bank, and the defendant's note was entered thereon 'as a discount for its face.' It thus appears that the defendant executed his first note, subsequently renewing it from time to time, and ultimately by the note in suit, for the purpose of having it take the place of the Naylor note, which, together with the collaterals, 'were to be collateral to the note' given by him. If, however, this was not really the case, but that, in truth, the transaction was a mere trick to make it appear to the government and to the creditors and stockholders of the bank that it had a valuable note when in fact it did not have one, the result must be the same; for, when parties employ legal instruments of an obligatory character for fraudulent and deceitful purposes, it is sound reason, as well as pure justice, to leave him bound who has bound himself. It will never do for the courts to hold that the officers of a bank, by the connivance of a third party, can give to it the semblance of solidity and security, and, when its insolvency is disclosed, that the third party can escape the consequences of his fraudulent act. . . . It would require more credulity than I possess to believe that the defendant, when his brother, who was the bookkeeper of the bank, came to him with the proposition of its vice president, in its every suggestion and essence deceptive and fraudulent, did not know its true character and purpose. So far as appears, Naylor was a total stranger to him. Why should he execute his note to take up the note of Naylor? What moved him to do it, except to enable the officers of the bank to supplant the overdue note of Naylor with a live note, which he now insists was without consideration and purely voluntary, but which enabled the bank officers to make a deceptive, and therefore fraudulent, showing of assets?"

In the case of Allen v. First Nat. Bank, 127 Pa. 51, 14 Am. St. Rep. 829, 17 Atl. 886, the facts were these: The bank brought an action to recover the sum of $5,000 alleged to be due on a promissory note. The defendant offered to prove that Beecher, the cashier of the bank, came to him at the postoffice and said that the bank was carrying for his firm of Beecher & Copeland a quantity of oil certificates, in excess of what they were permitted to carry for one firm under the laws of the United States, and that the bank desired to have the oil carried in the name of other parties, so as to make an appearance of compliance with the law, and for that purpose he asked the defendant to become the maker of a note for $5,000, to be secured by 5,000 barrels of oil that the bank was carrying for Beecher & Copeland; and, in compliance with this request, Allen executed the note without other consideration, and with the express agreement that he should not be held liable thereon. The trial court directed a verdict for the plaintiff bank. On appeal the supreme court said: "Assuming all the facts covered by the offers to have been proved, they would not have amounted to a defense as against the bank. The whole confusion in the case grows out of the fact that the Mr. Beecher . . . was at the same time a member of the firm of Beecher & Copeland and cashier of the . . . bank. . . . The effort here is to make the bank responsible, not merely for matters done in the scope of his duties as cashier, or by authority of the bank, but also for his acts and declarations done or made in the pursuit of his private business. His interview with the defendant at the postoffice can only be taken as an effort on his part to procure accommodation paper to the amount of $5,000 to take up a like amount of his firm's paper at the bank. In some way his firm had obtained a larger line of discount at the bank than is permitted by the general banking law; the bank examiner was expected soon, and it became necessary for defendant's firm to retire some of its paper. It was equally necessary, perhaps, for the bank; and the defendant, as its cashier, must have been fully aware of the importance of getting the accounts of his own firm in proper condition. He succeeded in procuring from the defendant his note for $5,000, to replace a like amount of his firm's paper, with an assurance that the defendant should never be called upon to pay it." The case of Simmons v. Thompson, 29 App. Div. 559, 51 N. Y. Supp. 1018, is called to our attention by the learned counsel for the respondent. In that case, however, the court held that the vice president of the Loan & Trust Company, who induced the defendant to make the note in suit by representations that he should not be held liable upon it, was apparently clothed with authority in the premises; the facts show that he was actually engaged in carrying forward a transaction which was beneficial to his principal, and also that the corporation had ratified his acts. The question of consideration as arising from the detriment to the trust company, which advanced money on the note, is not mentioned in the majority opinion, but is quite clearly shown by the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Ingraham. Aside from this, we do not regard the doctrine laid down by the court in that case as a healthy one. It loses sight of the rights of innocent stockholders and depositors in banks altogether, and relieves a party who, by affirmative action, has brought about the unfortunate condition in which he finds himself.

But it is contended that the knowledge possessed by Thurston is to be imputed to the bank, and therefore the latter had notice that Forsyth received nothing for the note. The correct rule on this subject is, we think, laid down in Innerarity v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 139 Mass. 332, 52 Am. Rep. 710, 1 N. E. 282, as follows: "While the knowledge of an agent is ordinarily to be imputed to the principal, it would appear now to be well established that there is an exception to the construction or imputation of notice from the agent to the principal in case of such conduct by the agent as raises a clear presumption that he would not communicate the fact in controversy, as where the communication of such a fact would necessarily prevent the consummation of a fraudulent scheme which the agent was engaged in perpetrating. . . . A bank . . . can act only through agents, and it is generally true that, if a director who has knowledge of the fraud or illegality of the transaction acts for the bank, as in discounting a note, his act is that of the bank, and it is affected by his knowledge. . . . But this principle can have no application where the director of the bank is the party himself contracting with it. In such case the position he assumes conflicts entirely with the idea that he represents the interests of the bank. To hold otherwise might sanction gross frauds, by imputing to the bank a knowledge those properly representing it could not have possessed." See also State Sav. Bank v. Montgomery, 126 Mich. 327, 85 N. W. 879.

In the case at bar we have only to consider the effect of the testimony to determine that the defendant is not in a position to dispute his liability on this note. It 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

would be a most dangerous holding if we should decide, upon the facts disclosed by the record, that he could do so. We find no evidence that he had any idea or purpose of accommodating the bank. It does not appear that Thurston was present at the trial. It does appear, however, that he used the funds of the bank from time to time, that he resigned his position there, and that it was necessary to prove his handwriting by another person. The whole record seems to show that his management of the bank was at least open to criticism, and it is not a violent conclusion, perhaps, that he was not available as a witness. The defendant was his partner at the time the note was given, and had his office in the rear of the bank. Upon being requested to sign a note for $1,500, on account of the fact that his (Thurston's) paper in the bank would not look well, he did so without inquiry as to the amount of such paper which it was proposed to take up, and without asking what disposition was to be made of the balance, if any, of the proceeds of the note. He thus made it possible for Thurston, not only to take up two of his own notes for $200 each, which were assets of the bank, but to also draw out a large amount in cash. It seems to us that the request of Thurston bore on its face conclusive evidence that some fraud was projected. The defendant knew that his note was to pass through the regular channels of the bank. He saw Thurston hand it to the teller. It is a penal offense in this state to knowingly make false entries in the books of a bank, or to knowingly subscribe or exhibit false papers with intent to deceive the state bank examiner. Rev. Codes. § 4001. The defendant was chargeable with knowledge of this statute, and with notice that it was Thurston's purpose to violate it. How can it be possible for a man of ordinary intelligence to suppose that a request for an accommodation note for a large amount, made by a cashier, is intended to be for the benefit of the bank? Notes are ordinarily given to a bank for the purpose of borrowing money therefrom. We can conceive of no circumstances under which a bank can require an accommodation note on its own account for any legitimate purpose. It seems to us that the mere request carries notice that the purpose for which such paper is intended to be used is not a lawful one. What legitimate end could possibly be served by carrying in a bank commercial paper which was not to be paid under any circumstances? Obviously none. The only possible design would be to deceive someone, either the stockholders, the depositors, or the bank examiner, who acts for them in the name of the state. It is only an innocent party who may take advantage of such a defense as that attempted to be interposed in this case, when other innocent parties have suffered. The defendant cannot claim to occupy such position. The stockholders in the plaintiff bank have, through his connivance, suffered a loss of $1,550, and a case might arise, as it often does, where the loss would fall upon the still more innocent depositors. We cannot give our assent to the proposition, whatever may have been the holdings of other courts upon the subject, that a party who has been guilty of such gross negligence as has the defendant in this case can escape liability on account of technical rules of law, and compel other persons to stand the loss caused by his total lack of care. The presumption that Thurston informed the bank, through its proper officers, of his fraudulent intention to withdraw its funds for his own personal use, through the medium of defendant's note, is fully removed by the reflection that, had he done so, his purpose would have been defeated.

The order and judgment appealed from are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the District Court of Fergus County, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEW MARTINSVILLE

v.

LOWTHER-KAUFMAN OIL & COAL COMPANY et al.

and

FRANK WELLS CLARK et al., Plffs. in Err.

Note — action — joint judgment — necessity of protest.

1. A joint action may be maintained by the holder of a negotiable note, and a joint judgment recovered against the maker and all the indorsers, if the note has been protested, or if protest and notice has been waived by the indorsers.

Bank — authority of cashier — qualified indorsement.

2. A cashier has no authority, simply by virtue of his office, to bind his bank by an agreement made with the indorsers on a promissory note, and unknown to the directors, to the effect that each of said indorsers shall be liable only for a certain proportion of the debt; and it matters not whether such contract relates to original notes presented for discount, or to notes taken either in payment or in renewal, or pre-existing notes.

Same — notice to director — effect.

3. Notice to one of the directors of a matter affecting the interest of the bank, which it is to the interest of such director to conceal, is not notice to the bank.

Jury — oath — objection to — waiver — appeal — presumption.

4. In a civil action, objection to the form of the oath administered to the jury to try the case cannot be made, for the first time, after verdict. If the record shows that the jury were sworn, and the form of oath administered does not appear, this court will presume that they were properly sworn.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wetzel County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amounts alleged to be due on certain promissory notes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas P. Jacobs and John M. Hamilton for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. E. L. Robinson and Hall & Hall, for defendant in error:

A cashier cannot virtute officii release a surety upon a note held by the bank, even though the bank holds other security to which it might resort, but special authority is necessary to justify such a release.

Note. — Power of bank officer to bind bank by agreement varying the liability of parties to commercial paper from that imported on its face.

As to power of bank officer to bind bank by agreement that liability of party to commercial paper will not be enforced, see note to State Bank v. Forsyth, ante, 501. The limitations prescribed in that note are also observed here.

The few reported cases upon this subject hold with FIRST NAT. BANK v. LOWTHER-KAUFMAN OIL & COAL Co. that a bank president or cashier, merely by virtue of his office, has no power to bind the bank by an agreement that the liability of parties to commercial paper shall be different from that imported upon its face.

Thus, in Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet. 51, 8 L. ed. 316, it was held that the liability of parties to bills of exchange or promissory notes has been fixed on certain principles which are essential to credit and the circulation of such paper, and parol

Mr. Henry M. Russell also for defendant in error.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brought an action of assumpsit in the circuit court of Wetzel county against the Lowther-Kaufman Oil & Coal Company, a corporation, the maker, and C. F. Lowther, W. R. Fitch, J. I. Norris, Brent Shriver, F. W. Clark, and J. W. Kaufman, the indorsers, of six several negotiable promissory notes aggregating, exclusive of interest, $28,000, and on the 23d day of July, 1908, recovered a judgment for $29,195.34. To this judgment F. W. Clark and Joseph I. Norris obtained a writ of error from this court.

The notes were indorsed for the accommodation of the maker. One of them was payable to the order of C. F. Lowther and indorsed by him and the others; another one was payable to the order of Brent Shriver and indorsed by him and the others; and the remaining four of said notes were payable to all of the said defendants and were indorsed by them. The action was tried on November 2, 1907, upon a demurrer to the defendants' evidence, and the jury found a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the amount above stated, subject to the action of the court upon the demurrer to the evidence. The court sustained the demurrer to the evidence and entered judgment upon the verdict. There was also a demurrer to the declaration, which the court overruled.

The first assignment of error relates to the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration. It is insisted that the demurrer should have been sustained for the alleged reason that there is no authority in law for a joint action against the maker and the several indorsers of a negotiable note when the note has not been protested, and § 11, chap. 99, Code 1899 (Code 1906, § 3449), is relied on. This section provides that debt, or assumpsit, may be maintained and a joint judgment rendered against the maker and indorser of negotiable paper, "if the same be protested." The notes in the present case were not protested, but protest had been waived by the indorsers. The signatures of the indorsers appear under the following printed words on the backs of the notes, which were on them at the time they were indorsed, viz.: "Demand, Notice of Protest, and Nonpayment Waived." It is contended that the statute above referred to was not intended to authorize a joint action against the maker and several indorsers of a note unless it has been formally protested. We hardly think so. The declaration alleges that the indorsers waived protest and notice. The statute is remedial and should be liberally construed. Protest and notice of dishonor is intended for the protection of the indorser, and it is a right which he can waive. By waiver he makes his liability just as absolute as if the paper indorsed by him had been formally protested, and his relation to the holder and all other indorsers becomes the same in every respect as in the case of protest. The object of the statute is to give the payee, or holder of the paper, a surer and quicker remedy to collect his money than he formerly had, which was by a proceeding against each indorser in the inverse order of their indorsement: and also to avoid a multiplicity of actions. It would therefore be extremely technical and unwarranted, we think, to give the statute the limited construction contended for. It would be contrary to the spirit of the statute. It was therefore not error to overrule the demurrer to the declaration.

The next error relied on in brief of counsel is that the court erred in permitting the evidence is not admissible to show that one who indorsed a note did so upon the assurance of the president and cashier that it was only a matter of form to satisfy the requirements of the law, and that certain bank stock had been pledged or was to be pledged as security for the payment of the note, and that the indorser was to be looked to only in case of a deficiency.

So, a cashier, in the ordinary performance of his duties as such, has no power to bind the bank by an agreement with the surety upon a note, made at the time the note was delivered to the bank, that the bank would obtain certain securities sufficient to pay the note, as collateral to the note, and the securities would be exhausted 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

before any liability of the surety would attach. Martin v. First Nat. Bank, 11 Ohio C. C. N. S. 93.

A bank cashier has no power to bind the bank by an agreement with an indorser upon a protested note that, if the indorser will confess judgment thereon, the bank would hold such judgment as collateral security and endeavor to collect the debt from the maker of the note. Bank of Pennsylvania v. Reed, 1 Watts & S. 101.

A bank president has no power to bind the bank by an agreement made with one depositing securities to a note, to the effect that he would see that the note was paid and that the securities would not be sold. Breyfogle v. Walsh, 71 Fed. 898.

notes sued on to go as evidence to the jury. This involves the same question raised by the demurrer to the declaration; and, there being no error in overruling the demurrer, it necessarily follows that there is no error in admitting the notes in evidence, because of want of protest. There is a written waiver on the notes.

The next error assigned relates to the rejection of the defense set up by special pleas filed by the two plaintiffs in error. The plea of nonassumpsit was also pleaded, and issues were joined on these several pleas. The special pleas set up, as a defense, a certain written contract alleged to have been made between the several indorsers on the aforesaid notes, as directors and stockholders of the Lowther Oil Company, the predecessor in interest of the Lowther-Kaufman Oil & Coal Company, fixing and limiting their liability on account of their several indorsements, of which contract it is alleged plaintiff, through its cashier, had notice, and to the terms of which it agreed. The questions arising under these several special pleas will be considered along with the questions arising under the next assignment of error, which relates to the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the defendants' evidence.

The contract set up in the special pleas bears date the 7th day of November, 1901, and is made between C. F. Lowther, in his own right and as administrator of F. P. Lowther, deceased, and L. M. Merrill, F. W. Clark, W. R. Fitch, Joseph I. Norris, J. W. Kaufman, and Brent Shriver. It recites that the parties named own all the stock in the Lowther Oil Company, a corporation, in the following proportions, viz.: C. F. Lowther, $\frac{1}{4}$; the estate of F. P. Lowther, $\frac{1}{4}$; L. M. Merrill, $\frac{1}{8}$; F. W. Clark, $\frac{1}{8}$; W. R. Fitch, $\frac{1}{8}$; Joseph I. Norris, $\frac{1}{8}$; J. W. Kaufman, $\frac{1}{8}$; and Brent Shriver, $\frac{1}{8}$. It further recites that it may become necessary to borrow money, to execute new notes, and to renew notes already made, in order to carry on the business of the company; that in regard to such indebtedness said parties are not willing to be bound further than in proportion to the amount of their stock held in said company. The contract then proceeds to authorize and empower the president and secretary of said corporation to borrow money not exceeding \$50,000, and also to renew any outstanding indebtedness, to execute the promissory note of said corporation for any loan of money, or in renewal of notes, and concludes with a guaranty for the payment of any such note in proportion to the stock owned by each, and provides that "if in the negotiation of any such loan or renewal it becomes necessary for any of said stockholders to indorse or sign any such notes individually in order to satisfy the rules and regulations of the bank from which any such money is borrowed, the said stockholders shall be liable to said bank and to each other upon any such note or notes in proportion to their said stock in said corporation." This contract was signed by the Lowther Oil Company and by all of the above-named parties, and below their signatures was the following memorandum or note:

The First National Bank of New Martinsville, West Virginia, hereby takes notice of this contract, and any money it may loan to said Lowther Oil Company will be loaned upon the terms therein set forth and agreed upon between the individual stockholders.

First National Bank,

By J. Lee Harne, Cash.

[Corporate Seal of
First National Bank.]

We have no doubt that such a contract, as between the parties to it, is lawful and enforceable, but it is claimed by defendant in error that it was not a party to the contract, and is not bound by it; that the cashier was not authorized to bind the bank by such a contract; that the directors never had any knowledge of it, and never ratified it. There is no evidence in the case that Cashier Harne was authorized by the board of directors to make the agreement, nor does it appear that he ever presented it to them for ratification at any of their meetings. Mr. Harne says he does not know whether he presented it to the board of directors or not. He says, "It may have been presented at a meeting and discussed, but I don't recollect positively." He also says that he does not know that he even called it to the attention of any of the officers of the bank. There is evidence, however, that Mr. C. F. Lowther, one of the indorsers, was also a director of the bank for the years 1903, 1904. But he, being a one-fourth owner of the stock of the Lowther Oil Company, is bound by the agreement for as large an amount as any other indorser, and is bound for four times as much as either Norris or Clark, the plaintiffs in error, and would therefore be interested in withholding his information from the other bank directors. Consequently, the information which C. F. Lowther had could not be imputed to the directors, who act collectively, so as to bind the bank. 1 Morse, Banks & Banking, §§ 112, 136; 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 461, and numerous cases cited in note 22. No copy of the contract was deposited with the bank. Cashier Henry Koontz, who succeeded Cashier Harne in July, 1904, says that he examined the book containing the minutes of the various meetings held by the directors, and that they contained no mention of the contract. Robert Morris, who was one of the directors of the bank ever since its organization, and who lives in the town of New Martinsville and attended most all of the directors' meetings, testifies that this contract was never called to his attention, and that he had no knowledge of it whatever. S. Bruce Hall, one of the stockholders of the bank, and also its president until January, 1902, and afterwards a director from January, 1902, to January, 1903, testified that he had no knowledge of such a contract. Both he and Robert Morris, however, testify concerning a certain written contract which was prepared by said Hall, and which, he says, occupied about a half a typewritten page, limiting the liability of the stockholders of the Lowther Oil Company upon their indorsement of one certain note of $5,000, but that this contract applied to no other note. There were a number of $5,000 notes given by the Lowther Oil Company that were indorsed by its directors, and the testimony of Cashier Koontz shows that two of these $5,000 notes were paid in cash, or by check, in 1905. So that, it does not appear that either of the two $5,000 notes sued on is the one concerning which Mr. Hall prepared the contract. But Mr. Hall furthermore testifies that the bank was not a party to the contract prepared by him, and knew nothing of it. Mr. Harne, the cashier, also testifies that, "as a rule, when any of the notes fell due, he renewed them without referring the matter to the discount committee," and that he does not remember to have referred any of the renewal notes to the "discount committee, or having them pass on them." So that, allowing full faith and credit to all the defendants' evidence, and considering all proper and reasonable inferences deducible from it, we think it fails to prove either that Cashier Harne was ever authorized by the directors of the bank to make the contract, or that they ever ratified it. The case turns then upon the following question of law, viz.: Had the cashier power, by virtue of his office, to bind his bank by such a contract? We think he had not. It is a well-settled principle of law that the cashier has no authority to bind his bank by acts done without authority, and beyond the scope of his duties and power. But this is too general. The question is: Was the particular act in question beyond the scope of his authority? To determine whether or not a particular act of the cashier is beyond his power is often very perplexing, because it depends largely upon the custom and usage of the particular bank affected, and also upon usage prevailing in particular localities. Hence there is much apparent conflict in the decisions of the courts of the various states of the Union.

Assuming, as we must do from the proof, that Cashier Harne had no express authority from the directors to surrender the notes which had the unqualified indorsements of the indorsers thereon, and to take in renewal thereof notes indorsed by the same persons, but under an agreement, separately made with them and not appearing on the notes, qualifying and limiting their several liabilities to a sum less than the full amount of the notes, it is clearly seen that he would thereby be surrendering some of the security of his bank. This he could not do without exceeding his powers. This would apply to all those notes in existence at the time the contract was made, and which were carried into any of the notes sued on, by renewals. But it appears that some of the notes sued on were taken either in payment, or renewal, of notes of the Lowther Oil Company, which were discounted after the contract was made. Had the cashier power, by virtue of his office, to lend the bank's funds, or to discount bills and notes? If he had such power without consulting the board of directors, or the discount committee, then we do not doubt that he had the power to bind his bank by the contract, because the power to discount paper with the bank's funds would carry with it the power to pass upon the sufficiency of the security, and incidentally the power to make any contract affecting the security that the directors as a body could make. But it is not shown that the cashier is authorized by the charter or the by-laws of the bank to make loans of the bank's funds. The evidence shows that it was the custom of the bank to have applications for original loans passed on by the discount committee before the paper was discounted, although Cashier Harne testifies that, in some instances, he discounted paper without referring it to the directors or to the discount committee; but he does not claim that it was the usual custom or practice for him to do so, neither does he say that he was ever authorized to do so. Witness Hall testifies that he had frequent controversies with the cashier growing out of his unwarranted assumption of authority, and that he finally refused to serve as a director on account of it. We think the evidence is insufficient to prove the authority of the cashier to make loans of the bank's funds, as a rule or custom of the bank.

In Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet. 51, 8 L. ed. 316, it was held that it was not within the duty of the cashier and the president of the bank, and that they had no power to bind the bank by a contract with an indorser on a promissory note that he should not be liable upon his indorsement. In United States v. City Bank, 21 How. 356, 16 L. ed. 130, the question was whether or not Moodie, the cashier of the bank, who had addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury in which he stated that William Miner, one of the directors of the bank, and the bearer of the letter, was authorized to contract on behalf of the bank for the transfer of money from the East to the South or West for the government, had the authority thereby to bind his bank. In pursuance of this letter, Miner received a draft from the Secretary of the Treasury drawn upon the assistant treasurer at New York in favor of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans, for $100,000. Miner cashed the draft in person, but did not turn the money over to the assistant treasurer at New Orleans, nor did it appear that the City Bank of Columbus had received any of the funds. In the trial of the action against the City Bank of Columbus, the following charge was given to the jury, and was upheld by the Supreme Court, viz.: "That if they should find that the letter written by Moodie was his own act, and had been given without the knowledge or authority of the board of directors, or any of them individually, except Miner, and that the agency of Miner was not constituted by or known to the board of directors, or the directors individually, or any of them except Miner, but was the act of the cashier alone, and if they should find that Moodie had no power as cashier, except such as belonged to the office of cashier generally, or such as are given by the charter or by the by-law or other law or usage of the said bank, that the defendant was not concluded by that letter, and is not bound by the contract made by Miner, without some subsequent ratification of the same, though the Secretary had, in contracting with Miner, relied upon it as the act of the bank."

In our view this charge, or instruction, states correctly and comprehensively the principle applicable to the present case. It is true, as counsel for plaintiffs in error argues, that there is a presumption in favor of the regularity of the act done by the cashier, and that this presumption may be invoked by the party deceived by the cashier's conduct. But this is only a rebuttable presumption, which, in the present case, is overthrown by the proof which shows that he was acting without authority and that his unauthorized act was not subsequently ratified by the directors. If the indorsers have been deceived by trusting too much to the authority of the cashier, they may properly be said to have voluntarily taken the risk in relying upon the cashier's assumption of power, and they must suffer the consequences resulting from their failure to make further inquiry into his authority; if they had made inquiry of the board of directors at the time the notes were renewed and the contract of limited indorsement was entered into, they would have found that the cashier had not been authorized to accept their qualified indorsements in renewal of paper which they had previously indorsed unqualifiedly, and that he was likewise without authority to make new loans upon such qualified indorsements. The stockholders of the bank should not be made to suffer because of the unwarranted assumption of power on the part of the cashier.

Counsel for plaintiffs in error relies upon the following cases from this court: Smith v. Lawson, 18 W. Va. 212, 41 Am. Rep. 688; First Nat. Bank v. Kimberland, 16 W. Va. 555; Curry v. Hale, 15 W. Va. 867; Third Nat. Bank v. Laboringman's Mercantile & Mfg. Co. 56 W. Va. 446, 49 S. E. 544. These cases do not govern, because there is no evidence in the present case, as there was in those, that the act of the cashier was afterwards ratified by the board of directors, either expressly or by implication. To constitute an implied ratification, the person, or body, affected by it, must have had knowledge of the act to be ratified; and, as before stated, there is no proof in the present case that the directors, or any of them, except C. F. Lowther, who would be interested in withholding the information from the directors, had any knowledge of the contract.

A number of decisions from the courts of other states are likewise relied on; but we deem it unnecessary to review them in this opinion, for the reason that almost all of them are distinguishable in some material respect from the present case, and for the further reason that we regard the principles announced by this court in the cases of Lamb v. Cecil, 25 W. Va. 288, and Bank of Ravenswood v. Wetzel, 58 W. Va. 1, 70 L.R.A. 305, 50 S. E. 886, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 48, as determining this case. If the cashier had authority to accept a note in lieu of the bank's funds on such a qualified indorsement, we could see no reason why he would not also have authority to accept a note indorsed purely as matter of form, and under an agreement to release the indorser from all liability. The law confers no such power upon the cashier simply by virtue of his office. The stockholders of a bank intrust the lending of its money and the management of its affairs to a board of directors, and, if the bank's charter does not authorize the cashier to lend its funds, he can derive his authority to do so only from the board of directors, who must act collectively, and as a body, and who are not, individually, by virtue of their office, the several agents of the bank. 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 466; 1 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 124.

Finding, therefore, that the contract of limited indorsement set up by the special pleas does not bind the bank, it constitutes no valid defense to the plaintiff's action. Consequently, it becomes unnecessary for us to decide whether or not the series of notes executed by the Lowther-Kaufman Oil & Coal Company were taken in payment of the notes held by the bank against the Lowther Oil Company, or were simply renewals of those notes.

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, it was no error to refuse to permit witness Harne to answer the question whether or not F. W. Clark had refused to indorse notes of the Lowther Oil Company until after the contract before mentioned was signed.

It is also assigned as error that J. W. Kaufman, one of the indorsers, was proceeded against as a nonresident, upon order of publication, and judgment rendered against him jointly with the other indorsers. But this is error affecting Kaufman only; it is a matter of which he alone has any right to complain, and is in nowise prejudicial to plaintiffs in error.

It is also alleged as error that the record does not show that the jury were sworn to try the issues joined. The record shows that on October 15, 1907, issues were joined on the general plea of nonassumpsit and also on several special pleas; that the jury were selected on that day and were "charged and cautioned as the law directs," and were adjourned, and the trial of the cause likewise adjourned until the 28th of October, 1907; that on the latter date an order was made in the cause, which shows that the jury were "sworn, agreeable to their adjournment," on the 15th of October, 1907. We think this is sufficient to show that the jury were sworn to try the issues. The oath at this time could have been administered for no other purpose, inasmuch as the jury had been previously elected to try the case. It is not necessary that the record should state the form of oath administered. State v. Sutfin, 22 W. Va. 771; Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158, 31 Am. Rep. 757; State v. Ice, 34 W. Va. 244, 12 S. E. 695; State v. Kellison, 56 W. Va. 690, 47 S. E. 166. Furthermore, the record does not show that any objection was made, at the time, to the form of the oath, whatever the form was that was administered; and, if there was really any defect in the form of the oath, plaintiffs in error waived it by failing to object. State v. Ice, supra.

"The term 'issue' is collective, and in a case where there are several issues it is sufficient merely to swear the jury to try 'the issue.'" 24 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 371; 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

White v. Clay, 7 Leigh, 68; Mackey v. Fuqua, 3 Call (Va.) 19; Hatcher v. Fowler, 1 Bibb, 337; Bates v. Lewis, 1 J. J. Marsh. 316; Pointer v. Rust, 7 Humph. 532. It is too late to object to the form of oath after the verdict. Thomp. & M. Juries, § 286.

Finding no error in the record of which plaintiffs in error have any right to complain, the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WASHINGTON EX REL.
SEATTLE GENERAL CONTRACT COM-PANY et al.,

v.

SUPERIOR COURT FOR KING COUNTY
et al.

(56 Wash. 649, 106 Pac. 150.)

Appeal — order for inspection — writ of review.

1. An order for inspection of books and papers in possession of defendant may be reviewed on appeal from the final judgment which may be entered in the case, and therefore cannot be taken up under a writ of review, where the statute authorizes such writ only where no appeal is provided.

Discovery — private papers — statutory provision.

2. A statute empowering a court to order an inspection of papers, and to enforce the order by contempt proceedings, does not apply to papers which are of such a private nature as not to be receivable in evidence.

Appeal — contempt — discovery — certiorari.

3. If the court attempts to enforce an order to allow an inspection of papers, the one against whom it is entered may appeal from the order imposing the punishment; and therefore a writ of certiorari will not lie to review an order of inspection, where the statute authorizes such writ only where no appeal is allowed.

(January 12, 1910.)

Note. — Right to review of order granting or denying motion for inspection of books or papers, apart from an appeal from final judgment.

An order for the production of books and papers is regarded as a mere interlocutory order, and for that reason not a subject of separate appeal. Quinn v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 219 Pa. 24, 67 Atl. 949; Logan v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 132 Pa. 403, 19 Atl. 137; Harris v. Richardson, 92 Minn. 353, 100 N. W. 92; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Locke, 107 Ind. 9, 7 N. CERTIORARI to review an order of the Superior Court for King County, directing the inspection of certain documents in the possession of relators, who are parties to an action pending therein. Writ quashed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hughes, McMicken, Dovell, & Ramsey, Roberts, Battle, Hulbert, & Tennant, and Morris V. Sachs, for relators:

No order for inspection of books or papers should be made until the action is at issue.

New York State Bkg. Co. v. Van Antwerp, 23 Misc. 38, 51 N. Y. Supp. 653; Allen v. Fowler & W. Co. 45 App. Div. 506, 61 N. Y. Supp. 325; Diefendorf v. Fenn, 125 App. Div. 651, 110 N. Y. Supp. 68; Van Walters v. Children's Guardians, 132 Ind. 567, 18 L.R.A. 431, 32 N. E. 568; Kelly v. Mutual Life Ben. Asso. 1 Marv. (Del.) 183, 40 Atl. 954; Sheek v. Sain, 127 N. C. 266, 37 S. E. 334; Smithson v. Stanton, 7 D. C. 6; Palen v. Johnson, 18 Abb. Pr. 304; Thompson v. Erie R. Co. 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. 212; Com. ex rel. Keely v. Perkins, 124 Pa. 36, 2 L.R.A. 223, 16 Atl. 525; Victor G. Bloede Co. v. Joseph Bancroft & Sons Co. 98 Fed. 175; American Ore Machinery Co. v. Atlas Cement Co. 110 Fed. 53.

Trust & Sav. Bank v. Howard, 185 Ill. 332, 57 N. E. 39; Erwin v. Ottawa Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 271, 101 N. W. 537.

And in Phipps v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 130 Wis. 279, 110 N. W. 207, it was held that such an order was merely interlocutory, and not appealable, when made in a special statutory proceeding for the examination of witnesses, where the statute provided that in special proceedings only final orders affecting substantial rights were appealable.

The following cases, in which it was sought to have such an order reviewed on a separate appeal, are cases which were disposed of on the ground that the order was within the discretion of the court and was not reviewable; at least, unless it clearly appeared that the discretion was wrongfully exercised (Clyde v. Rogers, 87 N. Y. 625; White v. Munroe, 33 Barb. 650, 12 Abb. Pr. 357; Watt v. Watt, 2 Robt. 685; Hart v. Ogdensburg & L. C. R. Co. 69 Hun, 497, 23 N. Y. Supp. 713; Brown v. Georgi, 26 Misc. 128, 56 N. Y. Supp. 923; Palmer v. United Press, 67 App. Div. 64, 73 N. Y. Supp. 456; Allison v. Vaughan, 40 Iowa, 421; Sheldon v. Mickel, 40 Iowa, 19); or that the enforcement of the order would work irreparable injury (Horton v. Thornhill, 14 La. Ann. 139; Marks's Succession, 108 La. 494, 32 So. 401).

But in Ellinger v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 125 Wis. 643, 104 N. W. 811, and Noonan v. Orton, 28 Wis. 386, it was held that 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. George E. de Stelguier and Harold Preston, for respondents:

The materiality of the evidence may be made to appear by the pleadings.

Utah Constr. Co. v. Montana R. Co. 145 Fed. 981.

The application was not premature.

Mount, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relators by this proceeding seek to review an order of the lower court, directing an inspection of certain documents in the possession of the relators. It appears that C. D. Bussell and others brought an action in the lower court against E. W. Ross, commissioner of public lands for the state of Washington, and the relators herein, seeking an accounting for the cost of filling in certain tide lands by the relators, under a contract with the state, entered into pursuant to the act of March 9, 1893 (Laws 1893, chap. 99, p. 241), which tide lands were alleged to have been purchased by the said plaintiffs from the state subsequent to and subject to said contract, and also seeking a an order granting or refusing to require the production of books and papers was appealable under a statute making any order granting, refusing, continuing, or modifying a provisional remedy appealable.

And in Mehesy v. Kahn, 18 Jones & S. 209, the refusal of an order for the production of books was considered on appeal and affirmed, the court saying that such an order was within the discretion of the court, and should not be allowed for the purpose of enabling plaintiff to form his complaint, unless the necessity thereof was apparent.

In Lester v. Berkowitz, 125 Ill. 307, 17 N. E. 706; and Alexander v. United States, 201 U. S. 117, 50 L. ed. 686, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 356, the court said that while an order for the production of books or papers was not such a final order as might be reviewed on appeal or error, nevertheless, if the defendant refused to comply therewith, and was punished, appeal or error would lie from the judgment, and the propriety of the order would be considered.

But in Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Closser, 126 Ind. 348, 9 L.R.A. 754, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 387, 22 Am. St. Rep. 593, 26 N. E. 159, the court said that the party was not obliged to disregard the order for the production of books and papers, suffer for its disobedience, and then appeal, and that where it objected in due season, and reserved an exception, it could be heard on appeal, although it could not have appealed from the isolated order. R. L. S.

restraining order to prevent the commissioner of public lands from issuing certificates to the relators, which certificates become a lien upon such lands, for a greater amount than the actual cost of such fill. After the service and filing of the complaint in that action, the parties therein filed and served a motion for an inspection and leave to copy certain books and papers of the relators, under § 6047, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes (Pierce's Code, § 1011). At the hearing upon this motion, the defendants appeared and demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state a cause of action, and also objected to the granting of the motion, for the reason that the court was without jurisdiction to make the order, because the complaint failed to state a cause of action, and because no showing by affidavit was made as to the materiality of the books and papers, or that such books and papers contained evidence material to any issue, or upon the merits, and because the application was prematurely made before issues of fact were joined. The court denied these objections, and entered an order for an inspection of certain books and papers. Relators thereupon applied to this court for a writ of certiorari to review this order, and the writ was issued.

The respondents have moved to quash the writ upon the ground that the order is an interlocutory order, and may be reviewed upon appeal from any final judgment which may be entered in the cause. This motion must be granted. The statute authorizes the writ of review only where there is no appeal, and where there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 5741 (Pierce's Code, § 1396). This court has uniformly held that where there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal in the ordinary course, the writ of certiorari will not issue. State ex rel. Wilkeson Coal & Coke Co. v. Superior Ct. 49 Wash. 203, 94 Pac. 920; State ex rel. Smith v. Superior Ct. 47 Wash. 508, 92 Pac. 349; State ex rel. Weymouth v. Lockhart, 28 Wash. 460, 68 Pac. 894. The order made in this case was not a final order. It was simply an interlocutory order, made in the progress of the case. The statute under which the order was made provides: "Any court or judge thereof in which an action is pending may, upon notice, order either party to give to the other within a specified time an inspection and copy, or permission to take a copy, of any book, document, or paper in his possession or under his control, containing evidence relating to the merits of the action or defense therein. If compliance with the order be refused, the court may exclude the book, document, or paper from being given in evidence, or, if wanted as evidence by the party applying, may direct the jury to presume it to be such as he alleges it to be; and the court may also punish the party refusing, as for contempt." Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 6047. It is at once apparent that any order made under this statute for the production or inspection of books or papers in an action pending is an interlocutory order in such action. Harris v. Richardson, 92 Minn. 353, 100 N. W. 92. It is no more than a ruling upon an offer of evidence at the trial, and is no more final than any other ruling admitting or excluding evidence in a case. For that reason no appeal can be taken directly from such ruling, even if error is manifest therein. Such rulings are reviewed upon the final judgment, and not otherwise. The fact that an appeal will not lie directly from such order is not sufficient basis for a writ of review, because the party deeming himself aggrieved has an adequate remedy by appeal from the final judgment in the case. State ex rel. Wilkeson Coal & Coke Co. v. Superior Ct. supra. In this case we said: "The writ of review will not, however, be issued in all cases where the court has exceeded its jurisdiction. It will be issued only in cases where there is no appeal, or where, in the judgment of the court, there is not any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. The relator has the remedy of appeal, since the order attacked was one made in the course of the action, and may be reviewed on appeal from the final judgment." Any other rule would result in interminable delay and confusion in the trial of cases.

Counsel for relators argue, in substance, that these books and papers are private property of the relators, and an inspection thereof by the plaintiffs in that action will result in an invasion of the private rights, and possibly to the irreparable injury, of the relators. The statute, of course, does not contemplate that the parties to an action may have an inspection of books and papers which are not material, or which, on account of their confidential and privileged character, could not be received in evidence, and if an order were made for the inspection of such books or papers, a party would be safe in refusing to submit to such order; and if the court should attempt to enforce obedience by a fine or imprisonment for contempt, the judgment imposing a penalty would be a final order, which might be reviewed independently of the main case. Lester v. Berkowitz, 125 Ill. 307, 17 N. E. 706. But for books and papers, though private, which might properly be introduced in evidence in the case, the court clearly has a right to order an inspection thereof.

In the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Locke, 107 Ind. 9, 7 N. E. 579, the supreme court of Indiana, in discussing a case somewhat similar to this, said: "It is very ingeniously and ably argued that great hardship might often result from the error of a trial court in directing the production of a document, but there are many cases in which the erroneous ruling of the trial court on a question arising in the course of the proceeding may produce great hardship; yet this consideration supplies no reason for allowing an appeal. The truth is that in every case much must necessarily be left in the first instance to the sound judgment of the trial judge; and, although he may err, and thus cause serious injury to the party, still no appeal will lie until after the final judgment, for the case cannot be cut up into parts and tried by piecemeal. An error in compelling a party to give oral testimony may be as injurious as one made in directing the production of written instruments of evidence, but certainly in such a case there can be no appeal until after final judgment. So an error may be committed in compelling the disclosure of confidential communications, or in compelling a party to submit to a personal examination, and yet there can be no appeal from such a ruling. So, also, great hardship may arise from erroneously compelling a party to produce a letter, a receipt, a promissory note, a lease, or a deed; but the hardship of the case will not entitle the party to an appeal. On the other hand, to allow appeals from such rulings before final judgment would be a great hardship to the party rightfully demanding the production of the instrument. It would also be a great injustice to the public and a burden to the courts, for it would enable litigants to take many appeals in a single cause. It is safer to trust the trial judge than the interested parties. It is consistent with experience and in harmony with sound principle to trust to the judge rather than to the parties having important interests at stake, and often angered by controversy. It is far better to presume that the judge will not unjustly require the production of a written document, than to presume that a party will not abuse the right of appeal." This language was used in reference to the right of appeal in that case, but it is particularly applicable here, and clearly expresses our ideas upon the subject in hand. We are of the opinion, therefore, that certiorari will not lie to review the order complained of, because the relators have a remedy by appeal from the final judgment in the case, where any errors made by the trial court relating to the sufficiency of the complaint, or the showing for the order of inspection, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) or the admissibility of the books and papers as evidence, may be reviewed.

The motion to quash is therefore sustained.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

MAMIE H. CLARK et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
W. W. GRANT.

(— Okla. —, 109 Pac. 234.)

Limitation of action — payment on barred note — revival of mortgage as to subsequent lienor.

A mortgage given to secure a note is regarded as an incident thereto. Where such note and mortgage are once barred, payment of interest on the note revives not only the note, but the mortgage, so far as affects the interest of the payors, and continues it a valid and subsisting lien upon the mortgaged premises superior to the rights of subsequent judgment lienors.

(May 10, 1910.)

ERROR to the District Court for Pottawatomie County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certain promissory note and to foreclose a real-estate mortgage given to secure same. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. G. Cutlip and Frederick King, for plaintiffs in error:

Judgment lien holders can effectually interpose the plea of the statute of limitations to the mortgage lien against the plaintiff, the same as might have been done by the defendant Scott.

Brandenstein v. Johnson, 140 Cal. 29, 73 Pac. 744; Wood v. Goodfellow, 43 Cal. 185; De Voe v. Rundle, 33 Wash. 604, 74 Pac. 836; George v. Butler, 26 Wash. 456, 57 L.R.A. 396, 90 Am. St. Rep. 756, 67 Pac. 263; Hanna v. Kasson, 26 Wash. 568, 67 Pac. 271; Raymond v. Bales, 26 Wash. 493, 67 Pac. 269.

The property mortgaged standing as security for the debt, when the debt is barred,

Headnote by TURNER, J.

Note. — The question whether payment of acknowledgment by the mortgagor will toll the statute of limitations against his grantee, lienor, or other person holding an interest in the property through him, is discussed in a note to Kaiser v. Idleman, ante, 169.

the property mortgaged is released from the lien; and no act subsequent to the bar can renew the lien as against the judgment lienor.

Levy v. Williams, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 651, 49 S. W. 930, 50 S. W. 528; Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 483; Fowler v. Wood, 78 Hun, 304, 28 N. Y. Supp. 976; Richey v. Sinclair, 167 Ill. 184, 47 N. E. 364; Waterson v. Kirkwood, 17 Kan. 9.

The mortgage is a mere incident of the debt, or security for its payment, and when the right of recovery as to the debt is barred, the mortgage is barred also, and the lien is in repose.

Newhall v. Sherman, 124 Cal. 509, 57 Pac. 387; McGovney v. Gwillim, 16 Colo. App. 284, 65 Pac. 346; Hibernian Bkg. Asso. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 157 Ill. 524, 41 N. E. 919; *Lilly v. The mere payment of a part of a barred debt, without anything being said about the residue, will not renew the debt. It must be expressly so intended or the bar continues.

McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180, 95 Am. Dec. 170; Chadwick v. Cornish, 26 Minn. 28, 1 N. W. 55; Anderson v. Robertson, 24 Miss. 389; Crow v. Gleason, 141 N. Y. 489, 36 N. E. 497; Steel v. Matthews, 7 Yerg. 313; McKeen v. McDougall, 3 N. S. 403.

To take the barred debt out of the statute, the intent must be clear and the statement, promise, or acknowledgment unequivocal.

Chase v. Carney, 60 Ark. 491, 31 S. W. 43; Toothaker v. Boulder, 13 Colo. 219, 22 Pac. 468; Richardson v. Chanslor, 103 Ky. 425, 45 S. W. 774; Adams v. Olin, 140 N. Y. 150, 35 N. E. 448; Brown v. Latham, 58 N. H. 30, 42 Am. Rep. 568; Brisbin v. Farmer, 16 Minn. 215, Gil. 187.

When the debt is barred it may be revitalized by a part payment, and it will then be good and binding as against the debtor; but such part payment will not revitalize the mortgage lien even as against the debtor, unless the debtor does some act that will renew or extend the mortgage lien.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On April 22, 1907, W. W. Grant, defendant in error, sued Samuel J. Scott and Eva M. Scott in the district court of Pottawatomie county on a promissory note and to foreclose a mortgage on certain real estate in Tecumseh to secure the same, made, executed, and delivered to him by them on May 22, 1894. He alleged in his petition that Mamie H. Clark and W. W. Coleman, plaintiffs in error, and Marie L. King, claimed some interest in the mortgaged property inferior to his mortgage lien, and made them also parties defendant. All defendants defaulted except Clark and Coleman, who answered, pleaded the statutes of limitations, set up their respective liens, and sought to have them declared superior to that of plaintiff. At the close of the testimony defendants demurred to the evidence, which was overruled, and verdict and judgment rendered for plaintiff. Defendants bring the case here, and assign that the court erred in overruling their demurrer, because they say the evidence discloses plaintiff's debt was barred prior to the time their liens accrued. The note sued on is dated Tecumseh, Oklahoma territory, May 22, 1894, and thereby defendants S. J. Scott and Eva M. Scott "jointly and severally promise to pay to W. W. Grant, or order, $500 at Whit M. Grant's office, Oklahoma City, with interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent per annum, payable semiannually from date until paid," etc. Indorsed thereon is: "Nov. 22-94, Int. to date Pd. $30. Int. Pd. to May 22-95, $30. Int. Pd. to Nov. 22-95, $30. Int. Pd. May 22-96, $30. Int. Pd. Nov. 22-96, $30. Int. Pd. to May 22-97, $30. Dec. 1, 1903, paid acct. Int. $3.60. Dec. 21, 1905, paid acct. Int. $3.85." Plaintiff concedes that, had nothing intervened between the payment of interest evidenced by the credit on May 22, 1897, and the time of suit, the note would have been barred, but insists that the payment of $3.60 interest, as evidenced by the indorsement of December 1, 1903, raised the bar and revived the debt and with it his mortgage lien. He relies on the Statutes of Oklahoma 1903, § 4222, which reads: "In any case founded on contract, when any part of the principal or interest shall have been paid, or an acknowledgment of an existing liability, debt, or claim, or any promise to pay the same, shall have been made, an action may be brought in such case within the period prescribed for the same, after such payment, acknowledgment, or promise; but such acknowledgment or promise must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby." Construing this statute the Supreme Court of Kansas has repeatedly held 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such payment, after the bar has fallen, to revive a mortgage note and with it the lien of the mortgage. Topeka Capital Co. v. Merriam, 60 Kan. 397, 56 Pac. 757; 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1373. As the mortgage is a mere incident to the note, subsequent revivor thereof by part payment after it is barred revives not only the note, but also the mortgage, and that, too, as against judgment lienors, such as plaintiffs in error, whose liens did not attach to the mortgaged property until after said payment and consequent revivor. It is only such as have an interest in the mortgaged property acquired prior to the revivor whose rights thereby remain unaffected. Childs v. Thompson, 81 Mo. 337; Courtner v. Etheredge, 149 Ala. 78, 43 So. 368; Schmucker v. Sibert, 18 Kan. 104, 26 Am. Rep. 765; Hubbard v. Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co. 25 Kan. 172; Topeka Capital Co. v. Merriam, supra.

In Johnson v. Johnson, 81 Mo. 336, the court said: "When the bar of the statute is complete, any act of the mortgagor which revives the debt, also revives the lien of the mortgage, unless the parties agree otherwise. New York Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Covert, 29 Barb. 435. Schmucker v. Sibert, supra. Such acts are always binding between the mortgagor and mortgagee. 2 Jones, Mortg. 3d ed. § 1202. A well-defined limitation of this rule excepts from its effect the rights of purchasers and mortgagees acquiring title after the bar is complete, and before the acts of revivor."

In Schmucker v. Sibert, supra, the court in the syllabus said: "Where a note and mortgage are once barred, a subsequent revivor of the note by part payment, promise, or acknowledgment of the payor, will revive the mortgage so far as it affects the interest of the payor in the mortgaged premises. But such revivor of the note will not revive the mortgage as against a grantee of the mortgagor, or any other parties who have acquired interests in the mortgaged premises prior to the revivor of the note." Hubbard v. Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co. 25 Kan. 172, 175.

Hubbard v. Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co. supra, was an action on a promissory note and to foreclose a mortgage. The facts were that on October 1, 1869, John M. Price executed a note and mortgage to defendant in error for $1,500, due one year from date. He paid the interest thereon as the same became due up to April 1, 1872. On May 16, 1877, in a settlement with said company he received another credit thereon. The suit was against his grantees of the mortgaged property. They pleaded the statutes of limitations on the debt. There was judgment against them in the trial court, and on this point, in reversing the case, the supreme court said: "It will be seen that no payment was made on the $1,500 note and mortgage (the instruments sued on in this action) from April 1, 1872, until May 16, 1877. This was more than five years. The note and mortgage were therefore absolutely barred by the five-year statute of limitations when this last payment was made. Civil Code, § 18, subd. 1. This case will therefore come within the decision of this court made in the case of Schmucker v. Sibert, 18 Kan. 105, 110, 111, 26 Am. Rep. 765; that is, Price had a note, and to secure its payment executed a mortgage on certain real estate. He then conveyed the real estate to Hubbard. The note and mortgage became due, and several payments of interest were made thereon; but after that payment of the interest which was made on April 1, 1872, was made, more than five years elapsed before any other payment was made thereon. The note and mortgage, therefore, by this lapse of time without anything being done in the meantime to keep them alive, became absolutely barred by the five-year statute of limitations. Price then, by a payment thereon, and by an acknowledgment in writing of an existing liability thereon, revived the note and mortgage as against himself; but he did not and could not revive them as against Hubbard. As against Hubbard, they still remained barred." And in the syllabus said: "Where a note and mortgage have become barred by the statute of limitations, the payor thereof may revive the debt by part payment or otherwise, as against himself, but he cannot revive the note and mortgage as against a third person to whom he has sold and conveyed the mortgaged property." This is in line with the weight of authority.

In MacMillan v. Clements, 33 Ind. App. 120, 70 N. E. 997, the same kind of a suit, the same questions as here. There, as here, interest was paid on the note after the bar had fallen. The court said: "It is the law that a payment upon a note secured by mortgage is sufficient to take the note out of the operation of the statute of limitations, will have a like effect upon the mortgage, and, so long as any part of the debt remains unpaid, and not barred, the lien of the mortgage continues unimpaired. Bottles v. Miller, 112 Ind. 584, 14 N. E. 728; Hibernian Bkg. Asso. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 157 Ill. 524, 41 N. E. 919; Ewell v. Daggs, 108 U. S. 143, 27 L. ed. 682, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 408; Schifferstein v. Allison, 123 Ill. 662, 15 N. E. 275. By the averment of the complaint the payors of the note and mortgagors paid the interest on the note up to September 6, 1889. This revived the debt, and the statute of limitations would commence to run from that date, and, under 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) the authorities, neither the note nor the mortgage is barred by the statute of limitations." See also 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1304, and cases cited.

We are therefore of opinion that the credit of $3.60 interest indorsed on the note December 1, 1903, revived not only the note, but the mortgage, and from that time rendered it a valid and subsisting security superior to the rights of the subsequent judgment lienors, parties defendant herein, and that the trial court did not err in so holding.

We are not unmindful of Wood v. Goodfellow, 43 Cal. 185, and other cases relied upon by plaintiffs in error, where the contrary is held. As the Kansas courts in construing this statute refuse to follow that case, neither will this court. Of the doctrine there announced, in Schmucker v. Sibert, supra, Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, said: "We are aware of the fact that in some states a distinction is drawn between the note and mortgage, and that a foreclosure of the latter may be barred even when a recovery on the note is not. And this in states such as California, where the note is the principal thing, and the mortgage only a security for the note." In so holding he doubtless was mindful of the holding of the court in Waterson v. Kirkwood, 17 Kan. 9, where the court said: "The decision in the case of Wood v. Goodfellow, supra, states the law correctly for Kansas, then the action was barred. A majority of this court think that that decision is not good law in Kansas."

It is not necessary to notice other questions raised. The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except Williams, J., not participating.

v.

JOSEPH T. BANGHAM et al., Respts.

(156 Cal. 359, 104 Pac. 689.)

Option — mutuality — acceptance — enforcement.

1. Acceptance, within the time limited, of an option to purchase real estate, removes

Note. — Rights of third persons intervening between the taking and the exercise of the option for purchase of real property.

The only cases included in the note are those in which the intervening rights of third persons are such as can affect the the objection to the enforcement of the contract on the ground of want of mutuality.

Contract — performance — time.

2. One contracting for the conveyance of land upon demand must make the demand within a reasonable time, and is not privileged to postpone performance on his part indefinitely.

Option — consideration — acceptance — adequacy.

3. The inadequacy of the consideration for an option to purchase real estate cannot defeat the right to performance of the contract to convey after the option has been accepted, if the price to be paid for the land is adequate.

Same — acceptance — intervening contract — priority.

4. The acceptance, within the time specified, of an option which had been given for a nominal consideration to purchase real estate belonging to a husband, supersedes the wife's declaration of homestead upon the property made with notice of the option, after it had taken effect.

Record — unrecorded contract — priority.

5. An unrecorded contract for the purchase of real estate has no priority over a prior unrecorded option upon the same property, which will prevent specific performance of the option.

Judgment — specific performance — strangers — effect.

6. A decree specifically enforcing performance of a contract to sell real estate in accordance with an option which had been given thereon does not affect the rights of one claiming an intermediate contract for the land who was not made a party to the suit.

(October 8, 1909.)

holder of the option. Cases, therefore, where the exercise of the option can affect only the rights of third persons, without in any way interfering with the rights of the holder of the option, have been excluded; e. g., cases involving the respective rights of heirs and next of kin where option is exercised after death of the owner. (See note in 57 L.R.A. 651.)

As a general rule the holder of an option contract for the purchase of land, founded upon a valuable consideration, may, upon the refusal of the landlord to convey, either compel a specific performance of the contract or maintain an action for damages for the breach of the contract. And the rule is the same where the landowner has conveyed the property to third persons, with notice of the rights of the holder of the option.

Thus, in Meyer v. Markham, 90 Minn. 230, 96 N. W. 787, it was held that where the vendor in a contract for the sale of land subsequently conveyed the land to a third person, the holder of the option had two remedies; viz.: (1) to acquiesce in the conveyance and seek a performance of the contract of the third party; or (2) to treat the conveyance as a breach of the contract, and resort to an action against the vendor for damages. In that case, it was held that upon notice of the conveyance the holder of the option must act promptly, and either treat the grantee as the real party in interest and offer to perform the contract, or rely wholly upon his action against the grantor; that a failure to proceed under the contract promptly will be considered as an election to resort to the remedy against the grantor for a breach of the contract, and as an abandonment of all rights or claims to a specific performance of the contract against the grantee.

Specific performance, however, will not be decreed against third persons who become purchasers for value, of property, in ignorance of the option. Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. 220.

But all purchasers having knowledge of the option will take subject to it, and specific performance may be decreed against them. Ibid.; Ross v. Parks, 93 Ala. 153, 11 L.R.A. 148, 30 Am. St. Rep. 47, 8 So. 368; Faraday Coal & Coke Co. v. Owens, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 243, 80 S. W. 1171; Whited & Wheless v. Calhoun, 122 La. 100, 47 So. 415; Haughwout v. Murphy, 22 N. J. Eq. 531; Laughead v. Beale, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. 465; Jackson ex dem. Livingston v. Groat, 7 Cow. 285. And see Boyd v. Vanderkemp, 1 Barb. Ch. 273; Whitehorn v. Cranz, 20 Neb. 392, 30 N. W. 406.

But an option to purchase lands, unsupported by a valuable consideration, is not such an interest therein which a purchaser for value is bound to notice, or which equity will regard, and the want of mutuality may be urged as a bar to its specific enforcement. Peacock v. Deweese, 73 Ga. 570; Graybill v. Burgh, 89 Va. 895, 21 L.R.A. 133, 37 Am. St. Rep. 894, 17 S. E. 558. In the latter case the vendor gave the plaintiff an option in writing and under seal, for the purchase of the land, for the nominal consideration of $1, but in fact the dollar was never paid, and it was held competent to show such fact.

A tenant who exercises an option to purchase, contained in the lease, may enforce specific performance of the contract against one who purchased the property with notice of the lease and contract to sell, and compel a conveyance of the property. Lazarus v. Heilman, 11 Abb. N. C. 93. This case was an action against the tenant for waste, and the defendant was permitted to set up as a counterclaim the agreement to sell contained in the lease, and demand specific performance of the contract against the plaintiff and grantee of the defendant's lessor.

A lessee with an option to purchase, al-

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in his favor for less than the relief demanded in an action brought to compel specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of certain real estate, and to recover damages for breach thereof. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Tanner, Taft, & Odell and John E. Daly, for appellant:

The wife, having no interest in the separate estate of her husband, and having actual knowledge and notice of the contract of sale entered into between her husband and plaintiff, could not impose a valid homestead upon the premises, which would operate to defeat plaintiff's contract.

though the election to purchase rests solely with him, has an equitable estate in the land under his contract of optional purchase, which may be conveyed and enforced by his grantee against a subsequent purchaser from the lessor. Kerr v. Day, 14 Pa. 112, 53 Atl. 526. To the same effect is Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. Jr. 253.

And possession of the tenant is constructive notice to one dealing with the landlord, of the interest of the tenant, such as the option to purchase within a given period. Ibid.

And so, where a lease gives the lessee therein an option to purchase the leased premises, and the lessee accepts the offer and performs the conditions, his possession becomes that of owner, and such possession gives notice of his rights as the owner to a subsequent mortgagee of the vendor or lessor, and such mortgagee would be charged with notice of the vendee's rights, and his mortgage is subject thereto. Smith v. Gibson, 25 Neb. 511, 41 N. W. 360.

It is the duty of a purchaser of real estate to investigate the title of his vendor, and he cannot be said to exercise due diligence in this regard if he accepts the statement of his vendor as to the binding effect of an outstanding agreement of sale with another, and makes no attempt to ascertain for himself what the agreement contains. Ohio River Junction R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 222 Pa. 573, 72 Atl. 271.

In Manchester Ship Canal Co. v. Manchester Racecourse Co. [1901] 2 Ch. 37, it was held that where a landowner stipulated that he would give the plaintiff the first refusal of his land, he was not free to dispose of the land to an independent purchaser without informing the holder of the option of the proposed sale, and offering the land to him at such price as the intending purchaser was bona fide willing to give; and that upon failure to make such offer the holder of the option would be entitled to restrain the contemplated breach of the agreement.

Devault*, 3 Iowa, 345, 66 Am. Dec. 92.

The mutuality of a contract is to be considered as to the value promised to be paid for the land, and not as to the consideration paid for the option, and in such case the court will decree a performance.

of time limited, that he could not raise the money, and unless an extension of time was granted the option would be abandoned, he was estopped from enforcing specific performance of the contract where the landowner refused to grant the extension, made valuable improvements on the land, and leased the same in reliance on such abandonment. Hopwood v. McCausland, 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469.

The death of the giver of an option to purchase real estate founded upon a valuable consideration does not impair the right of the holder to make his election within the time specified, and enforce performance of the contract against the heirs and representatives of the giver. Mueller v. Northmann, 116 Wis. 468, 96 Am. St. Rep. 997, 93 N. W. 538.

A wife of one who, pending negotiations for the purchase of certain lands, gave an option to a third person for the purchase thereof, is not bound, where she was not a party to the transaction, and protested against it from the time it first came to her knowledge. Graybill v. Brugh, supra.

Until the exercise of the option, the property is subject to levy on execution against the owner and giver of the option. Ex parte Hardy, 30 Beav. 206.

And an equitable conversion effected by an election to exercise an option to buy real estate will not relate back to the date of the contract, so as to dissolve the attachment levied on the land as that of the grantor prior to the election and while the grantor retains his ownership. Sheehy v. Scott, 128 Iowa, 551, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 365, 104 N. W. 1139.

But in Donnally v. Parker, 5 W. Va. 301, it was held that a contract granting an option to purchase, when duly recorded, was sufficient to put creditors of the grantor on inquiry; and that they were bound to inquire whether the election had been made; and, upon giving notice of his election to purchase, the holder of the option had an equitable interest in the land which related back to the date of the contract.

A lack of mutuality is absolutely fatal to specific performance.

6 Pom. Eq. Jur. 773, 814.

Sloss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll alone from a judgment in his favor for $1. The action was based upon an alleged contract for the purchase of real estate, and the complaint contained two counts,—one averring facts upon which plaintiff asserted his right to a specific performance of the contract, and the other seeking damages for its breach.

The court found that on December 26, 1905, the plaintiff and the defendant Joseph T. Bangham entered into a written contract, whereby Bangham, in consideration of the sum of $1, granted to plaintiff, or his assigns, "the right and privilege of exercising an option to purchase" the property in dispute "for the sum and purchase price of $17,000, . . . provided that the said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, shall exercise said option to purchase on or before February 26, 1906, by notifying me in writing of such exercise of option. Upon such notification within such time, I agree, on demand, to grant, sell, and convey said real estate to said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, on the above terms, and agree to furnish and deliver within ten days after such notification, to said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, an unlimited certificate of title to said real estate . . . showing good marketable title of record to said real estate to be in me, free and clear of all encumbrances, and allowing the said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, a reasonable time after said delivery to examine said certificate of title. Said notification, and the furnishing of said certificate of title within said reasonable time showing title as aforesaid, shall bind the said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, to purchase said real estate on said terms." The property referred to in the above instrument was the separate property of the defendant Joseph T. Bangham. On February 26, 1906, the plaintiff elected to exercise the option provided for, and to purchase the land in accordance with the terms and conditions named in the writing, and notified Bangham of his election. Bangham refused, and ever since has refused and neglected, to make, execute, and deliver a deed, or to furnish the certificate of title as provided in said contract.

The court finds that, in response to plaintiff's notification of his election to purchase, Bangham informed the plaintiff that he was unable to give title to the land, for the reason that his wife (the defendant Rowena Bangham) held a homestead on the property, and "positively refuses to release it." It is found that the consideration to be paid for the said land was adequate, just, and reasonable, and that "the price for the land at the time when plaintiff notified defendant Joseph T. Bangham that he elected to buy was a fair and adequate price for said land." It is further found that the contract was unjust and unreasonable in this, "that the only consideration paid therefor was the sum of $1," and that said sum of $1 was grossly inadequate and unjust for said option; that the said contract is also unfair and unjust in this, that plaintiff was thereby enabled to postpone indefinitely performance on his part. It is found that the defendant Rowena Bangham, the wife of Joseph T., had actual notice and knowledge of the entering into said contract by her husband, and that she did, after the date of said contract, make and file a separate declaration of homestead on said premises; that said declaration was made by her without the knowledge or connivance of her husband. The contract referred to in the complaint has never been recorded. It is further found that the defendant Joseph T. Bangham did not act in bad faith in his failure to perform the contract; that the land had increased in value to the amount of $5,000, as alleged in the complaint, but that plaintiff had not been damaged in any sum other than the sum of $1 on account of such failure. As conclusions of law the court found, with respect to the first count, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and that the declaration of homestead filed by defendant Rowena Bangham is valid, and is not subject and inferior to the contract relied on. On the second count the conclusion of law was that plaintiff was entitled to recover of defendant Joseph T. Bangham the sum of $1 and interest thereon from the 26th day of December, 1905.

On these findings the plaintiff contends that he was entitled to a decree specifically enforcing the contract, and that if, for any reason, such contract should not be enforced, he should recover a judgment for $5,000, the increase in the value of the land.

The agreement signed by the parties on December 26, 1905, was a unilateral agreement, of the kind usually known as an option. By its terms Smith was under no obligation to purchase the land or to pay for it. He was granted the right or privilege of purchasing upon certain terms, within a given time. Until he should have exercised this option he was in no way bound by the agreement. His election to accept and exercise the option within the time limited was, however, sufficient to bind him and to remove any objection to the enforcement of the contract on the ground of want of mutuality. Hall v. Center, 40 Cal. 63; Ballard v. Carr, 48 Cal. 74; Calanchini v. Branstetter, 84 Cal. 249, 24 Pac. 149; Thurber v. Meves, 119 Cal. 35, 50 Pac. 1063, 51 Pac. 536; Sayward v. Houghton, 119 Cal. 545, 51 Pac. 853, 52 Pac. 44; House v. Jackson, 24 Or. 89, 32 Pac. 1027. The option had at least the force of an offer to sell, and the acceptance of this offer before it has expired or had been revoked constituted a valid and binding contract, from which neither party could recede. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 601; Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458; Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249.

We think the finding of the court that the contract is unfair in that plaintiff was thereby enabled to postpone indefinitely performance on his part is based upon an erroneous construction of the terms of the agreement. The contract reads that upon notification of acceptance Bangham agrees "on demand, to grant, sell, and convey said real estate to said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, on the above terms." It is argued that since the obligation is only to convey upon demand by Smith, the latter may indefinitely postpone the making of his demand, and thereby compel the defendant to be ready to convey to him at all times, without making himself liable for the purchase price. But the contract, reasonably interpreted, does not give him any such right of indefinite postponement. It is provided in the agreement that the notification of acceptance, and the furnishing of a certificate of title, shall bind him to purchase the real estate "on the above terms." If, under the agreement, the exact time of conveyance and payment were to be fixed by the purchaser's demand, there can be no question that such demand would have to be made by him within a reasonable time. What would be a reasonable time is a question of fact, to be determined upon all of the circumstances of the case. So construed, the provision is in no wise inequitable or unfair.

It is found by the court that the consideration agreed to be paid for the land—i. e., the sum of $17,000—was fair and adequate. The plaintiff having bound himself by the acceptance of the option to pay this sum, we think the question whether or not $1 was an adequate consideration for the option is a false quantity. The plaintiff is not seeking in this action to enforce the option, but to compel compliance with the contract, which resulted from his exercise of the option. That contract was one whereby Bangham bound himself to sell the land, and Smith agreed to buy it, for the sum of $17,000. This is found by the court to be an adequate and fair consideration for the conveyance, and on an action by the vendee for specific performance of such contract the adequacy of the price paid for the option is not a material consideration. In Guyer v. Warren, 175 Ill. 328, 51 N. E. 580, the court said: "The consideration named in the written agreement is $1. As the parties agree to sell an option to buy for the sum of $1, there is no reason why such an express consideration is not an adequate one." See also Ross v. Parks, 93 Ala. 153, 11 L.R.A. 148, 30 Am. St. Rep. 47, 8 So. 368. Inadequacy of consideration alone (without fraud, or something in the nature of fraud) is never considered, even in equity, except as bearing upon the right to specifically enforce an executory agreement. It affords no ground for setting aside an executed sale. Here there had been such executed sale of the option, which passed by the writing of December 26, 1905, and the payment of the agreed consideration.

The real question, then, is whether the fact that the vendor's wife declared a homestead upon the property is a sufficient answer to plaintiff's demand for a conveyance. Specific performance will not be decreed against a vendor who is unable, for want of title, to comply with his contract. Bell v. Bank of California, 153 Cal. 234, 239, 94 Pac. 889, and cases cited. If the homestead was valid as against a prior agreement to sell, the refusal of the wife to join in a conveyance fully justified the judgment denying specific relief. It may be remarked that neither the pleadings nor the findings disclose the time when the homestead was declared. It is found to have been after the execution of the contract (of option), but whether before or after plaintiff had notified Bangham of his election to purchase is not shown. We think, however, that the rights of the parties would be the same in either event. It has been said that an option to purchase land does not, before acceptance, vest in the holder of the option an interest in the land. Richardson v. Hardwick, 106 U. S. 252, 27 L. ed. 145, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 213; Gustin v. Union School Dist. 94 Mich. 502, 34 Am. St. Rep. 361, 54 N. W. 156; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Kerr, 66 L.R.A. 569, 64 C. C. A. 251, 129 Fed. 723. On the other hand, there are cases holding that the grant, on a valuable consideration, of an option to purchase, constitutes the grantee the equitable owner of an interest in the property. House v. Jackson, supra; Kerr v. Day, 14 Pa. 112, 53 Am. Dec. 526; Telford v. Frost, 76 Wis. 172, 44 N. W. 835; Wall v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 86 Wis. 48, 56 N. W. 367. At any rate the option vests in the grantee the right or privilege of acquiring an interest in the land, and, when accepted, entitles him to call for specific performance. Hawralty v. Warren, 18 N. J. Eq. 124, 90 Am. Dec. 613; Kerr v. Day, supra; People's Street R. Co. v. Spencer, 156 Pa. 85, 36 Am. St. Rep. 22, 27 Atl. 113; Guyer v. Warren, 175 Ill. 328, 51 N. E. 580. Such right, when exercised, must necessarily relate back to the time of giving the option (People's Street R. Co. v. Spencer, supra), so as to cut off intervening rights acquired with knowledge of the existence of the option. A subsequent purchaser with notice of a valid and irrevocable option would certainly take subject to the right of the option holder to complete his purchase (Bartlett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. 220; Sizer v. Clark, 116 Wis. 534, 93 N. W. 539; Kerr v. Day, supra), and we see no reason why the declarant of a homestead should stand in any better position.

A declaration of homestead creates no new or additional title. It attaches certain privileges and immunities to such title as may at the time be held. If the husband, for example, owns a title subject to an outstanding equity, a declaration of homestead by the wife, at least where she has knowledge of this equity, does not destroy it. Her homestead claim is impressed upon the title that her husband had; i. e., the title subject to such rights against it as were known to her to be held by third parties. These conclusions seem to follow from the former adjudications of this court. In Gilbert v. Sleeper, 71 Cal. 290, 12 Pac. 172, the plaintiff's husband had entered into an agreement with the defendant Sleeper to exchange two tracts of land, and each entered into possession of the tract which he was to receive. Subsequently Gilbert conveyed to his wife all of his property, including the land which he had agreed to convey to Sleeper, and plaintiff filed a homestead upon all the land so conveyed to her. It was held that plaintiff's rights in the tract agreed to be conveyed to Sleeper were subject to the rights created by the agreement. "There was no error," says the court, "in refusing to admit in evidence plaintiff's declaration of homestead. Obviously she could not, by filing it, defeat or impair the previously existing rights of defendant." In Snodgrass v. Parks, 79 Cal. 55, 21 Pac. 429, action was brought to quiet title to land which one of the plaintiffs had agreed to convey to some of the defendants; such defendants having wholly failed to pay the purchase money, or to comply with any of the conditions of their contract. The defendants relied upon a declaration of homestead filed by one of them upon the land while in possession under this contract. This was held to constitute no defense to the action. The court said: "It is further urged that because a homestead was declared upon the property by Mrs. Dunlap, the action cannot be maintained. This cannot be so. Conceding, as claimed by the appellants, that a homestead may be declared upon land held under a mere contract to convey, such declaration did not give any new title, or tend in any way to strengthen or enlarge the one then existing. Therefore, when the equitable title created by the contract, and possession under it, was lost in the manner stated, the homestead fell with it. It would be a marvelous doctrine that the filing of a declaration of homestead could create a new title, or render a bad title good." In Hayford v. Kocher, 65 Cal. 389, 4 Pac. 350, certain premises were by mistake excluded from a conveyance of lands. The wife of the grantor, with knowledge of the mistake, filed a declaration of homestead upon the lands so omitted. This was held not to affect the pre-existing right of the grantee to have the conveyance reformed, so as to carry title to such premises.

The fundamental basis upon which all these decisions must rest is the proposition that (except where the contrary is expressly declared by statute) a declaration of homestead is subject to all rights in the property known by the person filing the declaration to exist. And this principle, applied to the facts of the present case, requires the holding that the declaration of homestead, made by Mrs. Bangham with knowledge of the contract theretofore entered into with the plaintiff, was subject to his right to demand a conveyance of the land in accordance with his contract.

The authorities principally relied on by the respondent (Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 477, 14 Pac. 198; Ontario State Bank v. Gerry, 91 Cal. 94, 27 Pac. 531; Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 364, 51 Pac. 549, 955) are not in point. These cases hold that a declaration of homestead by the wife is good as against a prior unrecorded mortgage executed by the husband, although the wife had knowledge of the existence of the mortgage. But this conclusion is based upon the express provisions of §§ 1240, 1241, of the Civil Code, which provide that the homestead is exempt from execution or forced sale except " . . . (3) on debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and acknowledged by husband and wife, or by an unmarried claimant; (4) on debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record." Here is an express statutory declaration that certain mortgages only shall be superior to the rights created by a declaration of homestead. As the mortgages in the cases cited did not come within the terms of the statute, they necessarily were inferior to the homestead. Here, however, we have no question of an attempt to subject the land to execution or forced sale from which it is specifically exempted. The question is merely whether antecedent rights in the property shall be cut off by a declaration of homestead, or, otherwise stated, whether such declaration shall enlarge the title owned at the time of its filing. For the reasons stated, we think this question must be answered in the negative.

On the facts as hereinbefore stated the plaintiff was entitled to a decree specifically enforcing the contract of conveyance made by the defendant Bangham. But the record discloses further facts bearing on the appropriateness of this remedy. It is found that the American Avenue Building Company, a corporation, claims and has an interest in the said premises, "by virtue of a written agreement to convey by defendant Joseph T. Bangham, made in good faith and for value." If this interest is superior to that of plaintiff, it would make it impossible for Bangham to comply with his contract to convey a good marketable title free and clear of encumbrances. But the court does not find the interest of the Building Company to be superior to that of plaintiff, nor does it find facts from which the respective priorities may be determined. A purchase for value, without notice of plaintiff's unrecorded contract, would not, under our statute, protect the subsequent purchaser, unless his conveyance was "first duly recorded." Civil Code § 1214. For all that appears, the Building Company's contract was never recorded. The facts as found do not, therefore, offer any impediment to a decree of specific performance. But the American Avenue Building Company is not a party to this action, and obviously its rights cannot be affected by any decree that might be rendered herein. A reversal of the judgment, with directions to the court below to enter a decree of specific performance, might result in plaintiff's obtaining a conveyance which would be valueless to him. Unless the plaintiff is willing to take and pay for Bangham's title, without regard to the validity of the Building Company's claim, the question whether an effective decree for specific relief can be made should be determined in an action in which every party having an interest in the property is represented. To this end a new trial should be ordered. If, upon such new trial it should appear that specific performance cannot be decreed, the question of plaintiff's right to damages, as prayed by the second count of the complaint, will arise. The measure of damages in such cases is clearly defined by § 3306 of the Civil Code. The difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate may be recovered only where there has been bad faith on the part of the vendor. Here the court came to the conclusion that the defendant Bangham did not act in bad faith. On this appeal on the judgment roll we cannot therefore direct the allowance of damages for any greater sum than that recovered. But the question of good or bad faith should be considered anew by the trial court in the light of our views on the main question discussed in this opinion. Accordingly the issue of damages, as well as the issues arising on the prayer for specific performance, should be retried.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. The plaintiff should have leave to amend his complaint, and to bring in new parties, if so advised.

Shaw, Angellotti, and Henshaw, JJ., concur:

Beatty, Ch. J., dissenting:

I dissent. A dollar is not an adequate consideration for such an option as is here held to defeat the right of Mrs. Bangham to declare a homestead upon property occupied as such.. It was a merely nominal consideration, and, as against a right so highly and so deservedly favored as the right of homestead, it should be disregarded by a court of equity.

Melvin, J., dissenting:

I dissent. It does not appear from the record whether or not the declaration of homestead was made prior to the 26th day of February, 1906,—the date upon which appellant notified respondent that he elected to buy the property,—but, under the rule favoring a construction in support of the regularity of a judgment, we may assume that Mrs. Bangham had filed her declaration of homestead before appellant signified his willingness to pay $17,000 for the property. If, therefore, she could not make a valid declaration of homestead, the only thing which prevented her from doing so was the option for which plaintiff had paid the price of $1. In other words, to find that the declaration of homestead was ineffective, we must hold that the option which the purchaser might ignore and surrender, without the loss of more than the trifling sum of $1, was sufficient to deprive this woman of a right given her by the law under the Constitution of California. Art. 17, § 1. It may be that after the acceptance of all the terms of a sale contemplated under the provisions of a contract of this kind, and the offer of an adequate price, the wife of the owner of the property, if she knew all of the facts, would be powerless to declare a valid homestead upon it; but we are not here confronted by such a state of facts. Suppose that, instead of sixty days, a period of ten years had been named as the time within which the option of purchase might be exercised. Might a husband, by the simple device of giving such an option, deprive his wife for a term of years of the right of securing a homestead given her by statutes passed under the solemn mandate of the Constitution? Such a result, it seems to me, was never contemplated.

In the opinion of the majority of the court, great reliance is placed upon the authority of People's Street R. Co. v. Spencer, 156 Pa. 89, 36 Am. St. Rep. 22, 27 Atl. 113, to the effect that when an option to purchase is exercised, the right to buy the property relates back to the date of the original contract, so as to cut off intervening rights acquired by those having knowledge of the option. That was a case not involving any interpretation of the law relating to homesteads. The facts there considered showed that there had been a conveyance of property as security for a loan, but that the grantor took a lease for a nominal sum and an exclusive option of repurchase for the amount of the loan and interest. The court treated the transaction as one in which the railroad company never surrendered its equitable estate, and held that, upon the repayment of the loan, with interest, the company's title became effective as of the date of the option. It was held that upon payment of the loan and interest the railroad company became the owner of the land as it was at the date of the original agreement, "or of the insurance money, which stood pro tanto in its place." The case is so dissimilar to the one at bar that I cannot see its appositeness.

Section 1238 of the Civil Code gave Mrs. Bangham the right to declare a homestead upon her husband's property. This, I submit, existed independently of any adverse equitable title, which she was not, by statute, compelled to recognize as paramount to it. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine expressed in the main opinion, that "the fundamental basis upon which all these decisions must rest is the proposition that (except where the contrary is expressly declared by statute) a declaration of homestead is subject to all rights in the property known by the person filing the declaration to exist." The Code does not declare the instances in which a homestead is not subject to execution and forced sale, but does enumerate the four kinds of judgments which are superior to it. Civil Code, § 1241. All other kinds of judgments not enumerated are ineffective because not specified in the statute, and the inference is inevitable that, without the barrier of the statute, no unexecuted judgment could avail against a homestead. By parity of reasoning we should deduce the rule that the homestead must prevail against all liens not by statute made superior to it.

Mr. Justice McFarland, in Ontario State Bank v. Gerry, 91 Cal. 97, 27 Pac. 531, 532, said: "But the doctrine that unrecorded deeds and mortgages are good except as against subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration does not apply to homesteads. Rights to homesteads are defined by the provisions of the Code which directly deal with that subject. 'The doctrine bearing upon conveyances made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors has no application to the creation of a homestead.' And a declaration of a homestead is not a 'conveyance' as that word is used generally in the Code." And again, in the same opinion, he says: "There is no question here about the morality of the transaction. It is simply a matter of statutory provision." In the case of Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 374, 51 Pac. 553, 955, the homestead defeated the lien of an unrecorded mortgage, of which the wife, who declared the homestead, had actual notice, and this significant language is used in the opinion: "I have not overlooked the equitable considerations so persuasive in this case, and so ably presented by counsel for respondent, but they all proceed from the assumption that the case is one for the application of general principles of equitable cognizance, whereas it is hedged in and controlled entirely by legislative enactment." In Warner v. Warner, 144 Cal. 615, 78 Pac. 24, a homestead on the husband's separate property was held good as against an antenuptial agreement, wherein the wife had promised not to claim her husband's property "either as heir or otherwise." In Simonson v. Burr, 121 Cal. 582, 54 Pac. 87, it was decided that the question of fraud of creditors cannot be raised as against a homestead which one of the spouses had the right to declare.

Following the rule that a contract is to be construed most strongly against the person seeking to sustain it, I am still of the opinion that the contract in the case at bar was properly held to be unfair, because under its terms plaintiff would be enabled to postpone indefinitely performance on his part; and I wish to repeat the language used as follows in the opinion heretofore rendered in Department 2: "While the contract provides that the option must be exercised by written notification prior to February 26, 1906, it also contains this language: 'Upon such notification within such time I agree, on demand, to grant, sell, and convey said real estate to said W. Scott Smith,' etc. The contract further provides that Bangham shall, within ten days after notification, furnish a certificate of title, that thereafter Smith or his assigns shall have 'reasonable time' to examine said certificate, and that 'said notification, and the furnishing of said certificate of title within said reasonable time, showing title as aforesaid, shall bind the said W. Scott Smith or his assigns to purchase said real estate on said terms.' Conveyance by Bangham 'on demand' being one of said 'terms,' the option might, if enforced, result in giving plaintiff the power to hold the land indefinitely, subject to his privilege of purchase, and without the expenditure of a dollar, by the simple expedient of omitting to demand from Bangham a conveyance of the title. The lower court properly declined to enforce the specific performance of a contract so inequitable and one in which the consideration was so inadequate. Civil Code, § 3391, subdiv. 1. It follows also that such a contract, being of but little more dignity than a nudum pactum, would be no obstacle to the declaration of a homestead by Mrs. Bangham on her husband's property. As the court found appellant suffered no detriment other than the payment of $1 for the option, judgment in his favor for that sum on the second count was proper. Civil Code, § 3306."

I am of the opinion that the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed.

Lorligan, J., dissenting:

I concur in the foregoing dissenting opinion.

28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF LAKE PROVIDENCE, Appt.,

v.

LOUIS REINMAN.

Note — blank indorsement — parol explanation.

1. As between a bank holding a note and its immediate indorser in blank, parol evidence is admissible to show that he indorsed as its agent to transfer title to the note, including the fact that he sold certain property to the bank to be sold to the maker, and that the note was taken in his name and indorsed to the bank merely for its accommodation in the transaction.

Appeal — transfer to chancery — error.

2. It is reversible error to transfer to the chancery court against the objection of the plaintiff an action properly triable at law.

(February 7, 1910.)

Note. — Admissibility of parol evidence, as between indorser and indorsee, that unrestricted indorsement was made merely to transfer title to the owner.

An exception to the parol evidence rule is recognized where it is sought to introduce parol evidence in order to show, as between indorser and indorsee, that the indorsement was made merely to transfer the title to the owner of the instrument. This exception is based on the well-recognized exception that such evidence may be given to show want or failure of consideration.

Thus, in Farmers' Sav. Bank v. Hansmann, 114 Iowa, 49, 86 N. W. 31, it was held that an indorser might show that the note in suit was made payable to him through mistake, and that he indorsed it without consideration merely to transfer title to the owner. The court said: "It is a general rule that an indorsement is a contract, and that, like every other contract, it requires consideration; and it is held that 'between immediate parties the want of consideration invalidates it.' 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, 2d ed. § 691. If the defendant's contention is true, his indorsement was without consideration, and made for the express purpose of transferring a note which had been drawn payable to his order without his knowledge or consent, to its owner. We have held that parol evidence is competent to show the real nature of the transaction, where an indorsement in blank has been made. . . . The defendant herein cannot be in any worse situation than an indorser in blank, and we think he was clearly entitled to show want of consideration for his indorsement."

So, in Allin v. Williams, 97 Cal. 403, 32 Pac. 441, it was held that an indorser of a note might show, as between himself and his immediate indorsee, that the indorsement

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Pulaski Chancery Court dismissing an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certain promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James A. Comer for appellant.

Mr. Baldy Vinson, for appellee:

Parol evidence is not admissible to show that the indorsement of notes to an individual not designated as the cashier of a bank was such a transfer as to vest the legal title in the bank and preclude a defense which would be good against payee. A bank which takes without indorsement from its cashier negotiable papers indorsed to him without designation of his fiscal position holds it subject to all equities existing in favor of the maker.

First Nat. Bank v. McCullough, 5 Or. 508, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1105, 126 Am. St. Rep. 758, 93 Pac. 366.

When an instrument is made payable to order, the indorsement of the payee is necessary to transfer the legal title, and the transferee without indorsement takes it as a mere chose in action, and must aver and approve the consideration, and he takes it subject to all equities that attach to it in the hands of his transferrer.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 644-741; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 788.

Frauenthal, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit instituted originally in the Pulaski circuit court by the First National Bank of Lake Providence, Louisiana, the plaintiff below, against Louis Reinman, to recover against him as the indorser of a certain note. The note sued on was executed by B. F. Brown at Lake Providence, Louisiana, on March 15, 1905, for $600, and was payable to the order of Louis Reinman on or before November 15, 1905; and it is stated in the note that it was given for four mules, which should remain the property of the payee until paid for. Upon the note were the following indorsements: "C. S. Wyley (Indorser)." "Louis Reinman."

was made merely to transfer the note from a nominal holder to the true owner.

And where one acting as agent for another with the latter's consent took a note in his own name in payment for lumber sold for the principal, and indorsed it to the principal, and was subsequently compelled to pay an innocent holder of the note because of the indorsement, he was held entitled to show these facts, since the indorsement was made solely for the principal's benefit to transfer his own property to him. Abraham v. Mitchell, 112 Pa. 230, 56 Am. Rep. 312, 3 Atl. 830.

And it was held in Lewis v. Brehme, 33 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In this complaint the plaintiff alleged that the note was transferred and indorsed to it before maturity in the usual course of business, and that due demand for payment, and protest thereof for, and notice of, nonpayment, had been made. The defendant denied that the note had been transferred and indorsed to plaintiff in the usual course of business, and denied that it had been duly protested, or that notice of nonpayment had been given to him. He alleged in substance and effect that he was the owner of the four mules set out in the note, and that said Brown desired to purchase them; but, not knowing his financial responsibility, he declined to sell to him. He mentioned the proposed purchase of the mules to one R. J. Walker, who was the cashier and business manager of the plaintiff, and it was agreed between him and said cashier of said plaintiff that defendant would sell the mules to the plaintiff or said cashier, for $450, and that a note for $600 should be gotten from said Brown and indorsed by said C. S. Wyley; that the note should be made payable to defendant, and that he should then transfer the note to plaintiff; that, as a matter of fact, he actually sold the mules to the plaintiff, or to Walker as its cashier, for $450, and, only to accommodate the plaintiff in obtaining the note of Brown for $600 on the actual sale of the mules by said plaintiff, or its cashier, to Brown, it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that the note should be taken in the name of defendant as payee, who would then transfer it to plaintiff; and that he did not actually under said agreement sign the note as indorser, but only as agent of plaintiff, to transfer to it the title to the note. In his answer, which he also denominated a cross complaint, he asked that the cause be transferred to the chancery court, which was done. The plaintiff, at the time, objected to the transfer of the case to the chancery court, and duly saved its exception to the order of transfer that was made. In the chancery court the plaintiff filed a motion asking that the case be transferred back to the circuit court, and this motion was overruled. The defendant adduced evidence tending to sustain the allegations of his answer relative to the manner in which and the party to whom the mules were sold, the circumstances relative to execution of the note, and the manner and object of his indorsement and transfer of the note. Upon a hearing of the case the chancellor rendered a decree dismissing the cause for the want of equity.

Md. 412, 3 Am. Rep. 190, that an agent who had indorsed a draft to his principal should be allowed to show that it was not the intention that he should be personally liable.

It is provided by statute in Georgia that "blank indorsements of negotiable paper may always be explained between the parties themselves, or those taking with notice of dishonor or of the actual facts of such indorsement." Galceran v. Noble, 66 Ga. 367.

For a note on right to show by parol evidence that indorsement unrestricted in form was made for the purpose of collection only, see Johnston v. Schnabaum, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 838.

The defendant indorsed the note sued on in blank, and the question is whether oral testimony is admissible to explain and qualify this unrestricted indorsement. By an indorsement in blank of a note the law implies a contract made by the indorser, which is of the same force as if it was reduced to writing. That contract is that, upon due demand of the maker and nonpayment, he will pay the note, if due notice of such nonpayment is given to him. It is well settled that as a general rule of law parol evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written contract; and ordinarily the written contract that is entered into by an indorser when he makes an unrestricted indorsement cannot be contradicted or varied by parol evidence. In 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 718, the author says: "For, in fact, though there be nothing but the indorser's signature, the indorser's contract is as fully expressed as that of the drawer of a bill payable to bearer. He is a new drawer on the drawee, if it be a bill; a drawer on the maker, if it be a note; and the instrument itself, with his name signed as indorser, constitutes his written contract, from which he can only be absolved by failure of demand or notice, or other delinquency of the holder. The following general view may therefore be stated, to wit: That in an action by immediate indorsee against an indorser, no evidence is admissible that would not be admissible in a suit by a party in privity with the drawer against him." Martin v. Cole, 104 U. S. 30, 26 L. ed. 647.

But, as between the indorser and his immediate indorsee, this general rule precluding the introduction of parol evidence to explain or qualify the indorsement has its limitations and exceptions. As is said in 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 720: "There are three classes of cases in which evidence for this purpose is admissible." Thus, it may be shown by this character of evidence that the indorsement was without consideration, or that it was made upon trust for some special purpose; or it is admissible where, by reason of certain representations and the transaction at the time of the indorsement, the note was taken by the indorsee in sole reliance on the responsibility of the maker, and it was indorsed in order only to transfer the title in pursuance of such transaction and agreement; and where the attempt to enforce the indorsement would be a fraud. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 720a, 721, 722; 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 255; Lovejoy v. Citizens' Bank, 23 Kan. 331. In 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 722, the following case is stated: "In Pennsylvania, where defendant purchased coffee of plaintiff upon an agreement that the latter should receive certain notes in payment, without defendant assuming any responsibility, the latter handed plaintiff the notes, when he said, 'Hill, you must indorse these notes.' Defendant replied: 'That is not our understanding.' The plaintiff rejoined: 'They are made payable to you. How will you convey them to me? You must indorse them, in order that I may collect them.' Defendant then said: 'I indorse them; but, remember, I am not to be held responsible for their payment. The court said: 'The evidence went to prove a direct fraud in obtaining the indorsements, or their perversion to a use never intended,—a fraudulent purpose.' This case is distinguished from those in which a mere agreement that the indorser shall not be responsible is offered to be shown; no circumstances which would otherwise render the transactions fraudulent or showing a secret trust, appearing."

The above Pennsylvania case can only be based upon the principle that the indorsement was obtained by false and fraudulent representations; for if the indorsement was made only with the contemporaneous oral agreement that it was made without recourse or without assuming responsibility, and with no facts or circumstances showing a false or fraudulent representation which induced the indorsement, then such contemporaneous oral agreement would be inadmissible to contradict or vary the written contract of responsibility implied by the unrestricted indorsement. In the case of Lovejoy v. Citizens' Bank, supra, a note was made payable to the president of a bank, and was by him indorsed in blank to the bank. In that case it was held that parol evidence was admissible, showing that the note represented a debt of the maker to the bank, and that the indorsement was made merely for the purpose of transferring the title to the bank. In the case of Johnston v. Schnabaum, 36 Ark. 82, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 838, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1082, 109 S. W. 1163, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 876, in speaking relative to the admissibility of testimony explaining and qualifying a blank indorsement under the circumstances of that case, this court used the following language: "No rule of evidence is, we think, violated by admitting such explanation. While the law implies, from an unrestricted indorsement, a contract to guarantee payment of negotiable paper, still the fact may be shown that the purpose of the assignment was merely for collection, and not for a sale of the instrument; and, when this is shown, no liability as guarantor of payment is implied."

In the case at bar the testimony on the part of the defendant tended to prove that he sold the mules to the plaintiff, or its cashier, and for its convenience or accommodation took the note of the maker, payable to him as payee, and then indorsed same to plaintiff under the agreement and understanding, made at the time that this was done, merely to pass the title to the plaintiff, and not as a sale of the note and a guaranty of its payment. The face of the note was the amount of the purchase money which Brown then agreed to pay for the mules, and that amount was really payable to the plaintiff, and not to defendant; and the note was in truth and in fact, under that testimony, the property of the plaintiff. The defendant was in effect only the agent of the plaintiff in permitting the note to be made payable to him, and, in indorsing it, he was merely transferring it for the purpose of placing the title to the note in the name of the plaintiff, who was the real owner. Under these circumstances, instead of selling the note, he sold the mules to the plaintiff, or its cashier, and by his indorsement of the note he did not become liable as a guarantor of its payment. Parol evidence was admissible under these circumstances to show the nature of the transaction, and the purpose of the indorsement, and such evidence would be a complete defense to an action against the defendant, seeking to hold him liable as a guarantor of the note. The defense, however, could be made, and this evidence was admissible, in a court of law equally as in a court of equity. The defense involved no equitable right or remedy, but only the admissibility of evidence. This court has held that where none of the parties objected to the transfer of a cause triable at law from the law court to the chancery court, and did not object to the chancery court entertaining and trying the action, the chancery court would have jurisdiction to determine the cause. Collins v. Paepcke-Leicht Lumber Co. 74 Ark. 81, 84 S. W. 1044; Blake v. Scott, 92 Ark. 46, 121 S. W. 1054, 123 S. W. 1181. But where such objection was made to the transfer of a case, where the action and defense was purely legal, from the law court to the chancery court, it would be error to make such transfer, and error for the chancery court to entertain jurisdiction thereof. Weaver v. Arkansas Nat. Bank, 73 Ark. 462, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the case at bar the plaintiff duly objected to the transfer of the action from the law to the chancery court. The evidence in the case was conflicting, and the plaintiff had the right to have the issue tried by a jury, and the action determined by a law court. The circuit court, therefore, erred in transferring the cause to the chancery court; and the chancery court erred in entertaining jurisdiction thereof.

For this error, the decree is reversed, and this cause is remanded, with directions to transfer the case to the Pulaski Circuit Court, and for further proceedings.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

DOMENICO GIURICEVIC, Respt.,

v.

CITY OF TACOMA, Appt.

Pleading — notice to municipality of injury.

1. That a claim for personal injuries was presented in writing to the city council, as required by statute, is not shown by a complaint which states that plaintiff caused the city and its officers and agents to be fully informed of the extent of the injury, and that the officers and agents investigated the same.

Municipal corporation — injury to employee — necessity of notice.

2. A statutory provision that all claims for injury alleged to have been caused by defects, want of repair, or obstruction of the streets of a city, must be presented to the council, is inapplicable to an injury to a workman engaged in repairing a street by the fall of an electric light pole maintained therein, since the injury did not result from obstruction of the street as a place of travel, and the statute did not contemplate presentation of claims arising from failure to furnish employees a safe working place.

Note. — Applicability of rule requiring notice of defect or notice of injury as condition of municipal liability for personal injury on street or highway in case of injury to municipal employee.

A search discloses no authorities on this question other than the case of Kelly v. Faribault, 95 Minn. 293, 104 N. W. 231, cited in the above opinion, where the plaintiff, an employee of the city, was injured while working in a trench in a public street, and served no notice of his injury upon the city. The court held that the requirement APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. L. Stiles, F. R. Baker, and F. A. Latcham for appellant.

Messrs. Ellis, Fletcher, & Evans, for respondent:

The injury was not caused by a defect, obstruction, or want of repair in a street, within the meaning of the statute requiring notice.

Pye v. Mankato, 38 Minn. 536, 38 N. W. 621; Moran v. St. Paul, 54 Minn. 279, 56 N. W. 80; Kelly v. Faribault, 95 Minn. 293, 104 N. W. 231; McIntee v. Middletown, 80 App. Div. 434, 81 N. Y. Supp. 124.

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought to recover for personal injuries. From a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, the defendant has appealed.

The complaint states that at the time the injury was received the respondent was working for the city in grading a street in which the city had placed a large electric light pole; that in grading, the city negligently caused the earth to be excavated around the pole to such an extent that it was dangerous and liable to fall; that the city had notice of its dangerous condition prior to the injury; that the respondent, at the instance of the city, was working near the pole, filling wagons with gravel, and while so doing, and without any knowledge of its dangerous condition, the pole fell, striking of the statute was not intended to apply in case of an injury to a city employee, saying, in the course of the opinion: "The object of the notice when required is well understood to be to give the municipality an opportunity to investigate, and to protect against fictitious claims. The reason for the rule hardly applies in a case where its own servants are injured in such work by the negligence of the master, but specifically to cases where the public are interested in using, within their rights, the property of the city. With reference to such injuries, when they occur, the municipality would seldom have notice or opportunity to obtain the requisite information of the cause thereof, or the evidence of the city's negligence, to enable it to defend, after long delay. This would not apply to an injury of the kind happening in this case, for it must be presumed that, with reference to its own servants, and the violation of its duties to them, it has and ought to have the same notice as other persons occupying the relation of em-

the respondent, and inflicting upon him a permanent injury. The complaint further states: "That immediately after said injury, plaintiff caused the city of Tacoma and its officers and agents to be fully informed of the time, place, cause, nature, and extent of his said injury, and the said city of Tacoma and its officers and agents immediately investigated said injury and the cause thereof and the extent of the same." The appellant demurred to the complaint on the ground, among others, that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer being overruled, issue was joined, and the case tried to a jury, with the result stated.

The case is brought here on the record, and the single question presented is whether the complaint states a cause of action. Section 215 of the revised city charter of the city of Tacoma provides: "All claims for injuries to the person, alleged to have been caused or sustained by reason of defects, want of repair, or obstruction of any of the highways, streets, alleys, sidewalks, or cross walks, of the city, shall be presented in writing to the city council within thirty days after such injuries shall be alleged to have been received. Such writing shall state the time, place, cause, nature, and extent of the alleged injuries, so far as practicable, and shall be verified by affidavit of the claimant to the effect that the same is true. The omission to present any such claim in the manner or within the time in this section provided shall be a bar to an action against said city therefor."

The appellant first urges that the complaint is subject to a demurrer because it does not state that the claim was presented to the city council. The respondent con-ployer over the persons who are in direct relation with it. While a very strict and technical construction of the statute might bring the case within its letter, we are very leary it was not within its spirit, and if it is desired that it should be the relief must be obtained from the legislature."

See also the case of McIntee v. Middletown, 80 App. Div. 434, 81 N. Y. Supp. 124, where a charter provision for notice of injury caused by defects in, want of repair, or obstruction of any highway, street, alley, sidewalk, or public place, was held inapplicable to an injury suffered by a workman employed by the city in excavating a sewer trench. This decision, however, was upon the ground that the injury was not the result of any defect, want of repair, or obstruction of a highway, the mere fact that the sewer happened to be in the highway not bringing the accident within the letter or spirit of the charter provision. The fact that the injured man was a city employee apparently did not receive consideration.

tends that, whilst the complaint may have been defective as against a motion to make it more definite and certain, as to a demurrer, every reasonable intendment and presumption should be indulged to support it, and that, when this is done, it sufficiently appears that notice was given to the city council. We grant the rule of liberal interpretation, but with this indulgence we do not think the complaint states that notice was given to the city council. It was a simple matter to plead the notice, if it had in fact been given. The complaint has the appearance of a studied effort to avoid, rather than to state, the giving of the notice to the council.

The respondent next contends that the injury did not result from any defect, want of repair, or obstruction in the street as a place of travel; that the fact that the injury happened in the street is a mere incident; and that the charter provision is inapplicable. We think this view must prevail.

The giving of a notice to the city or its governing body upon claims for injuries by tort is not necessary as a condition precedent to an action thereon against the municipality, unless expressly required by statute or charter. 28 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1447. A charter or statute requiring a notice or presentment of a claim as a condition precedent to the commencement of an action requires a strict construction, and cannot be extended by implication beyond its terms. 28 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1450. In Pye v. Mankato, 38 Minn. 536, 38 N. W. 621, the complaint charged the city with liability on account of the raising of the grade of certain streets so as to form embankments obstructing a water course which crossed the same, by reason of which, and because the gutters provided for carrying off the water were insufficient for that purpose, water was collected and discharged upon the plaintiff's premises. There was a special statute which provided that no action could be maintained against the city of Mankato "on account of any injury received by means of any defect in the condition of any bridge, street, sidewalk, or thoroughfare, unless such action shall be commenced within one year from the happening of the injury; nor unless notice shall have first been given in writing to the mayor of said city within thirty days of the occurrence of such injury or damage, stating the place where and the time when such injury was received." The complaint did not show a compliance with the statute, and was demurred to for that reason. The court held that the word "defect" had reference to the usefulness and safety of the streets for the purpose of travel, but that it did not include injuries resulting to adjacent property from conditions which did not render the street defective as such, and that the injury "had no natural or necessary relation to the fact that the places where the alleged acts were done were public streets."

In Moran v. St. Paul, 54 Minn. 279, 56 N. W. 80, the complaint alleged that the property adjoining the street had been injured by water escaping from a defective water pipe in one of the public streets. There was no averment in the complaint that a written notice of the plaintiff's claim for damages had been served upon the mayor or city clerk, as required by the defendant's charter, and it was urged, upon demurrer to the complaint, that a cause of action was not stated. The court held that the words in the charter, "any defect in the condition of any . . . street," referred to "their usefulness and safety for the purpose of travel." In McIntee v. Middletown, 80 App. Div. 434, 81 N. Y. Supp. 124, the plaintiff was injured by the caving of the dirt while digging a trench for a sewer in a street in the city. The court, in holding that the charter provision requiring notice to be served on the common council did not apply, said: "And the mere fact that this sewer happened to be in the highway does not bring it within the letter or the spirit of the provision of the charter."

The respondent next contends that the charter does not require or contemplate the presentation of claims arising from the failure of the city to furnish its servant a reasonably safe place in which to work. This question received consideration in Kelly v. Faribault, 95 Minn. 293, 104 N. W. 231, where the plaintiff was injured while at work in a trench in a public street. It was charged that the trench was defective in its construction, and was not properly braced, by reason of which the loose earth fell upon and injured the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not serve notice, as provided by law for injuries resulting from a defective street. The court held that the law requiring notice to the city had no application to its duty as master to furnish its servant a reasonably safe place in which to work; that the purpose of the law requiring notice was to give the municipality an opportunity to investigate and protect itself against fictitious claims. We think that, while the claim in the instant case is within the letter, it is clearly without the spirit of the charter provision. In arriving at the intent of a law, it is proper to consider the mischief sought to be met. Clearly, the purpose of the notice is to enable the city to protect itself against spurious and fraudulent claims. In this case the reason for the notice is absent, for it must be presumed that the city had notice of the injury to its servant. Postel v. Seattle, 41 Wash. 432, 83 Pac. 1025, is distinguishable. The charter of the city of Seattle required "all claims for damages against the city" to be presented.

The judgment will be affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

FRANK SANDERS, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF ALABAMA.

(— Ala. —, 52 So. 417.)

Larceny — corpus delicti — possession of goods.

The proof of corpus delicti is not sufficient to support a conviction of larceny, where it merely shows that certain goods, formerly part of the stock of a merchant, were found in possession of accused, without anything to show that they were stolen, or were not sold in due course of trade.

(April 19, 1910.)

Note. — Proof of corpus delicti in larceny.

This note brings down to date the larceny branch of the note, "Proof of corpus delicti in criminal case," in 68 L.R.A. 33, and contains only cases decided since that time.

What constitutes.

"There can be no larceny without a taking of the property against the will of the owner." State v. Court, 225 Mo. 609, 125 S. W. 451.

On a prosecution for the larceny of an automobile, the court said, in People v. Cahill, 11 Cal. App. 685, 106 Pac. 115; "The corpus delicti consisted of the asportation of the machine. There can, of course, be no doubt that the evidence . . . shows that the car was taken from the garage by someone, and that there is no pretense that it was shown that it was taken with the consent of either the owner or the manager of the garage is a proposition equally as free from doubt, so far as the record discloses. In other words, the irresistible inference from the circumstances proved . . . is that the 'auto' was wrongfully and feloniously taken from the garage, and hence the corpus delicti was clearly established."

Necessity of proving.

"The burden rests upon the state to prove the corpus delicti, and unless the state has shown, prima facie, that a larceny has been committed, the defendant is not put upon 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Greene County, convicting him of larceny. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harwood and McKinley, for appellant:

There was no proof of the corpus delicti.

Smith v. State, 133 Ala. 150, 91 Am. St. Rep. 21, 31 So. 806; Stringer v. State, 135 Ala. 60, 33 So. 685, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 462; Orr v. State, 107 Ala. 39, 18 So. 142; White v. State, 72 Ala. 200; Bryant v. State, 116 Ala. 452, 23 So. 40; 2 Russell, Crimes 294, 295; 2 Best, Ev. 751, 752.

Mr. Alexander M. Garber, Attorney General, for the State.

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was indicted of larceny, and of receiving stolen goods. The property alleged to be stolen, and received as such, consisted of 16 pairs of pants and 3 pairs of shoes, the property of G. A. Horton.

The corpus delicti was not proven, and for this reason the accused should have been acquitted.

proof." Perry v. State, 155 Ala. 93, 46 So. 470.

"To support a conviction, there must be evidence that the property in question was actually stolen." George v. United States, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 307, 97 Pac. 1052, 100 Pac. 46.

Upon a conviction for larceny, refusal of a new trial is error, where there was no proof of the corpus delicti. Franklin v. State, 3 Ga. App. 342, 59 S. E. 835.

On a prosecution for larceny, the ownership and the fact of wrongful taking must be alleged and proved before a presumption of guilt will arise from the mere fact of possession. State v. Loomis, 129 Iowa, 141, 105 N. W. 397.

In the case of People v. Mindeman, 157 Mich. 120, 121 N. W. 488, which was a prosecution for larceny, the court said that there is no question about the rule that, in all trials for crime, the prosecution must prove the corpus delicti to the satisfaction of the jury, and beyond a reasonable doubt, before evidence tending to implicate the party on trial is introduced.

On a grand larceny trial, the court said, in State v. Keeland, 39 Mont. 506, 104 Pac. 513: "The defendant is not required in any case to answer the charge against him, in the absence of evidence upon the part of the prosecution sufficient to establish the corpus delicti."

In connection with confession.

In Shires v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 89, 99 Pac. 1100, a prosecution for the larceny of mules, the court said: "A convic-

The alleged owner of the property testified on his direct examination as follows: "That he knew the defendant. That in January, 1909, before the finding of the indictment, he recovered from the defendant 16 pairs of pants and 3 pairs of shoes. That he (the witness) had never sold any goods like these to the defendant. That the pants were worth from $1 to $2.50, wholesale, and some of them $3, a pair. That the shoes were worth $5 a pair. That these shoes and pants came out of the witness's store at Pleasant Ridge, and, so far as the witness knew, they were obtained from said store without the witness's knowledge or consent. That witness's store is located in Greene county, Alabama. That some of said goods had defendant's cost mark on them." This was all of his testimony on direct examination. On his cross-examination he testified to no other fact tending to prove the corpus delicti; but, among other things, testified: That for a number of years prior to the indictment, and at that time, he was engaged in the mercantile business at Pleasant Ridge, Greene county, Alabama; that during this time there were eight persons besides himself who were authorized to sell goods from his store, and that they did sell same; that he could not swear that the goods in question were not sold out of his store in the due course of trade; that witness was absent from his store a great deal of the time; "that witness had quite a large stock of pants in his store, and quite a large stock of shoes also; that he could not swear that he missed these goods, or any of them, out of his stock, and does not know when they went out of his store; that it was not customary for the cost mark to be removed from goods when they were sold; that witness did not sell these pants and shoes himself, but could not swear that said 16 pairs of pants and 3 pairs of shoes, or any of them, were stolen; that he could not swear that said shoes were not sold from witness's stock in the regular course of business." This was all the evidence that, in the slightest, tended to prove the corpus delicti.

The goods in question were found in the house of the defendant, and when questioned as to where he got them,—the parties questioning him at the time threatening to tie him,—he ran away from his house, but did not leave the neighborhood; and subsequent-tion should not be had on extrajudicial confessions of the defendant, unsupported by corroborating facts and circumstances. Proof aliunde of the corpus delicti is required."

In order that a confession of larceny may authorize a conviction, it must be accompanied by other proof showing that the crime has been committed. Brown v. Com. (Ky.) 118 S. W. 945.

But while an extrajudicial confession or admission of one charged with larceny is not sufficient, of itself, to sustain a conviction, and there must be other evidence of the corpus delicti, yet it seems to be the rule that such a confession or admission may be considered in connection with the other evidence, to establish the corpus delicti, and that it is not necessary to prove the corpus delicti by evidence entirely independent and exclusive of the confession or admission. State v. Brinkley (Or.) 105 Pac. 708.

Character and sufficiency.

Corroborated statements of fact, made by a defendant in a prosecution for larceny, not amounting to admissions of guilt, are admissible to prove the facts establishing the corpus delicti. Ibid.

"Corpus delicti may be proved by circumstantial evidence, and if the evidence adduced affords an inference that a larceny has been committed, the question of its sufficiency is for the jury." Perry v. State, 155 Ala. 93, 46 So. 470.

It seems to be a well-settled general rule that corpus delicti in larceny may be proved by circumstantial evidence, as held by the following cases, in which also the circumstantial evidence in each was held sufficient to establish the corpus delicti, or to warrant the submission of the question to the jury, and to sustain a finding of guilt: Sheffield v. State, 1 Ga. App. 135, 57 S. E. 969; Ray v. State, 4 Ga. App. 67, 60 S. E. 816; Mason v. State, 171 Ind. 78, 85 N. E. 776, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1212; State v. Vinton, 220 Mo. 90, 119 S. W. 370; State v. Keeland, 39 Mont. 506, 104 Pac. 513; George v. United States, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 307, 97 Pac. 1052, 100 Pac. 46.

In Cohoe v. State, 82 Neb. 744, 118 N. W. 1088, and Shires v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 89, 99 Pac. 1100, also, it is held that corpus delicti in larceny may be proved by circumstantial evidence, and that the circumstantial evidence in those cases was sufficient corroboration of a voluntary confession of the accused, in the first case, to establish the corpus delicti, and in the second, to make the sufficiency of the proof, both of the corpus delicti and of the defendant's guilt, a question for the jury alone.

In the following cases of larceny, where the admissibility of circumstantial evidence to prove corpus delicti does not seem to have been questioned, it is held that the evidence, though circumstantial, was sufficient proof of corpus delicti: Jefferson v. State, 89 Ark. 129, 115 S. W. 1140; People v. Cahill, 11 Cal. App. 685, 106 Pac. 115; State v. Collins, 79 Kan. 411, 99 Pac.

ly he removed the goods in question to a neighbor's house, but, further than this, made no attempt to conceal them.

All the evidence offered as to the defendant's possession of the goods would have been proper and admissible if the corpus delicti had been proven, or any sufficient evidence offered which would authorize the jury to infer that the goods had been stolen by defendant, or by any other person; but, in the absence of such proof, it was all, of course, inadmissible.

It is but a truism to say that there can be no receiving of stolen property, unless the property in question is first stolen. It is likewise true that, in order for the possession of property to be evidence of a crime, the crime must be proven. In the recent case of Smith v. State, 133 Ala. 150, 91 Am. St. Rep. 21, 31 So. 807, this court reviewed some of our former cases on this subject, and spoke as follows: "It must now be regarded as settled in this state that the unexplained possession of property recently stolen does not, as matter of law, raise a presumption of guilt from the circumstance. Nor does the unexplained possession by one person of goods belonging to another raise the presumption that a larceny has been committed and that the possessor is a thief. Additional evidence is necessary to establish a corpus delicti. Unless the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the offense has been committed, the unexplained recent possession of goods will not justify the conclusion that the person in whose possession they are found is the thief. Orr v. State, 107 Ala. 35, 18 So. 142; Thomas v. State, 109 Ala. 25, 19 So. 403. 'Proof of a charge, in criminal causes, involves the proof of two distinct propositions: First, that the act itself was done; and, secondly, that it was done by the person charged, and by none other. In other words, proof of the corpus delicti and of the identity of the prisoner.' Winslow v. State, 76 Ala. 47, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 43. It is undoubtedly true that both of these essential propositions are generally for the determination of the jury, and both must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. But where there is no proof of the corpus delicti, no testimony tending in the remotest degree to prove that the property charged to have been stolen was in fact stolen, no larceny shown to have been committed, then there can be no conviction of the prisoner should the goods described in the indictment, charged to have been stolen, be found in his possession, though no explanation as to how he came by them be given by him, or, if given, is entirely unsatisfactory. In such case, the evidence is not prima facie sufficient to establish the corpus delicti, and the court should not allow the introduction of evidence of possession by the prisoner of the goods charged in the indictment to have been stolen."

There was no proof that these particular goods in question were stolen from Horton or any other person. There was no proof that these or similar goods had ever been stolen from the alleged owner. The most that it showed was that a part of these goods, or goods like them, were once in the store of Horton. But there was no evidence that they were ever stolen or thought to be stolen, other than the fact that they were found in defendant's possession; and whether this was one day, or one or two or three years, after they were in defendant's store, did not appear. Nor was there any evidence tending to fix the time when the goods were in Horton's store, or when defendant acquired them.

To repeat, there was no evidence tending to show that the property was ever stolen by anyone. The fact that it was once in Horton's store, and was subsequently found in the defendant's possession, does not tend to show that it was stolen. There was not a particle of evidence to show that any theft was ever committed as to the property in question, or as to any other. There

Wells*, 33 Mont. 291, 83 Pac. 476; Territory v. Leslie (N. M.) 106 Pac. 378; People v. Klein, 117 App. Div. 196, 102 N. Y. Supp. 289; Hines v. United States, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 639, 103 Pac. 879.

The following cases, without disputing the admissibility of circumstantial evidence to prove corpus delicti in larceny, hold that the evidence offered in each was not sufficient to establish the corpus delicti: Franklin v. State, 3 Ga. App. 342, 59 S. E. 835; State v. Loomis, 129 Iowa, 141, 105 N. W. 397; Moseby v. Com. (Ky.) 113 S. W. 850; Brown v. Com. (Ky.) 118 S. W. 945. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Evidence of corpus delicti tending to connect accused.

In many, if not most, cases, the evidence offered to prove corpus delicti tends also to show the guilt of the accused; and in George v. United States, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 307, 97 Pac. 1052, the court said, on this point: "Neither is it essential that the corpus delicti should be established by evidence independent of that which tends to connect the accused with its perpetration. The same evidence which tends to prove one may also tend to prove the other, so that the existence of the crime and the guilt of the defendant may stand together inseparable on one foundation of circumstantial evidence."

was some evidence of the "corpus," but none of the "delicti."

The rule as to sufficiency of the evidence to support a conviction, in cases like this, is thus stated in Russell on Crimes, vol. 2, pp. 294, 295: "Where the prosecutor kept a large toyshop, and the prisoner, a little boy, came into the shop dressed in a smock frock, and, after remaining there some time, from suspicion excited, he was searched, and under his smock frock were found concealed a doll, six toyhouses, and such other things, and the prosecutor swore that he believed the six toyhouses to be his property, because they exactly resembled other toyhouses of the same sort which he had in his shop, and he gave the same evidence with regard to all the other articles except the doll, and he swore that the doll had been his, as he found upon it his private mark; but he could not say that he had not sold it, and he had not missed, and could not miss, from the nature of the stock, any of the articles which the prisoner was charged with stealing. Erle, J., said: 'It seems to me that you have failed to establish in this case the corpus delicti. It is true the prosecutor swears that the doll was once his, but he cannot state that it was taken from him; and, for aught that appears to the contrary, the prisoner may have come by it in an honest manner.' [R. v. Dredge, 1 Cox, C. C. 235.] And an acquittal was directed."

It will be observed that there was no proof that the goods found in defendant's possession were ever lost; much less, stolen.

Mr. Best states the rule as to the sufficiency of evidence in criminal cases as follows: "There must be clear and unequivocal proof of the corpus delicti. Every criminal charge involves two things: First, that an offense has been committed; and, secondly, that the accused is the author, or one of the authors, of it. 'I take the rule to be this,' says Lord Stowell, in his judgment in Evans v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 35, 105: 'If you have a criminal fact ascertained, you may then take presumptive proof to show who did it; to fix the criminal, having then an actual corpus delicti.' . . . But to take presumptions in order to swell an equivocal fact, a fact that is absolutely ambiguous in its own nature, into a criminal fact, is a mode of proceeding of a very different nature, and would, I take it, be an entire misapplication of the doctrine of presumptions.' Sir Matthew Hale, also, in his Pleas of the Crown, 2 Hale, P. C. 290, laid down the two following rules, which have met with deserved approbation: 'I would never convict any person for stealing the goods cujusdam ignoti, merely because he would not give an account how he came by them, unless there were due proof made that a felony was committed of these goods.'" 2 Best, Ev. pp. 751, 752.

It follows that the general affirmative charge should have been given for defendant.

Reversed and remanded.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM FRANTZ et al.

v.
JACOB FINK et al.

(125 La. 1013, 52 So. 131.)

Sale — possession of chattel with power of — dation en paiement — title.

Plaintiffs placed in the hands of one Moss certain jewelry with right to sell the same under an obligation to pay them a certain amount fixed at the time. Moss sold to Fink one set of the earrings and received the price. The other set Moss transferred to Fink under dation en paiement. Frantz & Company brought this suit to recover and have delivered to them the jewelry, and, on default of Fink so to do, to recover the price fixed between the parties. The court of appeal rendered judgment in favor of defendant. Held, on review of that judgment that it was correct as to the jewelry which was sold to Fink, but erroneous as to the jewelry which was transferred to him under the dation en paiement.

(November 2, 1909.)

CERTIORARI to the Court of Appeals to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division B, in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover certain goods placed in the possession of defendant Moss with power of sale, or to recover the agreed price thereof. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Zach Spearing, for applicants:

Mere possession of personal property belonging to a third person, even though that possession be legal, does not authorize or justify the possessor in selling the property, and a sale by such a person does not invest the purchaser with the title and ownership.

Furniss's Succession, 34 La. Ann. 1015.

Nicholls, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought suit in the civil district court for the parish of Orleans, in which it alleged that it was the sole and only owner of one pair of solitaire diamond earrings $3\frac{1}{2}$ carats weight, less $\frac{1}{8}$ of a carat, valued at the sum of \$502.97, and also another pair of solitaire diamond earrings valued at the sum of \$975, making a total of \$1,477.97; that on or about the 13th day of March, 1906, and on or about the 4th day of April, 1906, petitioner delivered the above-mentioned earrings, respectively, to Louis Moss, a resident of New Orleans, for his temporary use, but petitioner did not sell the said earrings, nor either of them, to the said Moss, nor did petitioner part with the ownership thereof in whole or in part, nor did petitioner authorize the said Moss to sell or dispose of the said earrings in whole or in part, or either of them, nor to pledge, pawn, or encumber the same in any manner, shape, or form; that, notwithstanding the said Moss had no legal right nor authority to do so, and notwithstanding the sole and only ownership of the said earrings in petitioner, the said Moss, in violation of the law and of the right of petitioner, did pawn and pledge and deliver all of the said earrings to Jacob Fink, a resident of the city of New Orleans, for a sum of money not known to petitioner, which said sum of money the said Moss used for his own benefit, and the same did not in any manner inure to the benefit or advantage of petitioner; that petitioner is still the sole and only owner of all of the said earrings, and was entitled to be recognized as such, and to have the said Jacob Fink condemned to deliver the said earrings to petitioner, or, in default thereof, to pay the value of the same to petitioner.

In view of the premises, petitioner prayed that Louis Moss and Jacob Fink be duly cited; that, after due and proper proceedings, there be judgment in favor of petitioner and against the said Moss and the said Fink, recognizing petitioner as the sole and only owner of one pair of diamond earrings $3\frac{1}{2}$ carats in weight, less $\frac{1}{8}$ of a carat, valued at the sum of \$502.97, and of one pair of solitaire diamond earrings valued at the sum of \$975; that they and each of them be ordered and condemned to deliver the said earrings to petitioner within a time to be fixed by this honorable court, or, in default thereof, that there be judgment in favor of petitioner and against the said Moss and Fink in solido for the full and true sum of \$1,477.97, or so much thereof as represents the value of such earrings as may not be delivered to petitioner, with legal interest from April 4, 1906, until paid, and costs of court, and for all equitable and general relief.

Defendant pleaded a general denial. Further answering, he averred that Louis Moss was a vendor of diamonds and jewelry in the open market of this city, and was well recognized as such by the trade generally and by plaintiff and defendant; that said Louis Moss, being indebted unto defendant in the sum of $500, did, in the course of his business dealings, in order to make a settlement of the said $500, on or about April 28, 1906, sell to defendant a certain pair of solitaire diamond earrings for the sum of $965, represented by said debt of $500, which was thereby extinguished, and the further sum of $465 paid by defendant to Harry Koritzky of this city for account of said Moss; that said Moss did, in the course of his business dealings, on or about March 14, 1906, sell to defendant another pair of solitaire diamond earrings for the price and sum of $300, which defendant paid to said Moss. And defendant denied that the earrings thus purchased and acquired by him were the property of plaintiff, and defendant averred that he purchased the same and paid for the same in good faith and in open market the full value thereof, and purchased the same from one who was dealer in such articles and recognized by the trade generally and by plaintiff and defendant as such.

Defendant further averred that, so far as defendant was aware, said Moss was the owner of said property and had full power, right, and authority to sell the same to defendant, for which defendant paid the full value in good faith and in open market. Defendant further averred that if he be mistaken, and if it be true that said Moss was not the owner of said property, and if it be true that the same was placed in his possession by the said plaintiff, then defendant averred that the same was placed in the possession of said Moss by plaintiff for the purpose of sale, and they are estopped to question the authority of said Moss to sell and dispose of same; and, if there were any litigation on the right of said Moss to sell and dispose of the property, defendant averred that he had no knowledge and no means of knowing thereof, and that he should be protected in the purchase made by him as aforesaid.

In view of the premises, defendant prayed for judgment in his favor rejecting the demand of plaintiff for costs and for full general and equitable relief.

On trial of the suit judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, and thereupon plaintiff appealed therefrom to the court of appeal. That court on hearing of the appeal rendered the following judgment: "The basis for plaintiff's right to be adjudged the owner of the two diamond earrings and, in default of their return, to have judgment for the price of said earrings against Fink, who, it may be stated at once, is shown by the evidence to have acquired same in perfect good faith, from a regular and well-known dealer, in open market and for a valuable consideration," is that the earrings were delivered to Moss simply for "temporary use," and absolutely without any authority conferred on him to sell, dispose of, or in any manner to encumber the same.

The testimony of the plaintiff's own witnesses establishes the very contrary: The earrings were delivered by plaintiff to Moss, who was a dealer in diamonds, known as such to the trade generally and to plaintiff firm particularly, as repeated transactions of a character similar to the transaction in the instant cause were had between plaintiff and Moss, just in the same manner and for the same purpose and under the same conditions as the plaintiff delivered other jewelry to Moss on transactions prior to and subsequent to the instant transaction, and that was the purpose of sale. From the evidence of plaintiff's principal witness, the senior member of the firm, it is apparent that Moss not only had the right to sell these particular goods, but that he obtained them from the plaintiff firm with the knowledge on its part that this was the very purpose of the delivery. He was charged a fixed price for them less than the retail, so that when he sold them a margin of profit could be left to him. The agreement in this and all other similar transactions between Moss and the plaintiff firm was that the former was to have the right either to retain the goods and pay the price agreed on, or to return the goods if he so desired. In his testimony, William Frantz, the senior member of plaintiff firm, states just how this transaction occurred:

Q. Will you kindly tell the court the circumstances under which you handed these things over to Mr. Moss, and for which purpose you handed them over to him?

A. Well, Mr. Moss came into the store, and he told us that he had a customer for a pair of diamond earrings, and so he took them from us for sale.

Q. Did you sell these diamond earrings to Mr. Moss?

A. No, sir; we did not sell them to him.

Q. Well, just tell us what was to be done with them; tell us the whole story with regards to that pair of diamond earrings.

A. Well, they were delivered to Mr. Moss, and he was either to sell them or return us the earrings; he was to give us back the earrings or the money.

Again he was asked:

Q. What did he (Moss) state to you?

A. He stated to us that he had a customer for a pair of earrings.

Q. And for which purpose did you give this pair of diamond earrings to Mr. Moss?

A. For the purpose of selling them.

Q. Selling them generally, or for any one particular customer?

A. Well, he said he had a particular customer for it. He said he had a customer for a pair of diamond earrings, and so we gave them to him. . . . If the earrings were sold, he was going to bring me the price of them (the money), and, if they were not sold, then the earrings were to be returned to us. I charged him a margin of profit on them,—on both of them. I did that because he wanted to make a profit on them, and so we thought we would make a very small margin to him.

The price agreed on was $502.97 for one pair and $975 for the other pair of the earrings. This the witness says was within 10 or 15 per cent of the cost, adding: "This is not the value at which they would have been sold at retail. They would have been sold at retail at more than that. I made a very small price to Mr. Moss at the time because, naturally, he wanted to make something on it himself."

On cross-examination he says:

Mr. Moss was an operator in diamonds, or a vendor of diamonds, in this city, and of jewelry. He was well known among the trade as such. We charged him (Moss) for these goods on a memorandum slip. He was either to return the goods or to give up the price which we had charged against him. We gave him a bill at the time showing the price that he was to be accountable for to us. He was not to sell the goods and charge us a commission for selling them. He was not to account to us for what he might get out of the goods. Anything that he got for the goods, no matter how much it was above the price which we billed, would belong to him.

Q. And, whether he sold the goods or kept and retained them himself, all that you wanted to get back from him was the amount that you had charged him for these goods; isn't that right, Mr. Frantz?

A. Yes, sir; that is correct.

He testified that the plaintiff firm had other similar dealings with Moss:

In these instances he had always paid us the price that we charged him for the goods. We never inquired as to what he had done with the goods, because we had nothing to do with that,—what he sold them for.

From the record of the suit No. 4,594 of our docket, instituted by the plaintiff against J. W. Winehill and Louis Moss, this 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

day decided (124 La. 680, 50 So. 650), we hear that plaintiff firm had similar transactions with Moss, one on the 28th of March, and another on the 2d of April, 1906, concerning diamond studs. This suit is for the exact price charged Moss, which is less than the actual retail value of these articles.

It is evident from the facts above recited that the transactions between plaintiff and Moss concerning the earrings in question evidences a contract of sale subject to the right to recover and return reserved to the purchaser, or what is known to the law as a contract of "sale or return."

Article 2439 of the Civil Code defines the contract of sale as "an agreement by which one gives a thing for a price in current money, and the other gives the price in order to have the thing," and also provides that "three circumstances concur to the perfection of the contract, to wit, the thing sold, the price, and the consent."

Here all these elements concur. Both parties had consented to the transaction, the price was fixed and binding on both, and the thing was delivered. The only reservation which was a condition subsequent was that Moss had the right of dissolving the sale by a return of the goods to be made within a reasonable delay after the transaction, no specific time being stipulated. As we have said, this was a transaction of "sale and return." Under such transactions, the title passes to the vendee.

Mr. Benjamin, in his work on Sales (p. 597), says: "The bargain called 'sale or return' was explained by the Queen's bench in Moss v. Sweet, 16 Q. B. 493, 20 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 167 (see Swain v. Shepherd, 1 Moody & R. 223), . . . to mean a sale with a right on the part of the buyer to return the goods at his option, within a reasonable time, and it was held in that case that the property passes, and an action for goods sold and delivered will lie if the goods are not returned to the seller within a reasonable time."

In Ex parte White, L. R. 6 Ch. 397, Lord Chief Justice James said where a party received goods to sell them at any price he thought fit, and was still only liable to pay for them at a price fixed beforehand, without any reference to the price at which he had sold them in a particular month, he was not acting in a fiduciary capacity in respect to these goods. Mellish, L. J., was of the same opinion, and, after stating that Neville purchased at a fixed price and at a fixed time, said: "Now, if it had been his duty to sell to his customers at that price . . . [payable at that time], the course of dealing would be consistent with his being merely a del credere agent, because I apprehend that a del credere agent, like any other agent, is to sell according to the instructions of his principal and to make such contracts as he is authorized to make for his principal, and he is distinguished from other agents simply in this, that he guarantees that those persons to whom he sells shall perform the contracts which he makes with them, and therefore, if he sells at the price . . . and upon the credit which he is authorized by his principal to give, and the customer pays him according to his contract, then no doubt he is bound like any other agent as soon as he receives the money to hand it over to the principal. But if the consignee is at liberty . . . to sell at any price he likes, and receive payment at any time he likes, but is to be bound, if he sells the goods, to pay the consignor for them at a fixed price and a fixed time, in my opinion, whatever the parties may think, their relation is not that of principal and agent; . . . in point of law, the alleged agent in such a case is making on his own account a contract of purchase with his alleged principal and is again reselling."

Mechem on Sales, after referring to sales of goods to arrive to be shipped on approval satisfactory to buyer, if satisfactory to this party, to be weighed, to be appraised, etc., in which cases he says the title does not pass to the seller, reads that "to be distinguished from the cases in the last sections are those in which the option is the opposite, i. e., that the article is purchased and shall be paid for unless it be returned. Here there is a present sale subject to a condition subsequent. As is said in one case, an option to purchase if he lived is essentially different from an option to return a purchase, if he should not like. In one case, the title will not pass until the option is determined; in the other, the property passes at once subject to the right to rescind and return. . . . A contract of this nature . . . [is] a present sale subject to be defeated by a condition subsequent, until returned. Therefore the title is in the vendee. He may sell the goods as his own, and thus defeat the return; or they may be seized by his creditors with like effect. The risk usually is his also, as the risk follows the title excepting, perhaps, such risks as inhere in the very nature of the property, or are incidental." Sections 675-677.

Delivery of an article at a fixed price under alternative agreement that the article is to be paid for or returned at the option of the party receiving it constitutes a sale. Crocker v. Gullifer, 44 Me. 491, 69 Am. Dec. 118. When the option is with the party receiving to pay for or return the goods received, the uniform current of authority is that such alternative agreement is a sale.

Holbrook v. Armstrong, 10 Me. 31. In Dearborn v. Turner, 16 Me. 17, 33 Am. Dec. 630, it was held that Nason, who received the property, having the alternative to return or pay, the property passed to him, and he was at liberty to sell. In Buswell v. Bicknell, 17 Me. 344, 35 Am. Dec. 262, the party receiving the article in dispute verbally agreed to pay a certain price or return the same in a given time. "The property," said the court, "in the thing delivered passes, and the remedy of the former owner rests in contract. It is the option conceded to the party receiving which produces this effect."

2. Even should the nature of the transaction between plaintiff and Moss be not that of vendor and vendee, there is one fact which stands out conspicuous in the record, indeed, it is admitted by the plaintiff firm, and that is that the goods were delivered by it to Moss for the very purpose of resale. This fact alone would as a matter of law preclude recovery from a bona fide purchaser.

"The general rule permitting the conditional vendor, as for instance in cases where the seller retains the title in the goods until the price is paid, to recover against a bona fide purchaser from the latter, very obviously should not and does not apply in these cases in which the goods have been delivered to the conditional vendee for the very purpose of being resold." Mechem on Sales, p. 601. "Merely intrusting goods to another, without knowledge that they were to be put on sale, would not raise an estoppel; . . . but knowledge that they are to be put on sale, and acquiescence in allowing them to be so exposed, is equivalent to authority to sell them, and well may raise an equitable estoppel. That is matter of law, and a defense now favored, both at law and in equity." Lewenberg v. Hayes, 91 Me. 104, 64 Am. St. Rep. 215, 39 Atl. 469.

And it has been repeatedly held that a pledgee of the person thus authorized to sell the goods may claim protection as a bona fide purchaser to the extent of his lien. Western Union Cold Storage Co. v. Bankers' Nat. Bank, 176 Ill. 260, 52 N. E. 30; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Phillips, 60 Ill. 190; Prall v. Tilt, 27 N. J. Eq. 393; Williams v. Birch, 6 Bosw. 309; Levy v. Carr, 85 Hun, 289, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1023; Parker v. Baxter, 19 Hun, 410; Mechem, Sales, p. 977. And so anyone who in the ordinary course of business makes advances. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 575; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 840.

The case of Lallande v. His Creditors, 42 La. Ann. 705, 7 So. 895, does not militate against this proposition, forasmuch as the factor in that case to whom the goods were shipped was authorized to sell only as the agent and representative of the client and for the latter. His relation to the latter was of a fiduciary nature, and therefore the goods were not sent to him under a conditional or any character of sale at all. He was not authorized to sell the goods as his own.

In the cases cited supra the goods were delivered under conditional sales, with authority, however, to resell the same for the account and as the property of the person to whom they were delivered. No fiduciary relations existed there, and none exist in the case at bar. A leading case in which it is held that the general rule permitting the conditional vendor to recover against a bona fide purchaser from the vendee does not apply where the goods have been delivered to the conditional vendee for the very purpose of being resold is Smith v. Clews, 105 N. Y. 283, 59 Am. Rep. 502, 11 N. E. 632.

The opinion in that case was delivered by Peckham, J., who subsequently became an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. The facts in that case are on "all fours" with the facts of the instant case. The plaintiff there had delivered to one Miers a pair of diamond earrings, which the latter said he had a customer to whom he would sell, and for which he gave the following receipt to the plaintiff:

New York, April 12, 1879.

Received from Alfred H. Smith & Company by their representative, B. W. Plumb, a pair of single-stone diamond earrings 10½ carats, of the value of $1,400, on approval to show to my customers, said knobs to be returned to said A. H. Smith & Company on demand.

[Signed]

E. Miers.

Miers sold the earrings to Clews, and the plaintiff, not being paid for them by Miers, sued Clews to be declared the owner of the earrings, and in default of their return for judgment for their value. In the course of the opinion, the court said: "Having thus become possessed of the diamonds, Miers, as has been stated, sold them to defendant, and the question is: Did he get a good title as against the plaintiffs?"

"Taking the undisputed evidence, and reading this receipt in the light thereof, we cannot resist the conclusion that the plaintiffs conferred upon Miers the power to sell these diamonds, and, of course, to give a good title, and therefore the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiffs were dealers in diamonds, and they knew Miers, and that he was engaged in the business of a diamond dealer,—a seller of the stones to whomsoever he chose.

They had on two former occasions intrusted, through their agent, diamonds to Miers, who had sold and accounted for the proceeds of the sale, without any fault being found so far as appears on account of any lack of authority to sell.

"They were informed by Miers on this particular occasion that he had a customer for a pair of diamond earrings, and these diamonds were then intrusted to Miers by the plaintiffs through their agent, Plumb. Upon taking them Miers gave the receipt spoken of. Now, upon these facts, what other meaning can be attached to that receipt than that Miers had power to take these diamonds, show them to his customer, and, if approved of by the customer, sell them to him? The fact that Miers agreed to return them to plaintiffs on demand must be construed with reference to the obvious purpose for which the diamonds were intrusted to him, viz., that of a sale, and, so construed, the plain meaning is that, if not already sold, the plaintiffs had the right to demand a return of the diamonds any time, and Miers would then be bound to return them. The information given to plaintiffs by Miers that he (Miers) had a customer for a pair of diamond ear knobs is susceptible of no other interpretation than that he had a customer who wanted to buy a pair.

"Under such circumstances, what could a dealer in diamonds mean by intrusting them to another dealer who had a customer who wanted to buy them, and who came to this dealer for the purpose of being supplied by him with the diamonds of a kind which his customer wanted to buy? Enlightened by these facts, the interpretation of the receipt signed by Miers is an easy matter. It can mean nothing else than an authority to sell the stones to the customer if they met his approval, and, if not actually sold before demand made, they should be returned to the plaintiffs upon such demand.

"This conclusion as to what was the actual authority given to Miers does not in the least affect the propriety of the decisions cited by the counsel for the respondents and in the opinion of the court at general term, to the effect that one intrusted simply with the possession of personal property, with no power to sell or pass title, cannot give title to the property even to a bona fide purchaser for value. The question here is simply what was the authority with which the man Miers was clothed, and, upon the undisputed evidence in the case, we hold it was an authority to sell."

We have discussed this latter view of the case simply to show that, even if the transaction between plaintiff and Moss be not regarded as a contract of sale, the plaintiff even then could not recover. We base our decision, however, on the settled conviction that the transaction evidences a perfect sale with a condition subsequent reserved to the vendee only, to rescind the sale and return the goods, and that, under such contract, the title to the goods passed to Moss. For this reason the judgment appealed from is "affirmed." The case is before us for a review of that judgment, under an order granting the same, by this court.

An examination of the testimony in the record as to the relations between Moss and Fink, and the circumstances under which the latter acquired (as he declares) ownership of the articles involved in this suit, shows that Moss made to the defendant Fink a straight sale of the pair of solitaire diamond earrings described in the petition as being valued at $502.97 for the sum of $300, and that he paid the price thereof, and the same were delivered to him. That the second pair of solitaire diamond earrings described in plaintiff's petition and valued at the sum of $975 was transferred by Moss to Fink in payment of a debt due by the former to Fink of $962, which debt owed its origin to the following state of facts: Fink had delivered to Moss (who was a maker and repairer of, as well as a vendor of, diamonds) a number of loose stones to be made into a pin. Moss made the pin, but, instead of delivering it to Fink, pledged it to a man named Keil for a loan of $500. Being pressed by Fink to deliver the pin to him, Moss acknowledged that he had pawned it to Keil for the amount stated. Fink called upon Keil and redeemed the pin from the pledge, paying Keil the $500 for which it was pawned. He then demanded payment of the $500 so paid by him from Moss. The latter told him that he had some jewelry pledged to a pawnbroker by the name of Koritzky for a loan of $462; that it was worth $975. He proposed to Fink that he should redeem it from Koritzky, and when so redeemed he (Moss) would give it to him "in payment" of the $500 which had been paid to Keil and the $462 paid to Koritzky.

The proposition was accepted. The amount due Koritzky was paid him, and the earrings under the agreement to Fink were delivered to him through a dation en paiement. The pair at the time of the trial was still in Fink's possession. The jewelry so given in payment was the earrings referred to in Fink's possession.

This court holds, under the state of facts so shown, that title passed to Fink to the first-mentioned pair of earrings, and the judgment of the district court and the court of appeal to that effect should be affirmed.

It holds, however, that the said judgments are erroneous in so far as they recognized and decreed the defendant Fink to be the owner of the second pair of solitaire diamond earrings referred to in plaintiffs' petition, and that the said judgment in that respect (under the recently decided case of William Frantz & Co. v. Winehill, 124 La. 680, 50 So. 650) should be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs as prayed for by them for the recovery of said second pair of solitaire diamond earrings or the value thereof.

For the reasons herein assigned, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the court of appeals herein brought up for review and the judgment of the district court (which the court of appeal, in its said judgment brought up for review, affirmed), in so far as said judgments recognized and decreed the defendant Jacob Fink to be the owner of the said second pair of earrings described in plaintiffs' petition, and rejected the prayer of plaintiffs' petition in respect to the same, be, and the same are hereby, annulled, avoided, and reversed; and it is now recognized, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs, William Frantz & Company, are the owners of the said second pair of solitaire earrings described in plaintiffs' petition and valued at the sum of $975; that said pair of diamond earrings are in the illegal possession of Jacob Fink. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant Jacob Fink do, within ten days from the date of this judgment, deliver the said pair of solitaire diamond earrings to the plaintiffs, William Frantz & Company, and, in default thereof, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that there be judgment in favor of the plaintiffs and against the said Jacob Fink for the sum of $975, with legal interest thereon from judicial demand until paid.

It is further ordered and decreed that the defendant Jacob Fink pay the costs in the District Court, the Court of Appeal, and this court. Except as herein altered, the judgment of the District Court and that of the Court of Appeal is hereby affirmed.

On Rehearing.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Provosty, J., on April 1, 1910, handed down the following additional opinion:

Moss, one of the defendants, was a maker and repairer of jewelry. He had an office on the second floor of a building on one of the principal streets of this city, and also a workshop on the third floor of the same building. What this office consisted of, or what he kept in it, the record does not show. In a small way he bought and sold diamonds. The defendant Fink, in answer to the question, "Q. He didn't have any store?" answered, "He used to carry around a little paper of loose goods all the time; yes, sir." From this, and from the evidence generally in the case, we understand that Moss was more of an artisan—a maker and repairer of jewelry and diamond setter—than merchant; and that he traded only in a small way in jewelry. That he did this, however, was well known among the trade.

The plaintiff firm has a large jewelry establishment in this city. It had had some dealings with Moss in a small way, had sold him "some small things," for which he had duly paid, when the transactions which have given rise to the present controversy took place.

On March 16, 1906, he came into the store of the plaintiff firm, and said he had a customer for a pair of diamond earrings, and asked plaintiff to let him have the goods to show to his customer; and again, on April 4, 1906, he came with another similar request for another pair of diamond earrings; and both times plaintiff complied with his request.

A material point in the case is as to what were the terms and conditions on which the two pairs of earrings were thus put in the possession of Moss. The only witness on that point is the senior member of the plaintiff firm, and his testimony is accepted as true. He says that he fixed a price on the earrings, and let Moss have them on the condition that he should either return them or pay the price; that he did not sell them to him, but fixed the price low enough for him to make a profit in selling them to someone else. On both occasions the witness put this price on a piece of paper, and handed it to Moss, and made a memorandum for himself of what goods he had thus intrusted, and of the price set on them. This price was $502 on the first pair, and $975 on the second.

No time seems to have been fixed within which Moss should return the goods or pay for them, and the evidence does not show what was contemplated in that regard. It does show, however, that plaintiffs made inquiries of Moss, and were told that his customers were still deliberating.

As a matter of fact, he had taken the first pair of earrings on the day after he got them to the pawnbroker's shop of the defendant Fink and sold them to him for $300. This was $202 less than the low price set upon them by plaintiff.

The second pair of earrings he pledged at the pawnbroker's shop of one Koritzky for $465. The date of this pledge is not shown.

In the early part of February the defendant Fink had bought some small loose diamonds of Moss, and had left in his hands 171 small diamonds to be set in a pin or brooch. While the work was in progress, Fink kept an eye on his 171 diamonds. In one place he says that he went to Moss's shop every day; at another place he says that he went once or twice a week. After the pin had been apparently completed, Moss would not give it up, saying there was still something to be done to it. He had already been paid the price agreed on for doing the work, $110. The pin was worth $1,500. Fink had called at Moss's shop on several consecutive days to demand the pin, and not found him in, when, determined to have the pin, he sought him out at his house; and Moss then acknowledged that he had pledged the pin at the shop of one Keil for $500. He, at the same time, said that he owned a pair of diamond earrings worth $975, which he had pledged to Koritzky for $465, and that Fink could have them if he would redeem them and pay the $500 to Keil in redemption of the pin. This Fink agreed to do, and on the same day did do.

On the evening of that day, April 28th, a Saturday, Moss came to plaintiff with a story that two armed men had come to his shop and robbed him of the diamonds. Plaintiff did not believe him and had him arrested, and at once instituted, with the aid of detectives, a search among the pawnbrokers' shops of the city. On the first visit to the shop of the defendant Fink he denied that he had had any dealings with Moss. When Moss saw that his tale of robbery would not hold, he confessed; and Fink also, on the second visit to his shop, acknowledged his transactions with Moss, and offered to restore the goods on being reimbursed the several sums which he had paid out, namely, the $300 to Moss, the $465 to Koritzky, and the $500 to Keil.

Plaintiff then brought this suit against Fink and Moss, demanding in the alternative a return of the goods or payment of the price set upon them.

Moss made no defense. Fink contends that the transactions between Moss and the plaintiff were sales; that Moss became owner of the goods, and could convey a valid title to them; that, at all events, the plaintiff firm is estopped in the premises, because it clothed Moss with the indicia of ownership, thereby enabling him to commit the fraud; and that, whenever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who enables such person to occasion the loss must sustain it.

The question of whether Moss became the owner of the goods or not depends upon what was the agreement of the parties. The parties had a perfect right to make any agreement they chose in that regard. The rights conferred upon Moss by that agreement were: (1) To become owner of the goods on paying the price set upon them; (2) to sell the goods to someone else at a cash price of not less than that set upon them. The right was not conferred upon him to buy the goods on a credit; or, in other words, to become debtor to plaintiff for the price of the goods. Whatever money he received from the person he sold the goods to was to be plaintiff's money; and, if he failed to account for it, he would be criminally responsible. The goods were not sold to him, and the only way in which he could become the owner of them was by paying cash for them. By the terms of the arrangement Moss could not sell the goods on a credit. Either the goods or the money would have to be in his hands, to be delivered to plaintiff.

The goods not having been sold to Moss, he could transfer no title to them. Nemo plus in alium transferre potest quam ipse habet. 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 207; 24 Am. & Eng. & Enc. Law, p. 1163.

The learned counsel for the defendant Fink contend that the transaction was of the kind known at common law as "sale and return," and the court of appeal took that view. We repeat, the nature of a transaction is what the parties agree that it should be; and the distinct agreement in this case was that the goods were not sold, or agreed to be sold, on a credit to Moss, but that the only way he could become the owner of them was by paying cash for them. For the distinction between such an agreement and what is commonly known as "sale and return," see Sturm v. Boker, 37 L. ed. 1099, and note (150 U. S. 323, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 99); B. F. Sturtevant Co. v. Dugan, 106 Md. 587, 68 Atl. 351, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 679.

Before passing to the consideration of how far plaintiff may be estopped, we will note that the law of agency can play no part in this case. Moss had no mandate to sell the goods at less than the price set upon them, and still less had he any mandate to give them in payment of his debts. And Fink did not deal with him as the agent of the plaintiff firm, but as the owner of the goods.

Coming to a consideration of the estoppel, it is a plain proposition that the mere possession of movable property is not such *indiciu*m of ownership as will enable the possessor to convey a good title as against the true owner. If it did, the borrower or hirer of a horse could validly sell it. The owner must have done something more than merely confide the possession of his property to the possessor before the latter can sell it or create a lien upon it. He must have to some extent accredited the title of the possessor,—clothed him with more pronounced *indiciu*m of ownership than mere possession.

This may be done in various ways, and one way would be what the plaintiff firm did in this case, namely, consent that a vendor of jewelry exhibit the jewels as part of his stock of goods, or as belonging to him. "If a wine merchant be left in possession of wine, the fair inference is that it is his own, and a person may be justified in advancing money upon the security of it." Per Bramwell, L. J., in Meggy v. Imperial Discount Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 717.

The decision in Conner v. Hill, 6 La. Ann. 7, is founded upon estoppel, agency, and ratification. From the facts as stated, the grounds of estoppel do not appear; but the writer of the present opinion knows that the flatboats coming down the Mississippi river before the War, loaded with western produce, were for sale, and that usually, if not always, those in charge of them had authority to sell; so that Anderson, who was in charge of the flatboat in that case, had more than mere possession. He had a possession which, according to custom, was accompanied by the power to sell. True, the owner had not consented to his being thus clothed with apparent authority to sell, but his son and agent had done so for him. It was upon this the court must have found the estoppel, in so far as the decision is based on estoppel.

True, Moss was more of an artisan than merchant; but it was in his character of merchant that both plaintiff and Fink dealt with him. Plaintiff consented that he should exhibit the earrings to his customers as belonging to him, and that he should do so in his quality of a trader in jewelry. Fink, knowing him to be a trader in jewels, was justified in buying from him. It follows from this that Fink acquired a good title to the first pair of earrings. Although we must say that the great disparity in price gives some room for suspicion even as to that pair of earrings.

With respect to the second pair, Fink is not in a position to invoke equitable estoppel. For him to be in a position to do so, it would be necessary that he should "not only have been destitute of knowledge of the real facts, . . . but should have also been without convenient or ready means of acquiring such knowledge." 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 738. And he must have been led to change his position for the worse. 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 722. "Notice is to be distinguished from knowledge, and, if the buyer has notice of facts which would put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry which would have resulted in the ascertainment of the adverse interest sought to be enforced against him, he will be deemed to have taken with notice, and cannot assert the rights of a bona fide purchaser." 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 1174, 1175.

In so far as the earrings were taken in reimbursement of the $500 which Fink had to pay to Keil for redeeming his pin, his position was not changed for the worse, since that amount would have had to be paid to Keil even if Moss had never had possession of the earrings, and since it is not pretended that he was deprived of any recourse which he would otherwise have had against Moss. As to the circumstances under which one who has received property in payment of an antecedent debt may be considered to have parted with value, see 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 1171, 1173.

By the time Fink came to deal with Moss for this second pair of earrings, Moss had become utterly discredited. He was a confessed embezzler. He was no longer a merchant or trader having valuable goods for sale, but was a diamond setter who had pledged the goods of his employer and stood under the necessity of confessing his crime because of his inability to redeem the pledge. He was not a merchant offering to sell goods out of his stock, but at best an ex-merchant who was proposing to the person whose property he had embezzled that the latter should rescue from the pawnbroker's shop a certain piece of property and pay himself out of the margin between value of the thing and the amount for which it stood pledged. Fink testifies that he had lost confidence in Moss and would not trust him out of his sight with the $465 for redeeming the earrings from Koritzky. The fact itself, well known to Fink, that Moss was a diamond setter to whom valuable jewelry was likely to be intrusted by third persons, was in itself sufficient to put Fink upon inquiry. We cannot help thinking that Fink was a willing victim, and that, if it had not been for the chance of getting back his $500, he would have dealt with Moss with a good deal less of confidence.

As to this $465, we put our decision distinctly on the fact that the earrings were not acquired from a merchant having them for sale to the public generally, but were redeemed from a pawnbroker's shop at the request of an embezzler as a means of settlement for the embezzlement.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that our former decree be reinstated and made the judgment of this court.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

MRS. L. APPLING, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF ARKANSAS.

(— Ark. —, 128 S. W. 866.)

Search warrant — necessity of affidavit.

1. A warrant to search for liquors alleged to be illegally kept for sale, issued without a supporting affidavit, is not so far void as to justify resistance of its execution.

Appeal — resisting warrant — theory of trial.

2. A conviction for resisting the execution of a warrant will not be reversed because of absence of direct evidence to show that the place where the attempt at execution was made was within the jurisdiction of the officers issuing and attempting to execute it, if all the parties take it for granted at the trial that it was so.

Obstructing officer — refusing entrance to house.

3. Standing on the threshold of a house and refusing to permit an officer to enter to execute a search warrant, without further overt act, is sufficient to support a conviction of obstructing the officer in the execution of process.

(Wood and Hart, JJ., dissent.)

Note. — Search warrant without an affidavit or complaint.

By the Constitution of the United States, and by the Constitutions and statutes of most of the states, it is provided that no search warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized. But few cases have been found in which, as in APPLING v. STATE, there was a total lack of an oath or affidavit, the cases generally turning on the sufficiency of the preliminary oath or affidavit.

In Sandford v. Nichols, 13 Mass. 286, 7 Am. Dec. 151, where revenue officers were sued in trespass for breaking in and entering a dwelling house, and they sought to justify by alleging that they acted under authority of a search warrant, it was held that they could offer in evidence a search warrant which recited that a complaint had been made under oath, without showing any complaint in writing under oath as a foundation for the warrant. See quotation from this case in APPLING v. STATE.

But in State v. Wimbush, 9 S. C. 309, under a constitutional provision that "all warrants shall be supported by oath or affirmation, . . . and no warrant shall be issued but in the cases and with the formalities prescribed by the laws," and a statutory provision that "all proceedings before trial justices in criminal cases shall be commenced on information under oath, plainly APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sebastian County affirming a justice's judgment convicting her of obstructing an officer in the service of process. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. T. Wetherby for appellant.

Mr. Hal L. Norwood, Attorney General, and William H. Rector for the State.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was prosecuted before a justice of the peace of Sebastian county on information filed by the deputy prosecuting attorney for the offense of obstructing or resisting an officer in the service of process. She was convicted and appealed to the circuit court, where she was tried and again convicted, her punishment being fixed at a fine of $50, which is the minimum prescribed by the statute.

The form of the writ which the officer was executing when resisted is not set forth in the bill of exceptions, but the witnesses testified, without objection, that it was a writ issued by the mayor of the incorporated town of Hartford, Arkansas, to the marshal, directing him to search the house of Lem Appling, appellant's husband, for intoxicating liquors, and to seize the liquors. The witnesses did not testify very clearly about the form of the writ, but speak of it as a search warrant or a seizure warrant; but it is fairly inferable from the testimony that it was an order issued by the mayor directing the officer to search the house for liquor, and to seize the liquor when found. No question was raised on this point, but it is insisted that, as the evidence shows that the writ was issued without an affidavit being filed, the writ was therefore void, and no offense was committed in resisting or obstructing the officer in serving it.

This question has given us no little concern, but, after careful consideration, we have reached the conclusion that, in the absence of an affidavit, a writ of the kind, regular on its face, is sufficient to protect the officer to whom it is directed, and an individual cannot bid defiance to the writ and obstruct its execution without subjecting himself to criminal prosecution under the statute. In reaching this conclusion, we are greatly aided by a very satisfactory opinion of the supreme court of New Hampshire. State v. Weed, 21 N. H. 262, 53 Am. Dec. 188. The authorities are fully collected in that opinion, and the subject is exhaustively treated. The court in that case said: "The general principle, however, we hold to be quite clear, that where the process or warrant is regular and legal in its frame, bearing upon its face all the legal requisites to make it perfect in form, and, so far as can be discovered from its inspection, in substance also, and it appears to have been issued by a court or magistrate having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the person of the respondent, the officer is to be protected in the service, notwithstanding any error or irregularity in the previous issuing of the same, or any imposition practised upon the court in obtaining it; and that the party resisting the officer is liable,"—citing the following cases: Savacool v. Boughton, 5 Wend. 170, 21 Am. Dec. 181; Rogers v. Mulliner, 6 Wend. 597, 22 Am. Dec. 546; Horton v. Hendershot, 1 Hill, 118; Fox v. Wood, 1 Rawle, 143; Jones v. Hughes, 5 Serg. & R. 229, 9 Am. Dec. 364; Paul v. Vankirk, 6 Binn. 123; Sturbridge v. Winslow, 21 Pick. 83; Harmon v. Gould, Wright (Ohio) 709; Brother v. Cannon, 2 Ill. 200; Robinson v. Harlan, 2 Ill. 237; State v. Curtis, 2 N. C. (1 Hayw.) 471; Foster v. Gault, 2 McMull. L. 335.

In Sandford v. Nichols, 13 Mass. 286, 7 Am. Dec. 151, Chief Justice Parker, of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, said: "We think that the defendants could have justified the acts complained of by showing a regular warrant from a magistrate having jurisdiction over the subject, without showing that it was founded upon a complaint under oath. It will not do to require of executive officers, before they shall be held to obey precepts directed to them, that they shall have evidence of the regularity of the proceedings of the tribunal which commands the duty. Such a principle would put a stop to the execution of and substantially setting forth the offense charged, upon which, and only which, shall a warrant of arrest issue,"—it was held that a search warrant issued upon a statement of facts signed, but not sworn to, is null and void; and that it is not unlawful to resist an officer attempting to execute said warrant, even though the warrant erroneously recited that complaint had been made upon oath.

In view, however, of the legal principle that a ministerial officer acting under process fair upon its face, issuing from a tribunal or person having judicial powers, with apparent jurisdiction to issue such process, is justified in obeying it against all irregularities and illegalities except his own, it is a little difficult to see how this decision can be sustained. For if an officer is justified in executing the writ, and the defendant is justified in resisting him, an anomalous situation arises certain to give rise to breaches of the peace. The rule in APPLING v. STATE appears to be sound. The defendant should submit, and seek his remedy against the justice or person procuring the writ.

legal process, as officers so situated would be necessarily obliged to judge for themselves, and would often judge wrong as to the lawfulness of the authority under which they are required to act. It is a general and known principle that executive officers, obliged by law to serve legal writs and processes, are protected in the rightful discharge of their duty, if those precepts are sufficient in point of form, and issue from a court or magistrate having jurisdiction of the subject-matter." In People v. Warren, 5 Hill, 440, it was held that "a ministerial officer is protected in the execution of process regular and legal upon its face, though he has knowledge of facts rendering it void for want of jurisdiction."

It is also insisted that the judgment should be reversed because the evidence fails to show that the officer, when resisted, was serving process within the corporate limits of the town of Hartford; neither the mayor who issued the writ nor the marshal who executed it having jurisdiction beyond those limits. It is true that nowhere in the testimony is it directly stated by a witness that the house of Lem Appling was situated in the town. The witnesses all relate the circumstances of the marshal and posse going to Appling's house to search for and seize contraband liquors. They all lived at Hartford, and speak of going "around to Appling's house," or "down to Appling's house," to serve the writ. The marshal testified in the case, and told about standing on the street corner near a certain brick building talking to the mayor, when a man came along and told them that a dray load of liquor was then being unloaded "down to Appling's house," whereupon the mayor went upstairs and issued the warrant, and he (witness) summoned two others, a deputy sheriff and a constable, to go with him, and they "went down to Appling's residence" to search for the liquor. The evidence showed that appellant's acts of obstructing the officers occurred at Appling's residence. Another witness testified as to the occurrence at Appling's house, and spoke of "coming along the street" when he heard what Mrs. Appling said to the officers. Numerous other witnesses introduced by each party testified about living in Hartford, and being present when the officers raided Appling's house. Appellant testified herself about what occurred there at the house, but said nothing about the situation of the premises. She claimed that she did not resist the officers, but that, on the contrary, she told them where the liquor could be found in the house. It seems to have been taken for granted by all the parties that the Appling house was in the town, though the prosecuting attorney took pains to show directly by witnesses that the town of Hartford was in the Greenwood district of Sebastian county. No instructions were asked on that point. We think the judgment should not be reversed on this ground. The authorities seem to agree that a presumption should be indulged as to the regularity and validity of official acts. Wharton, Crim. Ev. §§ 833, 835; Putman v. State, 49 Ark. 449, 5 S. W. 715; State v. Freeman, 8 Iowa, 428, 74 Am. Dec. 317.

This presumption is not to be extended so as to cover substantive, independent facts essential to establish an issue. "The true principle intended to be asserted by this rule seems to be," says Mr. Best in his work on Evidence, § 300, "that there is a general disposition in courts of justice to uphold judicial and other acts rather than to render them inoperative; and with this view, where there is general evidence of acts having been legally and regularly done, to dispense with proof of circumstances, strictly speaking, essential to the validity of those acts, and by which they were probably accompanied in most instances, although in others the assumption may rest on grounds of public policy." Now, when the rule stated by Mr. Best is applied to the facts proved in this case, we think the evidence is sufficient. The witnesses testified in general terms as to the form and substance of the writ, and the writ itself was not introduced, no objection being made to proving it in this way. It must be taken as established that the writ was regular in form, and commanded the officers to search for liquors in Appling's house in the town of Hartford, and to seize the same when found. The witnesses, including appellant herself, testified about the marshal serving the writ in the regular way, the only dispute being whether appellant resisted its execution. No violence is done to the presumption of innocence in favor of the accused, by holding that, under these circumstances, the jury were warranted in finding that the officer was not attempting to serve a warrant beyond the limits of his territorial jurisdiction. The only evidence offered by appellant was to the effect that she did not obstruct the execution of the writ, but, on the contrary, yielded to it. There is a sharp conflict as to whether or not appellant obstructed the officers in executing the writ, and there is also a sharp conflict as to whether the alleged acts of resistance on the part of appellant occurred before or after the liquor was found by the officers and seized. The court submitted the question to the jury, and instructed them to find appellant not guilty of the charge if they believed from the evidence "that the search had been completed at the time the altercation happened between the officers and defendant." We conclude that there was evidence sufficient to warrant a finding that while the officers were executing the writ, appellant resisted them and obstructed their efforts to serve it. One of the officers testified that when the marshal informed her of the writ and told her he had come to seize the liquors, she said to them that they could not go in the house, and that she swore at them, called them vile names, and threatened to get a gun and kill all of them. Afterwards, while the marshal had gone to get a dray to haul off the liquors, she insisted on her son being allowed to go in the house, and assaulted one of the officers who attempted to prevent the boy from entering the house.

Error of the court is assigned in refusing to give the following instruction at appellant's request: "(4) The mere stating by defendant that the officers could not search the house, unaccompanied by any overt act or threat by her, would not be a violation of the law, and, if you should find that this was all that she did, you will acquit." This instruction is incorrect, and was properly refused. It would not do to hold that one who stands in the way and refuses to permit an officer to execute process is guiltless of obstructing the officer. Such refusal is of itself an obstruction, for the officer may desist in order to avoid violence or bloodshed, and the service of process would be thus hindered. It is the purpose of the statute to prevent this. The statute is broad, and covers any resistance or obstruction to an officer in the execution of process. If appellant stood on the threshold of the house and refused to permit the officer to enter for the purpose of executing the writ, her attitude was of itself an obstruction and resistance, and no further overt act was necessary to complete the offense. Williams v. State, 70 Ark. 393, 68 S. W. 241.

We are of the opinion that there is no error in the record. So the judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

ED EDWARDS, Appt.,
v.

M. R. KEVIL.

(133 Ky. 392, 118 S. W. 273.)

Slander — justification — admission.

1. Admission of speaking the substance of the words charged, or of so much of them as would sustain an action for slander, is 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

sufficient to entitle one accused of slander to justify on the ground of privilege.

Same — privilege — detection of crime.

2. A confidential communication by one whose property has been burned, to a fellow sufferer, of the fact that he had been informed of another's intention to burn the property, for the purpose of procuring his aid in ascertaining the author of the fire, is privileged.

Evidence — threats — contradiction — slander.

3. One suing for slander in being charged by another with setting fire to his building cannot be permitted to testify that he never made threats to burn the building, for the purpose of contradicting witnesses who have testified that they communicated to defendant, before the fire, the fact that they had heard plaintiff make such threats.

Note. — Libel and slander: necessity that the plea of justification or privilege shall correspond to the words imputed to the defendant by the complaint.

A plea of privilege or justification in an action for a libel or slander must justify the very words or substance of those charged in the declaration or complaint, in the sense in which the innuendos express it. Hunt v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Ala.) 51 So. 1000; Jones v. Townsend, 21 Fla. 431, 58 Am. Rep. 676; Rice v. Aleshire, 72 Ill. App. 455; Commercial News Co. v. Beard, 116 Ill. App. 501; *Morse v. APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Caldwell County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for slander. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. H. James and Ward Headley for appellant.

Messrs. P. H. Darby, John L. Grayot, and R. W. Lisanby for appellee.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action in slander was instituted by the appellant, who was plaintiff below, against the appellee, defendant below. The actionable words, which were charged to have been spoken during a fire that destroyed a building owned by appellee, are these: "I reckon Ed Edwards is satisfied now, he burned this out. I received word sometime ago that he intended to burn them." When asked what he meant by this language, he replied: "Well, I heard that he (Edwards) was going to burn them."

In the first paragraph of his answer, the appellee denied speaking the words charged; and, in the second paragraph, set up that the appellant, previous to the fire, had threatened frequently to burn the building, and during the fire he (appellee), in a conversation with G. C. Dollar, the owner of a building that was injured by the fire, communicated to Dollar in confidence, and for the purpose of aiding him and securing his assistance and co-operation in investigating the origin of the fire, the information he had received concerning the threats of appellant, and, in the course of the conversation with Dollar, said to him without malice, and for the sole purpose of procuring his aid in ascertaining the author of the fire, "I reckon Ed Edwards is satisfied now my house is burned. I was notified he intended to burn it. I couldn't think he was mean enough to do it, but I took additional insurance." It will thus be observed that appellee, while admitting he spoke substantially the language charged, claimed that it was under the circumstances a privileged communication. The point is made, however, that appellee, if he desired to justify or to claim that the words were spoken under circumstances that amounted to a privilege, must admit speaking the identical words charged in the petition.

The rule is that, when the defendant, in an action for slander, justifies, or when he pleads that the words spoken were a privileged communication, he must admit that he spoke the words charged, or words of similar import that would in themselves be actionable. It is not necessary that the defendant should admit speaking the precise words charged in the petition. It will be

456, that "there is no better settled point in slander than this, the plea must justify the same words contained in the declaration, or, at least, so many of them as are actionable. It is not enough to justify the sentiment contained in the words."

While the justification must be as broad as the charge and of the precise charge of the complaint, it need not be in the exact form thereof, although it must correspond in essence and substance. Wallace v. Homestead Co. 117 Iowa, 348, 90 N. W. 835.

It was held in Bannon v. Moran, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 989, that the admission of speaking the words of the plaintiff that he "admitted that he had been compelled to leave Liverpool because he had been suspected of being an English spy; that it looked suspicious that Mr. Power should be such a friend to that kind of a man," was an admission of substantially the same language as that charged in the petition, which was that the plaintiff "was driven out of Liverpool because it was discovered that he was an English spy. It certainly looks suspicious that Mr. Power should be such a friend of an English spy."

Where a complaint charges a libel accusing plaintiff of adultery, a plea is bad which attempts to justify the immaterial matter alleged, but not the specific charge. Morse v. Press Pub. Co. 49 App. Div. 375, 63 N. Y. Supp. 423.

So, a plea of justification is bad which states the defendant's own version of what he had said, which materially differed from that set out in the complaint. Rassam v. Budge [1893] 1 Q. B. 571.

And such a plea is bad which justifies the words; that "counsel commented with cutting severity" upon the plaintiff's testimony where those charged were that the "plaintiff's testimony as a witness, being unsupported by any other witness, failed to have any effect on the jury, and that counsel commented with cutting severity" thereon. Roberts v. Brown, 10 Bing. 519.

So, a plea, justifying different words than those charged in the complaint is bad. Starr v. Harrington Smith (Ind.) 360.

And a plea is bad which justifies the charge of theft of a kettle and waistcoat pattern, where the words actually charged were the theft of a pot and waiter or kettle. Eastland v. Caldwell, 2 Bibb, 21.

So, a plea is bad which admits the speaking the words that the plaintiff "allowed whoring to be carried on in his home night after night in succession, without taking measures to stop it," where those charged in the complaint were the "keeping of a whore house." Eaton v. White, 2 Pinney (Wis.) 42.

And where the slander charged was that the defendant stated that the plaintiff "said the blood of Christ had nothing to do with our salvation, more than the blood of a hog," a plea of justification is bad sufficient if he admits the substance of the words, or so much of them as would sustain an action for slander. Thus, in Shipp v. Patten, 123 Ky. 65, 93 S. W. 1033, the words upon which the action was based were these: "Miss Nellie, when she was employed as a clerk in my store, dishonestly took away goods from the store that did not belong to her. I found in her grip a lot of goods that she had dishonestly taken from my store and put in the grip, and I accused her of dishonestly taking these goods, and she broke down and cried and begged me not to discharge her, because it would disgrace her, and I kept her a few days longer in the store, and then discharged her. I would say this to anybody, because I can prove it, and I wouldn't hesitate to go into her own family and say just what I have said to you." The defendant in that case filed an answer, in which, after admitting that he spoke the words as charged, except that he did not use the word "dishonestly," denied that he spoke them maliciously, and further averred that they were spoken under circumstances that made them a privileged communication. The lower court required the defendant, before permitting him to rely on the defense that the words were privileged, to admit speaking the identical words charged in the petition. In criticizing this ruling of the lower court, this court said: "To say that a defendant in a slander suit must admit all the words charged, before he is allowed to plead a qualified privilege, places the defendant in a dilemma; if he denies the speaking of the words, the plaintiff will often prove the substance of them and recover. If he is compelled to admit all the words to plead the privilege, then often he will admit that which is not true in fact, and enough to show that he was actuated by malice, which will defeat him. The plea of the appellant in this case was in its nature a plea of confession and avoidance, and, while denying the use of the word 'dishonestly,' confessed enough to give 'color' to appellee's petition,—that is, left uncontroverted enough to give her a cause of action." Adhering to the ruling of the court in the Shipp Case, which we believe to be correct, it follows that in an action for slander, when the defendant pleads that the words spoken were privileged, he may deny that they were spoken maliciously, and set out the exact language used by him, although it may not be identical with that charged in the petition; but it must be so nearly similar to it, and admit enough of the language charged, to maintain an action. Applying this principle to the case before us, it is manifest that the words admitted by appellee to have been spoken were which alleges that the plaintiff said there was no more virtue in Christ's blood than in that of man or any other creature. Skinner v. Grant, supra.

So, where the slander alleged was a positive charge of bigamy, a plea of justification is bad which admits the speaking of conditional words that "if what D. has told me is true [the plaintiff] is not a fit man to belong to [a secret society]. He tells me [that the plaintiff] has a wife and children back in W. and you know he has a wife and children here." Bleitz v. Carton, 49 Wash. 545, 95 Pac. 1099.

And a plea is bad which admits the speaking of the words, "Thou hast stolen part of the velvet which I delivered to you," where the words charged were, "Thou hast played the thief with me, and hast stolen my cloth and half a yard of velvet." Johns v. Gittings, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 239.

So, where the words charged were that the plaintiff, a public official, "is short $6,000 in his accounts, and if he had his just dues he would be behind the bars," and also that the defendant said to the plaintiff's son that "his dad is short $6,000 in his accounts and ought to be behind the bars," a plea is bad which denies saying that the plaintiff was short in his accounts, but admits saying "that he ought to be behind the bars;" as the slander charged, being entire, the plea of justification must be coextensive with, and as broad as, that charged. Stock v. Keele, supra.

And a plea of justification is bad which admits saying of the plaintiff that "such things traitors do," where those charged were "thou art a traitor." Billingham v. Mynors, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 153.

So, where the libelous words alleged were that the plaintiff had appropriated to himself a play called "Flirtation," and produced it as his own composition under the title "Pique," such a plea is bad which alleges the truth thereof, and that the play therein referred to as "Flirtation" was entitled "Mock Marriage." Daly v. Byrne, 1 Abb. N. C. 150.

The rule that a plea of justification shall be as broad as the charge does not require that it shall embrace every slanderous charge stated in the complaint, where several distinct libels or slander are stated, as there may be a justification as to one and other pleas to the remainder. Lanpher v. Clark, 149 N. Y. 472, 44 N. E. 182; Hollingsworth v. Spectator Co. 53 App. Div. 291, 65 N. Y. Supp. 812, followed in 53 App. Div. 627, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1133; Baldwin v. Genung, supra; Nunnally v. Mail & Exp. Co. 113 App. Div. 831, 99 N. Y. Supp. 647; Lapetina v. Santangelo, 124 App. Div. 519, 108 N. Y. Supp. 975; Merrey v. Guardian Printing & Pub. Co. supra; Clarkson v. Lawson, 6 Bing. 587.

actionable, and, although not the identical words charged, they were in substance and effect the same, and so the court did not err in holding the answer to be good.

Nor is there any doubt that, if the words were spoken under the circumstances described by appellee in his answer and evidence, they were privileged in the sense that appellee had the right to show the facts surrounding their publication as an excuse or justification for the utterance. A person whose property is destroyed by fire may in a confidential way confide to his neighbors and friends whom he suspects as the incendiary, if his suspicions are based upon reasonable information or grounds, and his declarations are made in good faith. Faris v. Starke, 9 Dana, 128, 33 Am. Dec. 536; Grimes v. Coyle, 6 B. Mon. 301; Harper v. Harper, 10 Bush, 447; Campbell v. Bannister, 79 Ky. 205; Nix v. Caldwell, 81 Ky. 293, 50 Am. Rep. 163; Townshend, Slander & Libel, p. 440. There was sharp conflict in the evidence as to the circumstances under which the words were spoken. According to the evidence for appellant, they were not spoken confidentially, or in good faith, or in an effort in advising or consulting with friends concerning the origin of the fire. On the other hand, the appellee testified that, in confiding his suspicions to a fellow sufferer at the fire, he believed that the information previously conveyed to him that appellant was the incendiary, was true, and used the language imputed to him in an effort to get advice and assistance from his friend, whose property was also injured. It is however, sufficient to say in respect to this conflict in the evidence, that it was a matter for the jury, under proper instructions, to decide which story they would accept as true. If the version of appellant and his witnesses was believed by the jury, the communication complained of was not a privileged one; but the jury evidently accepted appellee's account of it as correct.

On the trial of the case the appellee introduced several witnesses, who testified that previous to the fire they heard appellant make remarks that indicated an intention or desire upon his part to burn or have burned the building of appellee, and that previous to the fire they communicated to appellee these threats. After this evidence was introduced, the appellant offered to show by his own testimony that he had not made any of the statements attributed to him by the witnesses; but the trial judge refused to permit him to deny that he had made these statements, putting his ruling upon the ground that it was immaterial, so far as the question of privilege was concerned, whether he in fact made the statements or not, if the statements previous 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to the fire had been communicated to appellee as coming from him. Of this ruling serious complaint is made. In our opinion the decision of the trial court upon this point was correct. For the purposes of appellee's defense, it was not material whether or not appellant used the language attributed to him by the informants of appellee. If the appellee in good faith believed what was communicated to him, and it was such as a man of reasonable prudence would believe, he had the right to act upon the assumption that it was true, although as a matter of fact it may have been false. Shipp v. Com. 124 Ky. 643, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 335, 99 S. W. 945. If appellant had been permitted to deny the remarks, the effect would be to inject into the case a question of veracity that threw no light upon the issues being tried. Under circumstances like those developed in this case, when information, such as a reasonably prudent man would believe, is communicated to him, he is not required, before acting upon it in good faith in a natural and reasonable way, to investigate its truthfulness.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

HANS F. VOLQUARSEN

v.

IOWA TELEPHONE COMPANY.

(— Iowa, —, 126 N. W. 928.)

Evidence — burden of proof — negligence of telephone company.

1. A telephone company is bound to negative only the negligence charged against it, where specific acts of negligence are charged in the complaint for failure promptly to make a connection for a customer, although

Note. — Liability of telephone company for failure to make connections for subscriber.

The case of Lebanon, L. & L. Teleph. Co. v. Lanham Lumber Co. 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 115, is on all fours with that of VOLQUARSEN v. IOWA TELEPH. Co., to which is appended a note upon the general question of liability of a telephone company for failure to make connections for a subscriber.

As to the right of withdrawing telephone service because of the abuse of the privilege by subscribers, see the note to Huffman v. Marcy Mut. Teleph. Co. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1010.

Attention is called to Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Soloman (Tex. Civ. App.) 117 S. W. 214, which holds that, as the right to maintain a statutory action for wrongful the statute provides that in case of delay it has the burden of proof that such delay was not due to negligence on its part.

Proximate cause — burning of property — neglect to make telephone connection.

2. Failure of a telephone company for several minutes to connect a subscriber with the fire department is not the proximate cause of the destruction of his property, where the fire was under way when he awakened from sleep, and the department responded to a summons from a neighbor, so that there was not much actual delay in reaching the fire, and there is nothing to show that prompt service would have saved the property.

(June 16, 1910.)

CROSS APPEALS from an order of the District Court for Scott County granting a new trial notwithstanding a verdict for defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the destruction of plaintiff's property by fire, alleged to have been caused by the failure of defendant's servant promptly to connect plaintiff by telephone with the fire department; plaintiff appealing from so much of the order as overruled his motion for new trial as to ten grounds, and defendant appealing from so much as granted a new trial upon one ground. Affirmed on plaintiff's appeal. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

death depends upon the right of the decedent to have recovered damages had death not intervened, it follows that a husband, who was a telephone subscriber, and his children, could not recover damages for the breach of a general contract to provide telephone services, which resulted in delay in procuring a physician, who was also a telephone subscriber of defendant company, to attend the subscriber's wife in childbirth. The court said: "The act complained of is the negligent failure to give telephone service under a general contract to do so. To have entitled the deceased to maintain an action for the negligence in the performance of the duty founded on a contract which raised the duty, no personal injury to the person or injury to her property being shown, it must appear that the contract was made by her, or was made to inure in fact to her benefit.

. . . The measure of her recovery must, we think, be determined by the general rule of law which applies to all cases of breach of contract, which rule is thus expressed in the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Edmondson, 91 Tex. 209, 42 S. W. 549: 'When two parties have made a contract, which one of them has broken, the damages which the other ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered as arising naturally—that is, according to the usual course

Messrs. Cook & Dodge and Guernsey, Parker, & Miller for plaintiff.

Mr. Henry Thuenen, Jr., for defendant:

Delay in responding to a call of a subscriber to a telephone presumes negligence on the part of the telephone company.

Turner v. Hawkeye Teleg. Co. 41 Iowa, 458, 20 Am. Rep. 605.

Where damages are sustained by a subscriber to a telephone company, by reason of the negligence of the telephone company in responding to a call of the subscriber, the company will be liable therefor.

Mentzer v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 93 Iowa, 752, 28 L.R.A. 72, 57 Am. St. Rep. 294, 62 N. W. 1.

When the property of a subscriber to a telephone is burning, and the telephone company negligently fails to answer his call within a reasonable time, the damages which he sustains in excess of what he would have sustained are consequential upon the neglect or negligence of the telephone company.

Ibid.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant owns and operates the telephone system in Davenport. The plaintiff was a subscriber and patron. He conducted a wooden shoe factory on the lots where his residence was located. Shortly after 1:30 o'clock in the morning of August 2, 1905, his wife heard a crackling of things—from such breach of the contract itself, or as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it.' Tested by this rule, we think, the damages in the circumstances are too remote, and are not such as both parties would reasonably have understood and contemplated as likely to result from the breach of the contract or the negligence of the company. If there had been a specific contract with the telephone company by which it had agreed to transmit, or to furnish facilities for transmitting, this particular message to the physician, or if the object and purpose of the deceased in having the physician summoned over the telephone, to immediately attend her, was previously made known in proper time to appellant, under the general contract of telephone service, then we may have found some analogy between this case and the various telegraph cases where telegraph companies have been held responsible for such damages for failure to promptly transmit and deliver the message; but here the unusual situation and condition of the deceased was not known to the appellant, and it had no notice or previous notice of the importance or urgency of a communication to a physician and his summons to come at the time to attend her."

sound, and, upon looking out, noticed a fire in the factory. She wakened plaintiff, who immediately went to the telephone, and took down the receiver for the purpose of giving a fire alarm. Ordinarily, removing the receiver signals on the switch board at the central office to the employees, who then connect the line with telephone of the person with whom communication is desired. No one responded, though he called for "central" and "worked" the receiver for, as he testified, nine or ten minutes. He then handed the receiver to his wife, who got into communication with the central office in one or two minutes. Upon turning the receiver over to his wife, plaintiff went to the factory, and from there started to the fire department, which had a station about $4\frac{1}{2}$ blocks from his house, and met the hose cart on the way. A neighbor had advised the department of the fire, and the men, with apparatus, were at the scene within a minute and a half thereafter. The petition alleged that "because of the negligence of defendant company's agents in charge of said company's switch board, or because of defendant company's failure to keep sufficient or competent persons in charge of said switch board, plaintiff was unable to obtain a response from the central office of defendant company," and by reason thereof the entire factory was destroyed, when, but for said negligence, he would have been able to have given the alarm to the fire department promptly, and much of his factory building and all of the machinery would have been saved. The court submitted the issues of negligence above mentioned to the jury, but ruled, in rejecting evidence and in refusing instructions, that the damages to the building and machinery were not the proximate result thereof. The jury returned a verdict for defendant, but a new trial was granted on the ground that the court had not submitted to the jury whether "defendant was negligent in the matter of keeping its appliances for communicating with central in reasonable repair."

This ruling was based on statutes providing, in effect, that, upon proof of unreasonable delay in the transmission of a message, the burden is upon a telephone company to overcome the inference of negligence to be drawn therefrom. These statutes (Code) may be set out:

"Sec. 2163. The proprietor of a telegraph or telephone line is liable for all mistakes in transmitting or receiving messages made by any person in his employment, or for any unreasonable delay in their transmission or delivery, and for all damages resulting from failure to perform the foregoing or any other duty required by law, the provisions of any contract to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Sec. 2164. In any action against any telegraph or telephone company for damages caused by erroneous transmission of a message, or by unreasonable delay in delivery of a message, negligence on the part of the telegraph or telephone company shall be presumed upon proof of erroneous transmission or of unreasonable delay in delivery, and the burden of proof that such error or delay was not due to negligence upon its part shall rest upon such company; but no action for the recovery of such damages shall be maintained unless a claim therefor is presented in writing to such company, officer or agent thereof, within sixty days from time cause of action accrues."

Of course, the method of communication over a telephone differs from that by telegraph. Ordinarily in the former the company merely puts the sender in connection by wire with the sendee, and the message is transmitted by word of mouth. The delay in the transmission or delivery contemplated by the statute is that of not furnishing the proper connection within a reasonable time, as well as in otherwise transmitting messages, so that upon a showing of an unreasonable delay by plaintiff it devolved upon defendant to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that such delay was not due to negligence on its part. Had the petition merely alleged unreasonable delay, without describing the particular acts of negligence occasioning it, or have alleged negligence generally, the ruling of the court might have been upheld. Engle v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 661, 37 N. W. 6, 42 N. W. 512. Ordinarily the defendant is in court to answer the matters averred in the petition only. Hcald v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 129 Iowa, 326, 105 N. W. 588; Edgerly v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 43 Iowa, 587; Wirstlin v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 124 Iowa, 170, 99 N. W. 697. And, if the instructions present the theory of the case as stated in the petition, the plaintiff has no cause of complaint. Maloney v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 95 Iowa, 255, 63 N. W. 690; Denton v. Chicago R. I. & P. R. Co. 52 Iowa, 161, 35 Am. Rep. 263, 2 N. W. 1093; Briscoe v. Reynolds, 51 Iowa, 673, 2 N. W. 529. Though it may not have been necessary to allege in the petition wherein defendant was negligent, plaintiff did so, and this limited the inquiry as to the grounds of negligence thus charged. The plaintiff, having asserted the particular acts or omissions which occasioned the unreasonable delay, ought not to be permitted to take exception because of defendant's omission to prove freedom from negligence in other respects. And this is the rule long since adopted by this court in cases arising under similar statutes. Section 2056 of the Code, as construed, declares a railroad company liable prima facie "for all damages sustained by any person on account of loss or of injury to his property occasioned by the operation of such railroad;" the burden being on the company to exonerate itself from the charge of negligence on proof of damages sustained in the manner mentioned, and this court held in Engle v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra, that it is sufficient to allege the facts as indicated in the statute without specifying the respects wherein the company has been negligent in setting out the fire. But, when this is done, we have discovered no case holding that plaintiff may rely on other grounds of negligence than those alleged, or that more is exacted from the defendant to entitle it to a verdict than a showing of freedom of negligence in the respects charged in the petition. In other words, the plaintiff cannot base his claim on one kind of negligence and recover on another, and the following decisions expressly so decide: Carter v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 287, 21 N. W. 607; Miller v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 66 Iowa, 364, 23 N. W. 756; Babcock v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 72 Iowa, 197, 28 N. W. 644, 33 N. W. 628. The allegations of the petition restrict the field of inquiry to the grounds of negligence stated therein, and all really decided in Engle v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra, was that, even though alleged in the petition, the burden was on defendant to show itself free from negligence in the respects charged. The reference to the grounds as thus specified in that case as "redundant" was not accurate, but, as none of the cases last cited were mentioned, an intention to overrule them ought not to be inferred, especially when in harmony with elementary rules of pleading. It follows that, even though enough was shown to cast the burden of proving itself free from negligence upon defendant, it was not required to do more than refute the grounds specified in the petition, and for this reason the court erred in granting a new trial.

2. In ruling on the admissibility of evidence and in the refusal of instructions requested, the court held the damages to the building and machinery therein too remote, and for this reason that only nominal damages could be recovered. On this ground, also, plaintiff asked a new trial, but this was denied, and he has appealed from the ruling. As seen, the liability of a telephone company is defined by statute, but the damages recoverable must be the proximate result of the unreasonable delay proven. The duty alleged to have been violated was that to the subscriber as such, and not owing to any special undertaking to maintain a fire-alarm system in the city. Conceding the delay of the employees at the central office to furnish connection promptly with the fire department of hose company No. 6 to have been unreasonable, and the negligence to be inferred therefrom under the statute unexplained, was such delay the proximate cause of the loss? If so, a new trial was rightly granted even though on another ground. If not, the verdict should have stood and judgment have been entered thereon. The fire was the primary cause of the loss. The defendant did not start it, or have aught to do with its origin. The charge against it is that the negligence intervened as the efficient cause, in the omission to do that which would have resulted in the extinction of the fire. Of course, if the failure to put out the fire was the direct and natural consequence of the unreasonable delay in making the connection, then there could be no doubt as to defendant's liability. But several links in the chain of sequences are involved in doubt and speculation. The fire was burning not only before plaintiff reached the receiver, but before he was awakened by his wife, who had heard the crackling of flames. Conceding that he was at the telephone nine or ten minutes, though minutes seem hours at such times, and that connection was made at the central office within two minutes thereafter, yet, as the hose company had been notified by another, there could not have been a delay of over more than ten or twelve minutes, and, when the firemen arrived, the fire was beyond control. At what time must they have been on the ground to have saved the property? No one can answer save from conjecture. All realize that in such emergencies time is precious, but who can say from the situation as presented in this case how many minutes meant the loss of the plaintiff's property? Suppose the connection at the central office had been made promptly, would the fireman in charge of the fire station have responded promptly and promptly have rung the fire bell? Would the members of the department have heard and promptly have repaired to the scene? Was the apparatus for extinguishing the fire in working order and the water supply accessible and sufficient? Would all of these intervening agencies have operated harmoniously and efficiently and with such promptness as to have put out the flames in time to have avoided a total loss? Manifestly these are matters of speculation, and yet all this must be assumed if the loss is to be traced to defendant's negligence. Each of these independent agencies necessarily must be linked together in a line of causation in order to connect it with the loss. None of them were under the direction or control of the telephone company. Moreover, how far the fire had spread at the time the firemen would have been likely to have reached the scene had the connection been promptly made is left by the evidence a matter of speculation merely. And then there are the weather conditions and the character of the material to be taken into account. After the experience of ages, fighting fire, even with modern machinery and apparatus, is precarious business, and uncertain in its results. Had everything worked out as calculated, after the fire was over probably some of the building and machinery might have been saved. But the basis for a legal inference of this kind was not furnished by the evidence. The negligence of the telephone company may be ascertained, but that falls short of connecting it with the loss which is only possible through agencies entirely independent. If it, as the dominating force, acted through the intervening agencies, as mere instruments or vehicles in a natural line of causation, to the loss, there would be ground for saying defendant was liable. But the intervening agencies were independent, and what might have happened pure matter of speculation. The situation differs from that in which a hose through which water is being poured on a fire is cut and, because thereof, the flames, which were being extinguished, consume the property; for there the wrong is in preventing the fire department when actually engaged in extinguishing the fire from accomplishing its design. The circumstance that the firemen act voluntarily affords the wrongdoer no excuse. Whatever the instrumentalities, his act is the direct cause of shutting off the water supply. Thus, in Metallic Compression Casting Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 109 Mass. 277, 12 Am. Rep. 689, the plaintiff's manufacturing plant caught fire, and the hose was extended across defendant's track and connected with the hydrant. The water derived therefrom was applied to the fire so as to diminish it, with the probability that it would have been extinguished in a short time, when a freight train came along, and, though duly warned, carelessly ran over the hose, and injured it so that it could not be seasonably repaired, and the plant was consumed. The defendant was held liable on the principle that, to extinguish fire, firemen were authorized to take possession of the right of way. Though the hose was not plaintiff's property nor the firemen its employees, they were actually furnishing water to plaintiff, and thereby extinguishing the fire, and were rendering the same service as if hired by it and using its hose. Cutting off the supply in these circumstances was "as really an interference with the plaintiff's possession as if they held the possession under a deed and as if the men were laboring under a contract." The wrong was held to have been the proximate cause. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

This case was followed in Little Rock Traction & Electric Co. v. McCaskill, 75 Ark. 133, 70 L.R.A. 680, 112 Am. St. Rep. 48, 86 S. W. 997. See Mott v. Hudson River R. Co. 1 Robt. 585. In Kiernan v. Metropolitan Constr. Co. 170 Mass. 378, 49 N. E. 648, the defendant interfered with the use of a hydrant by the firemen, delaying the connection of the hose therewith so that the plaintiff's house was destroyed, when but for such interference probably it would have been saved. The defendant was held liable, the court saying that, though "there was no obligation upon the city to extinguish the fire, it does not follow that the plaintiff was not deprived of anything to which she had a legal right if the defendant obstructed the fireman in getting water from the hydrant. She has a legal right to have firemen get the water, if they choose to do so, from a supply provided especially for that purpose, and, while the obstruction . . . may not have been a crime, . . . it was a tortious and wrongful interference with persons engaged in putting out a fire." In these cases stress is laid on the circumstances that, though the firemen or city may not be under legal obligation to extinguish the fire (Tainter v. Worcester, 123 Mass. 311, 25 Am. Rep. 90), they were actually engaged therein, and, but for the direct interference with the hose or hydrant, would have extinguished the fire. It seems unnecessary to elaborate on the distinction between these cases and that at bar,—between direct interference with the work of extinguishing fire actually in progress and the negligent omission of being instrumental in procuring such work to be undertaken by others. Enough has been said to indicate our conclusion that the damages proposed to be proven were remote and speculative in character, and the court rightly so held. Lebanon, L. & L. Teleph. Co. v. Lanham Lumber Co. 131 Ky. 718, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 115, 115 S. W. 824, is directly in point. It follows that the court erred in ordering a new trial.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.

JOHN G. WINN.

(— Ky. —, 126 S. W. 153.)

Parties — accounting by insurance company — other policy holders.

1. The other members of the class are not necessary parties to a suit by the holder of a tontine policy of life insurance against the insurer for an accounting of the amount due on his policy.

Pleading — immaterial denial — striking.

2. A mere denial in a suit by the holder of a tontine insurance policy to compel an accounting of the amount due on the policy, that its books would show the amount to be due which is claimed by plaintiff, is not a good defense to the suit, and will be stricken out of the answer.

Insurance — tontine policy — right to accounting.

3. The holder of a tontine life insurance policy is entitled, upon its maturity, to an

Note. — Right of policy holder to an accounting by insurer.

The principle upon which the above decision rests, that the holder of a tontine policy is entitled to an accounting by the insurer at the expiration of the period, was declared to be the law in Pierce v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 145 Mass. 58, 1 Am. St. Rep. 433, 12 N. E. 858, and in Peters v. Equitable Life Assur. Co. 196 Mass. 143, 81 N. E. 964 (on subsequent appeal 200 Mass. 579, 86 N. E. 885), under a statute giving jurisdiction in equity upon accounts "where the nature of the account is such that it cannot be conveniently or properly adjusted or settled in an action at law."

And in Fuller v. Knapp, 24 Fed. 100, the court entertained a bill by the holder of a tontine policy for discovery and accounting, declaring it to be unnecessary to decide whether the bill would be maintainable if discovery were not sought, and, upon a subsequent hearing (37 Fed. 163), decreed an accounting.

On the other hand, in Everson v. Equitable Life Assur. Co. 68 Fed. 258, affirmed upon the opinion of that court in 18 C. C. A. 251, 39 U. S. App. 34, 71 Fed. 570, it was held that the holder of a semi-tontine policy who was dissatisfied with the amount apportioned to him by the insurer could not maintain a bill for an accounting and discovery, in the absence of sufficient allegations of fraud, inasmuch as the relation between him and the insurer was that of debtor and creditor merely, and involved no trust relation.

And the nature of the relationship as debtor and creditor merely was also the ground of the decision in Uhlman v. New York L. Ins. Co. 109 N. Y. 421, 4 Am. St. Rep. 482, 17 N. E. 363, holding that a holder of a tontine policy was not, at the expiration of the period, entitled to an accounting, in the absence of any evidence of misappropriation, wrong doing, or mistake on the part of the insurer.

And in Hunton v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 45 Fed. 661, it was held without discussion that a policy holder was not entitled to an accounting from the insurer, in the absence of any other ground of equitable accounting by the insurer of the amount due upon it.

Same — refusal to account — right to judgment.

4. In case an insurance company refuses to render an account to the holder of a tontine policy, of the amount due on the policy, the court may enter judgment against it for the amount alleged to be due by the policy holder.

(March 18, 1910.)

APPEAL by a defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be jurisdiction. It may be noted here that the court also held that the Massachusetts statute upon which the Massachusetts court in the two cases from that jurisdiction, already cited, relied as giving jurisdiction, did not extend the equity jurisdiction of the Federal courts, even in suits removed from the state courts.

The Supreme Court of the United States seems to have gone to an extreme in denying such relief to a policy holder, since in Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Brown, 213 U. S. 25, 53 L. ed. 682, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 404, reversing 81 C. C. A. 1, 151 Fed. 1, 10 A. & E. Ann Cas. 402, reversing 142 Fed. 835, it was held that frauds and mismanagement by the officers and directors of a mutual life insurance company did not entitle a policy holder to an accounting and distribution of the surplus in any other manner, or at any other time, or in any other amounts, than as provided for in the contract of insurance, where, by such contract, he was entitled to participate equitably in the distribution of some part of the surplus according to such principles and methods as should be adopted by the insurer, in the absence of any trust relationship being shown between the insurer and the policy holder.

In Fry v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. (Tenn.) 38 S. W. 116, it was held that the holder of a tontine policy could not maintain an action for an accounting before the expiration of the period of time during which he was to remain a policy holder in order to share in the surplus, but no opinion was intimated as to his right to maintain such an action then.

Under a statute providing that no decree for an accounting by insurance companies should be made or granted otherwise than upon the application of the attorney general, a policy holder has no legal capacity to maintain such an action. Swan v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 155 N. Y. 9, 49 N. E. 258; Greeff v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 160 N. Y. 19, 46 L.R.A. 288, 73 Am. St. Rep. 659, 54 N. E. 712; Hackett v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 50 App. Div. 266, 63 N. Y. Supp. 1092; Buford v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 98 N. Y. Supp. 152.

due under a certain tontine policy of life insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John A. Judy, Lewis Apperson, and Humphrey & Humphrey, for appellant:

As defendant denied plaintiff's right to an accounting, it was necessary for plaintiff to prove that he was entitled to an accounting, which proof plaintiff failed to make.

The relation between the parties was not that of agency or of trust, but that of contract.

Uhlman v. New York L. Ins. Co. 109 N. Y. 421, 4 Am. St. Rep. 482, 17 N. E. 363; Hunton v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 45 Fed. 661; Everson v. Equitable Life Assur. Co. 68 Fed. 258; *Watts v. Equity will not decree an accounting on the ground that accounts are complicated, where it would work a hardship on the defendant.

Mr. Robert H. Winn for appellee.

Nunn, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents the question of the right of a holder of a tontine policy of life insurance to have from the insurer an accounting of the funds to be apportioned to the policy.

Appellee, John G. Winn, in July, 1884, took out a life insurance policy in the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States for the sum of \$3,000, for which he agreed to pay and did pay as premiums \$82.17 a year for twenty years. The following is a provision of the contract of insurance: "That upon the completion of the tontine period, on July 19, 1904, provided this policy shall not have been terminated previously by lapse or death, said John G. Winn shall have the option either: First, to withdraw in cash this policy's entire share of the assets, i. e., the accumulated reserve, which shall be eleven hundred and twenty-nine $\frac{1}{100}$ dollars, and in addition thereto, the surplus apportioned by this society to this policy; secondly, to convert the same into a paid-up policy for an equivalent amount, provided always that if the amount of said paid-up policy shall exceed the original amount of the assurance, a satisfactory certificate of good health from one of the society's medical examiners shall be required; thirdly, to continue the assurance for the original amount, and apply the entire tontine dividend to the purchase of an annuity, the amount derived from such annuity, together with the annual dividend on this policy, shall be paid in cash to said John G. Winn or assigns; or, fourthly, to withdraw in cash the share of the accumulated surplus apportioned by said society to this policy, and continue the policy in force on the ordinary plan." Upon the completion of the tontine period, the insured wrote the society, asking what the cash value of his policy then was, and exercised the first option under clause 5 quoted above. The society wrote him in answer that the accumulated reserve, which was stipulated in the policy to be \$1,129.05, plus the surplus apportioned by the society to the policy, was \$1,824.54, which was represented to be the cash surrender value of the policy, and which amount the society would give him for the policy. Appellee accepted the sum mentioned, relying upon the society's representations concerning the amount properly apportioned to the policy, and surrendered the policy to the society. On August 21, 1907, appellee filed this action for an accounting. The petition, after setting forth formal statements, the terms of the policy, the fact that the plaintiff had persisted as a member or policy holder for the full tontine period, paying all the premiums, his application under the first option of the fifth clause of the contract for settlement, and the defendant's representation of the amount apportionable to the policy, he then pleaded: "And that, in reliance upon said statement as true, this plaintiff was misled, and fraudulently induced to, and did, surrender said contract to said society, and to accept said sum in payment therefor, which he did in ignorance of the true sum owing him; that the amount or sum actually due this plaintiff on said July 19, 1904, was and is known to the defendant society, and will and can be shown by its books." Plaintiff (appellee) prayed for an accounting against the society and a judgment for such sum as might be due him, or, on failure of such accounting, for a judgment against the society for \$775.46, which it was alleged was the true sum due to be apportioned to the plaintiff's policy out of the funds apportionable thereto. To this petition the appellant interposed a special demurrer for lack of proper parties, and a general demurrer.

The special demurrer was properly overruled. While the insurer was a trustee in a sense for the policy holders, to invest and apportion the sums constituting the surplus, it was not necessary that all the class be made parties to the suit for an accounting brought by one of them. This suit was not for a winding up of the society, nor for the distribution of its funds. It was only to have ascertained the plaintiff's proportion due under his contract. This suit can properly be maintained without the presence of the other policy holders of that class. The demurrers were each overruled. The appellant then answered. Its answer was a traverse of each allegation of the petition save such as set out the corporate existence of the appellant, the execution and terms of the contract, the payment of the premiums, and the plaintiff's election and the settlement had thereunder. A motion was made by the plaintiff, and in part sustained by the court, to strike from the answer certain of its allegations in the form of denials of parts of the petition; for example: "And it states that the amount or sum to the plaintiff on said date was the sum of $1,824.54, and no more. Defendant denies that any other or different sum can be shown by this defendant's books to be due to the plaintiff." Again: "This defendant denies that the plaintiff is entitled to a showing from the defendant society, or an accounting. It denies that any trust or agency existed as between this defendant and plaintiff, and it denies that the plaintiff is entitled to any showing or any accounting of any alleged trust or agency, or that the plaintiff is entitled to any showing or accounting for the purpose of ascertaining any amount alleged to be due the plaintiff." Section 95, Civ. Code Prac., states that an answer may contain a traverse. In subsection 7, § 113, Civ. Code Prac., it is stated that a traverse is a denial by a party of facts alleged in an adverse pleading. Counsel for appellant say: "We are at a loss to understand upon what principle this motion was sustained." A traverse must negative every material fact in the adverse pleading, to constitute a complete defense. If any material fact is not put in issue, it, being admitted, precludes the pleader from denying obligations implied by law upon such admitted facts. Appellant did not deny the issuance of the policy, its engagements, the performance by the plaintiff of its conditions, his selection of an option under its terms, the settlement made, and the representations on which it was made. When so much was admitted, the law imposed upon appellant the duty of keeping accounts with its policy holders, from which it could be ascertained what was due to be apportioned among them according to the terms of the contracts. The defendant did not deny that it had kept such books. Nor did it deny that the books would disclose the true account. It merely denied that they would show that plaintiff was entitled to the sum claimed by him in the suit. If defendant did keep books by which the true state of accounts of the policy holders of the plaintiff's class belonged, then, in an action in equity for an accounting, it was incumbent on appellant to disclose what the books did show in that respect. If it did not keep such books, a denial that its books showed any sum due the plaintiff is manifestly a bad plea. In an action upon a note, it is usual and necessary to allege that the defendant promised and agreed to pay the note; but, unless defendant denies its execution, his denial of his promise and agreement to pay is bad. He would thereby deny the law. Here the law likewise imposes certain duties and obligations upon the insurance company who undertake for pay to invest its policy holders' fund in an enterprise, such as a tontine policy of life insurance. The company cannot satisfy its contract by saying that it apportioned to the policy all that was due under it. It must show what was due under it,—how ascertained, and from what sources,—else it becomes the judge as well as contracting party. The motion to strike from the answer was properly sustained.

The court then ruled the defendant to make its answer more specific. The order is as follows: "The said defendant is now ordered and required to make the allegation of its answer herein more specific and certain; further, that by its answer it give a full, true, complete, and accurate accounting of all its transactions relative to the policy sued on; further, that it show all premiums collected from the class to which the said policy belongs; further, that it show the deaths in said class; further, that it be required to show the expenses and losses of its business apportionable to said class; further, that it show the number in said class and the amounts received from each; further, that it show the interest earnings, if any, on the sums or funds belonging to said class which were invested by the defendant; further, to show the funds contributed by said class and the plaintiff to the general surplus assets of said company; further, to disclose by its answer in full, free, and accurate accounting of all its transactions, earnings, accumulations, expenses, dividends, receipts from, payments to, and each and every fact appertaining and incident to a correct financial statement of the accounts of that tontine class of which the plaintiff was a member; and to show by said statement each and all of said facts as to the plaintiff to which the defendant objects and excepts." The defendant refused to comply with the order of the court, whereupon judgment was entered for the plaintiff for the sum prayed for in the petition. Where one party is due to account to another, his refusal to do so warrants the presumption against him most favorable to his adversary from the then state of the record; for it is to be supposed that, rather than suffer default upon the matter expressly charged, the party accused would answer so as to reduce the amount could he do so conscientiously. Accordingly it is held that the court may enter decree upon such default and contumacy, treating it as an admission against his interest by the party, and affording a sufficient quantity of evidence to justify the chancellor in so proceeding to judgment. Neal v. Keel, 4 T. B. Mon. 162; Peterson v. Poignard, 8 B. Mon. 309; Potter v. Porter, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 129, 109 S. W. 344; United States L. Ins. Co. v. Spinks, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 960, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1053, 96 S. W. 889.

A tontine contract of insurance is more than a policy of life insurance. In addition, it is an agreement on the part of the insurer to hold all the premiums collected on the policies forming that class for the specified period, which is called the tontine period or period of distribution, and, after paying death losses, expenses, and other losses out of the fund so accumulated, to divide the remainder among those who are alive at the end of the tontine period, and who have maintained their policies in force. The premiums include a sum which at interest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent compounded will, at the end of the expiration of the expectancy of the life of the insured, pay to his estate the principal sum insured, which is called the reserve of the policy. That is always provided for and always collected in each life insurance premium. In addition, another sum is included in the premium, called the "mortality fund," which pays the death losses of that per cent who die before the expiration of their life expectancies. Their aggregate is the flat or level cost of insurance. Then there is added a sum to cover cost of conducting the business, and for such losses as may occur from other causes than death of policy holders. This "loading" of the premium is more or less arbitrary. All excess above costs, expenses, losses, death claims, and the reserve constitute what is known as the "surplus," which may also include sums realized from interest received upon the reserves at a greater rate than that upon which it was calculated, as well as from the death rate in a given year being less than the experience justified as certainly expected. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

At any rate, this surplus is regarded as belonging equitably to those policy holders who contribute it. In tontine insurance all who contribute agree that, instead of apportioning it among them all, it may be apportioned among those who outlive the period of distribution. The insurer undertakes to handle the fund for the parties. Its pay is in the costs and expenses which it charges as toll. The balance not only belongs equitably to those contributing to it, according to the terms of their contracts, but the insurance company agrees to so apportion it among them. Now, why should it not keep its contract? To keep it faithfully and honestly, it is required to keep books of account. Otherwise its apportionment would be a mere guess, even if it rose to that dignity. It is a trustee, an agent of those for whom it has essayed to act. It will not be heard to say that it would be too troublesome to keep the accounts, or would cost too much to render the parties a true statement, or on that account be impracticable to show to a court of chancery in a suit for accounting the state of the books.

Nor are we impressed that it is an impracticable matter to exhibit the state of accounts, if they are kept. If the directors of the society act intelligently and sincerely in apportioning the surplus among those whom they have undertaken to apportion it to, they must have before them when they act substantially the same data called for by the order of the court in this case. Any less would be such neglectful conduct as amounts to bad faith. If they had the data when the apportionment was made, then the same material could be furnished to the court. The defendant ought not be heard to say that he has undertaken to deal with so many people that it cannot find the time to make them any showing of how it has conducted their business, or that its magnitude is such it cannot afford to either keep accurate and intelligible books of account, or have statements made up from them in a case in which a party is justly and legally entitled to it. This primary accounting does not necessarily involve giving the name, number, amount, and so forth of each policy. But a fair and explicit classification of the heads of items stated in the aggregate, and subject to impeachment, should have been furnished along the line indicated in the circuit court's order. The refusal was just ground for the action of the court in entering the judgment appealed from.

FRED H. WINSLOW

v.

COMMERCIAL BUILDING COMPANY,
Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 124 N. W. 320.)

Master — injury by fire escape — construction by independent contractor.

1. The owner of a building cannot avoid liability for injury to his servant through the fall, because of improper fastenings, of a fire escape upon which he was employed in the performance of his duties, merely because it was erected by an independent contractor selected with due care.

Trial — question for jury — master's inspection of appliances.

2. The question is for the jury whether or not reasonable inspection, on the part of the owner of a building, of a fire escape which had been erected by an independent contractor, would have revealed a defect in the fastenings and permitted the defect to be remedied prior to the injury of a servant through the attempted use of the appliance, for which the owner is sought to be held liable.

Master — unsafe fire escape — inspection — measure of duty.

3. A mere superficial inspection, by the owner of a building, of a fire escape placed on the building by an independent contractor, is not sufficient per se to relieve him from liability for injury to a servant who, in attempting to use the device, is injured by its fall because the fastenings are let into the wall just far enough to hold it in place until it has passed inspection.

Same — delegation of duty.

4. A master cannot delegate to an independent contractor power to exercise the care to make devices safe for servants which the law imposes upon him as a personal obligation.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was the owner of a six-story office building in the city of Waterloo, and employed the plaintiff as a janitor therein. Upon the outer wall of this building the defendant, in obedience to law and to an ordinance of the city, constructed and maintained an iron fire escape. It was built upon the usual plan, with a platform at each floor above the first story, all being connected by flights of stairs. To connect the first platform with the ground below there was an adjustable "emergency ladder," hung upon iron or steel supports attached to or fastened in the brick wall of the building. Acting within the scope of his employment, plaintiff was engaged in superintending or assisting the work of painting the fire escape. Beginning at the top or the sixth story, he worked his way down to the lower platform, from which he entered upon the emergency ladder. Standing upon the ladder, some 15 or 20 feet above the ground, he leaned out to inspect the painting on the under side of the platform, when the supports on which the ladder was suspended pulled from their fastenings, and plaintiff was thrown down, receiving severe injuries. Defendant is charged with negligence, in that the supports of the ladder had not been properly attached to or fastened in the wall when the fire escape was constructed; that defendant knew, or in the exercise of due care ought to have known, the defective condition of the fire escape, and failed to remedy it or to warn plaintiff of the danger therefrom; that said fire escape was not constructed in accordance with the provisions of the city ordinance, which required the device to be firmly attached to the building, and plaintiff alleges that, by reason of such negligence, he was injured without contributory fault on his part, and demands a recovery.

ery in damages. The defendant admits that plaintiff was in its employment substantially as alleged by him, but denies any negligence or want of reasonable care on its part. It further alleges that the danger of injury such as plaintiff sustained was one of the risks incident to his said employment, and therefore assumed by him in accepting the position. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,750.

The plaintiff's testimony tended to show that at the time of his injury he was acting within the line of his duty in the employment of defendant, and was exercising reasonable care for his own safety. It also tended to show that the ladder supports were not properly or safely attached to the wall, and that the defect was probably one of original construction. The evidence on part of the defendant was devoted solely to the proposition that the fire escape had been constructed by an independent contractor, the defendant exercising no supervision or control as to the manner of doing the work, and that, in selecting the contractor to perform the work, it exercised due care and caution to secure one who was skilled in the business and competent to perform it in an efficient and proper manner. The sufficiency of this line of defense is the question presented by the record before us.

Stated in succinct form the question may be put in these words: "Is the master's obligation to furnish his servant a safe place to work fully satisfied and discharged by the exercise of reasonable care in selecting a competent independent contractor to make it safe?" To sustain the affirmative of this proposition, the appellant relies upon the familiar line of authorities which hold that as a general rule the doctrine of respondeat superior, which arises from the relation of master and servant, and makes the master answerable to third persons for the acts or omissions of the servant within the scope of his employment, has no application as between a contractee and an independent contractor, and that the former is not answerable to the servant of the latter for acts or omissions of such contractor in the performance of his contract. Were the question uncomplicated by inharmonious precedents, it would seem that the inapplicability of the rule to a case like the one at bar would be self-evident. There is nothing better settled in the law of master and servant than that the duty of the master to provide the servant a reasonably safe place to work is absolute and nondelegable. The obligation cannot be shifted from the master to a fellow servant or to any other third person. It is also a continuing duty, and care in furnishing a safe place at the beginning of the employment must be followed by reasonable supervision, inspection, and care to keep it safe until the relation of master and servant is at an end. On the other hand, in the case of an independent contractor, he is himself the employer, and has his own servants, who look to him for the safety of their place of work, and he alone is liable to his servant or other person who is injured by his negligence in the execution of his contract. If, for instance, plaintiff had been the servant of the contractor who constructed the fire escape, and had received his injury in the progress of that work without contributory fault on his part, the rule as to independent contractors would clearly apply, and the owner of the building could not be held liable for the damages so sustained. But, when the contract was performed and the completed work accepted by the defendant, the relation of owner and independent contractor was dissolved, and thereafter could in no manner affect the obligation to such owner as an employer of labor in and about the structure thus erected. Bailey v. New York, 3 Hill, 531, 38 Am. Dec. 669; Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, 68 Am. Dec. 345; Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 240, 28 Am. Rep. 224; Read v. East Providence Fire Dist. 20 R. I. 574, 40 Atl. 760; First Presby. Congregation v. Smith, 163 Pa. 561, 26 L.R.A. 504, 43 Am. St. Rep. 808, 30 Atl. 279. While the cases here cited did not arise between master and servant, they show the fundamental principle limiting and defining the extent to which the plea of "independent contractor" is available to a property owner when sued by a third person for damages occasioned by the defective condition of such owner's premises. The distinction between the responsibility of one who fails to perform a duty which the law requires him to perform and his liability for the negligence of those who are employed in doing the work is noted by Lord Blackburn in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Gibbs, 11 H. L. Cas. 686, where he says that in cases governed by this principle "it is immaterial whether the actual actors are servants or not." In Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B. N. S. 470, it is said that the rule respecting the nonliability of the owner or employer for the acts of a contractor is inapplicable to cases in which the contractor is intrusted with a duty incumbent upon his employer, and neglects its fulfilment, whereby an injury is occasioned. See also to the same effect, Penny v. Wimbledon Urban Dist. [1899] 2 Q. B. 72. The case as between master and servant falls within the general rule that, wherever the law imposes a personal duty upon anyone, he cannot escape responsibility therefor or for the manner of its performance by employing a substitute. 1 Thomp. Neg. §§ 532, 665; Texas & P. R.

Co. v. Juneman, 18 C. C. A. 394, 30 U. S. App. 541, 71 Fed. 939; Wilson v. White, 71 Ga. 506, 51 Am. Rep. 269; Houston & G. N. R. Co. v. Meador, 50 Tex. 77; Hegeman v. Western R. Corp. 16 Barb. 353; Same case on appeal, 13 N. Y. 9, 64 Am. Dec. 517. In the last-cited case a railroad company sought to escape liability to a passenger by showing that defective axle had been procured from a reputable and competent maker, and disclosed no exterior evidence of the defect. In upholding a verdict for the plaintiff, the court says that the law placed upon defendants the duty of furnishing a safe car for the passenger, and, while they were not required to become smelters of iron or builders of cars, they were required to exercise the requisite degree of care to make the car safe, and in so doing "they may construct it themselves or avail themselves of the services of others, but in either case they engage that all that well directed skill can do has been done for the accomplishment of this object. A good reputation upon the part of the builder is very well in itself, but ought not to be accepted by the public or the law as a substitute for a good vehicle." See also Brehm v. Great Western R. Co. 34 Barb. 256.

Speaking to the question whether a master can, by employing a contractor to perform a duty which he owes to his servants, relieve himself from liability for its non-performance, Mr. Labatt, a recognized authority on the law of master and servant, says: "The weight of authority would seem to be distinctly in favor of the doctrine that a master cannot escape his responsibility by such a delegation of his duties. This, it is submitted, is the only doctrine which is logically tenable and which can be reconciled with general principles." See note to Anderson v. Fleming, 66 L.R.A. 153. In Trainor v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 137 Pa. 148, 20 Atl. 632, the court approves the rule that "the master owes to the servant the duty of providing a reasonably safe place to work in and reasonably safe appliances with which to do the work, and the delegation of this duty to an agent or independent contractor will not relieve the master from responsibility for an injury to the servant resulting from its neglect." Many other cases and precedents lend support to this theory of the law, and, indeed, it is difficult to conceive how the courts can hold that the duty of care on the part of the master to provide a safe place to work is absolute and nondelegable, and at the same time say that he may delegate or shift the responsibility to the shoulders of a contractor. To affirm both propositions is to effectually negative both. That the decisions on the subject cannot well be reconciled may be conceded. The one oftenest cited in support of appellant's position is Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311. There a contractor for the construction of a public building let the contract to another to erect a scaffold needed in the progress of the work; the subcontractor furnishing his own materials and help, and building the scaffold after his own methods. The work was so defectively done that, when the principal contractor's servant went upon the scaffold, it fell and injured him, and it was decided that the servant's cause of action was against the subcontractor alone. In our judgment the conclusion, as broadly stated in that opinion, cannot be sustained upon principle, but its scope and effect appear to have since been very materially narrowed.

In Vosburgh v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 94 N. Y. 374, 46 Am. Rep. 148, the defendant, seeking to escape responsibility for a defective bridge which it had purchased from the builder, cited the Devlin Case as an authority in point, and the court, referring to the facts on which that decision had been made to turn, says: "If the scaffold instead of a temporary had been a permanent structure intended for continuous use through the years, and imposing upon Smith the duty of an inspection by skillful and competent agents whose proper performance of that duty would have disclosed defects of construction which made it dangerous and unsafe, again a different question would have been presented." As thus restricted, Devlin v. Smith is not in point with the case at bar, for the structure here in question was a permanent structure, which, if well constructed, could be expected to answer the purpose for which it was designed practically as long as the building to which it was affixed. Defendant pleads and proves that it gave the manner and method of the construction of the fire escape no attention or supervision whatever, leaving the work wholly to the contractor, and, except the official inspection by the city when the work was completed, there is no claim that it was ever in any manner inspected, or its strength and safety in any manner tested prior to the plaintiff's injury, some two years later. It may be, as counsel argue, that reasonable inspection by defendant would not have revealed the weakness of the ladder's support, but we cannot so hold as a matter of law. It was for the jury to say whether due care would have discovered the defect and applied a remedy before the accident. The mere fact that to a superficial view the fire escape appeared to be firmly attached to the building is not a sufficient answer to this suggestion. If each and all of the several supports of the fire escape had extended but an inch or two into the wall, just sufficient to hold the device in place until it had passed inspection, thus constituting a veritable trap for any person having occasion to use it, the surface appearance presented would doubtless have been as perfect as if it were thoroughly well made, yet it would not do to hold as a matter of law that such superficial inspection would fill the full measure of the owner's duty to provide his servant a safe place to work. Of the other cases cited by counsel, Haley v. Jump River Lumber Co. 81 Wis. 412, 51 N. W. 321, 956, disposes of the question without discussion and expressly upon the supposed authority of Hackett v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 80 Wis. 187, 49 N. W. 822, which is not parallel in fact or principle with the one we have under consideration. Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. 1017, is a New York case of the type of Devlin v. Smith, and subject to the same restricted application.

It must not be understood from the foregoing discussion that care in selecting a competent contractor is not a proper fact for consideration by the jury in cases like the one at bar. The standard to which the master must conform is that of reasonable care, and his care to employ skilful and competent persons to assist him is one of the circumstances bearing upon the question whether he has done his full duty to his servant, but it is not decisive of it. He may employ third persons to do the work which his duty requires of him, but he cannot employ them to exercise the care which the law imposes upon him as a personal obligation. None of our own cases have been cited, nor are we able to find any which are in any wise inconsistent with the views we have expressed. It should be said that it is open to some doubt whether the record before us fairly presents the principal questions argued by counsel. Except as it may be included within the scope of a general denial, the answer does not claim the benefit of the rule which exempts the employer from liability for negligence of an independent contractor, and quite likely it was not necessary to plead it specially. But no request was made of the court to instruct the jury upon that theory, and the court submitted the case without objection upon the conceded general rule as to the requirement of reasonable care by the defendant to furnish plaintiff a safe place to work. We have thought it best, however, to take the case as counsel have argued it, and dispose of the points so raised according to our views of their merit.

We are of the opinion that the court properly submitted the cause to the jury, with correct instructions as to the law bearing thereon, and the judgment appealed therefrom is therefore affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down on May 3, 1910:

In argument of appellant upon petition for rehearing, doubt is expressed whether a paragraph of the opinion heretofore filed does not give countenance to the doctrine that the master's duty to furnish his servant a safe place to work is discharged by committing the work of construction and preparation to a competent independent contractor. To remove any possible ambiguity in that respect the opinion is modified by withdrawing so much thereof as reads as follows: "It must not be understood from the foregoing discussions that care in selecting a competent contractor is not a proper fact for consideration by the jury in cases like the one at bar. The standard to which the master must conform is that of reasonable care, and his care to employ skilful and competent persons to assist him is one of the circumstances bearing upon the question whether he has done his full duty to his servant, but it is not decisive of it. He may employ third persons to do the work which his duty requires of him, but he cannot employ them to exercise the care which the law imposes upon him as a personal obligation,"—and by inserting in place thereof the following: "The standard to which the master must conform is that of reasonable care. He may employ servants or contractors to do the work which the law requires of him, but he cannot delegate to them the exercise of the care which the law imposes upon him as a personal obligation."

With this amendment of the opinion filed upon the original submission, the petition for rehearing is overruled.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT.

C. B. BOX, Plff. in Err.,

v.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE COMPANY.
NY.

(91 C. C. A. 172, 165 Fed. 138.)

Telegraph company — unrepeatd message — delay — liability.

1. A telegraph company cannot avoid liability for full damages for failure to trans-

Note. — Applicability of stipulation as to repeating telegraph messages to failure or delay in transmission or delivery.

A note to Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Milton, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 560, discusses the question of validity of limitation of liability of telegraph companies for unrepeatd messages. It will be observed by referring to that note, mit a message within the stipulated time, under a rule limiting its liability to the amount received for transmission in case of mistake or delay in the transmission of un-repeated messages.

Trial — jury — close of telegraph office.

2. Whether or not a telegram was tendered for transmission after the close of the hours of the office of destination is for the jury where the evidence tends to show that it was tendered about 6 o'clock P. M., and that the hours of the office at destination terminated usually at 6 or 6:30 P. M., but might on occasions continue until late in the evening.

Telegraph company — delay in transmission — notification of sender.

3. A telegraph company receiving a message for transmission, with notice that it is important that it go forward promptly, is that among the cases upholding the validity of the stipulation, and also among those refusing to uphold it, are included cases of negligent failure or delay in transmission or delivery, which did not suggest any distinction between a failure or delay in transmission or delivery and a mere error in transmission.

On the other hand, it appears also from that note, that in many jurisdictions, although the stipulation is declared valid as against mistakes or errors made in transmission, the courts therein refuse to hold that a stipulation as to un-repeated messages can have application where there is a delay in, or total failure of, delivery or transmission.

Such a case is BOX v. POSTAL TELEG. CABLE CO., and it is only such cases as these, which discuss the question from this view point, that are of much value in this note.

Since no material advantage is gained by again discussing the cases set out sufficiently in the note to the Milton Case, attention is called to that note as containing a large number of cases necessary to a complete consideration of the question here annotated.

A case of recent date, and similar to the Box Case, is Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bennett (Tex. Civ. App.) 124 S. W. 151, where it was held that while the usual stipulation as to un-repeated telegraph messages was lawful and reasonable for merely errors or mistakes committed in the transmission, so much of the stipulation as attempted to relieve the telegraph company from its negligence in not delivering or transmitting an un-repeated message could not be enforced.

But in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Elliott, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 482, 27 S. W. 219, the usual stipulation as to un-repeated telegraph messages was held valid and applicable where there was a delay in delivery due to an error in the transmission of the address.

However, in Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. v. Sunset Constr. Co. 102 Tex. 148, 114 S. W. 99, where a mistake was made in addressing a telegram to J. W. Woods, instead of J. K. Woods, in consequence of which the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bound to notify the sender if an obstacle to speedy transmission arises.

Same — misleading information — liability.

4. A telegraph company which receives for transmission an important message, with notice that failure to deliver it by a certain time will cause loss, and promises to notify the sender by telephone when it is sent, and subsequently erroneously states in answer to his call, at a time when other avenues of communication were still open to him, that it had been sent, cannot escape liability for the loss occasioned by failure to transmit the message in time.

(October 5, 1908.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mis-message was not delivered, it was held that the company was guilty of such negligence as to permit a recovery for damages, notwithstanding the usual stipulation as to un-repeated messages. The court said: "It is difficult to say that, if the message had been repeated, the mistake would not have been discovered; but it seems to us that it was ordinary if not gross negligence for the receiving agent of the Western Union Company to have made the mistake in the middle letter of the name of the addressee."

But see the discussion of the Texas cases in the earlier note.

It will be observed from the above cases, that a distinction is suggested between cases where the delay in the delivery was caused by an error in the transmission of the address, and where the failure or delay in the delivery of the message was due to the negligence of the employees or agents of the telegraph companies other than error in the transmission of the address. It would seem at least so far as jurisdictions are concerned in which the courts uphold the validity of the stipulation as to errors in transmission, that there is some basis for this distinction, for a repeating of the message including the address of the one to whom it was sent would tend to rectify the mistake.

In Monsees v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 127 App. Div. 289, 111 N. Y. Supp. 53, the principle that a telegraph company may limit its liability for a mere negligent error in language in an un-repeated telegraph message was also held applicable to non-delivery or delay in delivery. In this case an address was changed from H. J. Monsees to H. J. Monse, in consequence of which the message was delayed in delivery.

In New York, however, as appears in the earlier note, the stipulation, providing it was broad enough, has been held valid even in those cases where the repeating of the message could not have prevented the loss complained of.

In Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Robertson, 36 Misc. 785, 74 N. Y. Supp. 876, a stipulation limiting the telegraph company's liability in case of delay in transmission or Mississippi to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure promptly to transmit a telegram. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Pardee, McCormick, and Shelby, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Stone & Sivley, with Mr. T. B. Watkins, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. D. A. Scott, with Messrs. William C. Dufour, H. Generes Dufour, and Henry Mooney, for defendant in error.

delivery of unrepeatd messages was held not to apply where the company was guilty of such gross negligence as to send a message addressed to Toledo, Ohio, to Chicago, Ill.

So, in Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Nichols, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 870, 89 C. C. A. 585, 159 Fed. 643, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 369, it was held that provisions in a telegraph blank relieving the company from liability, beyond the price charged, for nondelivery of unrepeatd messages and for delays on connecting lines, are without effect where, upon receiving notice within a few minutes after undertaking to transmit an important message, that the lines are down, it fails to notify the sender of that fact.

There are a number of cases in which the negligence complained of was held not to come within the terms of the stipulation which purported to limit the liability of the telegraph company in sending an unrepeatd message. These cases, of course, were clearly outside the scope of the note to the Milton Case.

A case of this nature is Birney v. New York & W. Printing Teleg. Co. 18 Md. 341, 81 Am. Dec. 607, where it was held that the exemption from liability for the nontransmission and nondelivery of unrepeatd messages does not apply where no effort was made by the company to send the message. The court said: "The terms of the notice in which exemption from liability is declared clearly imply an obligation on the part of the company to attempt the transmission and delivery of a message received by it for that purpose, and it would be most unreasonable to permit it to have the benefit of an exemption from liability without first bringing itself within the scope of the exemption provided for, by a full and faithful performance of its implied duties."

So, in Baldwin v. United States Teleg. Co. 54 Barb. 505, reversed on other grounds in 45 N. Y. 744, 6 Am. Rep. 165, it was held that a stipulation limiting the liability of a telegraph company for "delay, error, or remissness" in sending unrepeatd messages, did not apply where there was a total failure to transmit or deliver a message. The court said: "The contract, then, was that the defendants would not be liable for delay, error, or remissness. These being the only particulars specified in the Shelby, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

C. B. Box brought this suit against the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company for $20,000 damages alleged to have resulted from delay in the transmission and delivery of a message.

On October 13, 1905, Earl Brewer signed and delivered to the plaintiff in error, who will hereafter be called the plaintiff, an option on stock held by Brewer in the Dixie Cotton Company and on notes of the com-terms and conditions of the special contract, they cannot claim exemption or release from any which by their contract they were bound to perform, other than such as are expressly specified. They cannot, in law, receive the consideration and be bound in duty, and then neglect or refuse to perform the duty at all. The complaint charges, not any delay, error, or remissness, but that the message was never transmitted at all by the defendants to Rouseville, nor delivered to the said Eric Darling, who it is charged was then, and for a long time afterwards, at the place where the message was directed by the plaintiffs. This is denied by the sixth answer, which for this purpose stands alone. An entire neglect and refusal to perform this contract, by the defendants, does not bring them within the excepted terms. 'Delay' in sending and delivering a message implies that it was or would be sent at some time, but not sent or delivered promptly. 'Error' in sending or delivering a message implies sending or delivering a wrong message, or to the wrong place or person. 'Remissness' also implies a sending or delivering, but in a tardy, negligent, or careless manner. It is neither delay, error, nor remissness that is charged, but the entire omission or refusal to send or deliver the message, and this is admitted."

In Bryant v. American Teleg. Co. 1 Daly. 575, it was held that a condition of a telegraph company that they will not be responsible for mistakes or delay in the "transmission" of unrepeatd messages cannot apply where there was delay in the delivery of the message after it was correctly transmitted.

So, in Sprague v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 6 Daly, 200, a total failure to send a message was held not a "mistake or delay in the transmission or delivery, or a nondelivery" of the message, as used in the stipulations relieving a telegraph company from such in case of unrepeatd messages.

Although cases dealing with the question whether the stipulation in regard to "night messages" can have application where there is a failure or delay in transmission or delivery are closely related to the question here discussed, they have been expressly excluded.

pany for $7,500. The Dixie Cotton Company was a corporation owning land improved and equipped for planting. The notes held by Brewer were secured by a mortgage on the property, and, together with the stock, represented Brewer's interest in the property of the Dixie Cotton Company. The option, by its written terms, expired on Monday, October 16th, at 12 o'clock P. M. On that day, the plaintiff sent the following telegram to Brewer:

Memphis, Tenn., October 16, 1905.

Earl Brewer,

Friar's Point, Miss.:—

Will you extend option until Saturday.
Wire answer. C. B. Box.

Brewer did not wire answer, as requested, but answered by telephone that he would not extend the option, and that unless it was accepted by 12 o'clock that night he would not sell. For the purpose of closing the contract, the plaintiff, about 6 o'clock P. M., delivered the following telegram to the agent of the defendant in error (hereafter called the defendant), whose duty it was to receive messages:

Oct. 16, 1905.

To Earl Brewer,

Friar's Point, Miss.:—

I will buy your interest in farm price named option C. B. Box.

On the message was printed a request to send it, and a statement that it was to be sent subject to certain conditions that appear on the blank forms used by the defendant company. So far as it is material, the conditions will be quoted later. The plaintiff explained to the defendant's agent who received the telegram at its Memphis office that its delivery to Brewer before 12 o'clock that night was important, and that it would cause plaintiff a loss of $12,500 if it was not delivered. The defendant's agent at Memphis attempted to send the message that evening, but could not do so, because, it appears, that at the time the attempt was made no operator was in the office at Friar's Point. The plaintiff left his telephone number with the defendant's agent who received the message, and requested that notice be given him when the message was delivered. No notice was given the plaintiff of the failure to transmit the message. The plaintiff made inquiry by telephone at the defendant's Memphis office at 8 o'clock P. M., and was told by someone answering the call that the message had been delivered. This was not true. But the message was transmitted and delivered to Brewer the next morning about 9 o'clock, after the option had expired. Brewer replied by telegram as follows:

Friar's Point, Miss., 17th Oct.

C. B. Box,

Care W. K. Burton & Co.,

Memphis, Tenn.:—

Your telegram received 9 o'clock this morning came too late. I had made other arrangements.
Earl Brewer.

While there was conflict on the subject, the evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to show that he was damaged $12,500 on account of his failure to close the trade by accepting the option before it expired. There was much evidence offered on both sides, material portions of which will be quoted hereafter. The trial court directed a verdict for the defendant.

The first and main contention in defense of the action of the trial court is that the plaintiff failed to have the message repeated, and that his right of action is barred by the following part of the contract, printed on the back of the telegram: "To guard against mistakes or delays, the sender of a message should order it repeated; that is, telegraphed back to the originating office for comparison. For this, one half of the regular rate is charged in addition. It is agreed between the sender of the message written on the face hereof and the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company that said company shall not be liable for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery, or for nondelivery, of any unrepeated message, beyond the amount received for sending the same. The defendant made a tender of $1 to cover the amount received by it from the plaintiff.

Primrose v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 154 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 883, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1008, is relied on as sustaining this defense. That case was a suit brought by the sender of a cipher unrepeated message. The message was not transmitted as delivered to the company. A material word in the cipher was omitted, another word with a different meaning being substituted, which caused the plaintiff to be damaged. It was apparent from the record in that case that if the plaintiff had paid the additional charge to secure the repetition of the message, the damage to him would not have occurred. The court held that the rule in question was reasonable and valid, and that the plaintiff, having failed to have the message repeated, could not recover. This case settles the validity and binding effect of the rule in question, and is an answer in this court to all authorities cited which hold that the rule is void as against public policy. The question we have to deal with is whether or not the case before us comes within the control of the rule.

The rule is not intended to secure a timely effort to send the message, but to make more certain its accurate transmission. The company is under obligation to send the message with reasonable promptness for the regular rate when it receives such rate and accepts the message. It could not, for example, wilfully or negligently fail to send, or unreasonably delay the sending or attempting to send, the message, and defend on the plea that only the regular rate was paid, and not the additional fee for repetition. The first lines of the rule show its meaning plainly: "To guard against mistakes or delays, the sender of the message should order it repeated; that is, telegraphed back to the originating office for comparison."

The message must, of course, be sent before it can be repeated; it must be sent and repeated before any comparison could be made. Although the regulation purports to be made to guard against mistakes or delays, it should be construed to refer to such mistakes and delays as could be corrected or avoided by repetition and comparison; otherwise, a delay caused by the conduct of the company in negligently failing to send or to attempt to send the message would come within the rule. And it is held that it does not apply where "no effort was made to put the message on its transit." Birney v. New York & W. Printing Teleg. Co. 18 Md. 341, 81 Am. Dec. 607. It is difficult to believe that this stipulation was intended by the parties to be applicable to a case in which the conduct of the company made it impossible for the message to be repeated. We believe it would be wholly unjust, and not within the intention of the contracting parties, to permit this rule to exonerate the company from liability for a failure which, like the one here charged, would not have been prevented by repeating the message. Jones, Teleg. & Teleph. Co. § 379; 2 Thomp. Neg. § 2424, and cases there cited; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510, 520, 18 Am. St. Rep. 148, 7 So. 419; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Broesche, 72 Tex. 654, 13 Am. St. Rep. 843, 10 S. W. 734; Barnes v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 24 Nev. 125, 77 Am. St. Rep. 791, 50 Pac. 438.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 40 L. ed. 1105, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 934, the court reaffirmed the doctrine of the Primrose Case, and, at page 663, observed, in refusing to apply the regulation in question, that "there was no mistake in the transmission of the message, and there was no breach of the agreement."

The message in the case at bar was delivered to the company about 6 o'clock P. M. on October 16th, and it was not transmitted till 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the next morning. It was correctly sent and received. Its repetition would have had no effect on the case. The alleged damage was caused by no mistake or delay that repetition would have corrected. The message was held in the receiving office till the option it was sent to close had expired. We think that, on the facts, the regulation as to repeated messages has no application.

It is claimed that the court was justified in directing the verdict, because the message was received at Memphis after the hour of closing at Friar's Point, "and that it was within the rights of the defendant corporation to establish reasonable office hours at its various offices, and that the defendant was not under obligation to the public to keep all of its agents advised of the hours of the respective offices." The court having directed a verdict for the defendant, the plaintiff has the right to ask us to consider the case in the light of the evidence which is most favorable to him. We are not called on to quote and comment on all the evidence, nor to decide what the verdict should be, but we are to decide only whether there was sufficient evidence, if believed by the jury, to sustain a verdict in the plaintiff's favor. The testimony of W. B. Marley, in charge of the office at Friar's Point, was that he "was supposed to go on duty at 7 o'clock in the morning and stayed on duty until excused by the despatcher and all trains were by, which was usually 6 or 6:30 o'clock in the afternoon." But on cross-examination the witness said that he frequently stayed in the office after night and took messages, "when I have to meet that freight train when it is 'way late.'" On the 16th of October Mr. Marley says that he left the office at 6:20 in the afternoon. Mr. Box testified that he delivered the message at the Memphis office "about 6 o'clock in the afternoon." A copy of the message offered in evidence is indorsed: "Time filed 6:20 P. M." J. F. Wilson testified for the company that he had supervision of the transmission of messages from Memphis, and that, for the purpose of sending the message in question, "we called Friar's Point at intervals of ten or fifteen minutes all along until after 8 o'clock," beginning the calls at about 6:35 P. M. It will be remembered that Mr. Box had previously sent a message asking to have the option extended. This fact, together with the explanation made by him to the Memphis agent of the nature and importance of the telegram, would make it the duty of the company's agent to inform him if it was known that there was any obstacle to the speedy transmission of the message. The fact that the Memphis agents received the message for immediate transmission tends to show that they believed the Friar's Point office to be open. It would be unjust to them and to the company to believe otherwise, for, under the circumstances, we cannot assume that they would receive the message knowing that the Friar's Point office was closed and that it could not be transmitted till next day. After a careful examination of the evidence, we are unable to say that it shows certainly that the office hours at Friar's Point had expired or that the office was closed when the message was received at Memphis for transmission. That question, if material, was for the jury.

There is another view of the case that seems to us to make it improper to direct the verdict for the defendant on the ground now considered. When the plaintiff delivered the message at the Memphis office and paid for its transmission, he says he had a conversation with the defendant's agent:

I went to the window, and the man waiting on the window received the telegram, and I tendered him the message and told him that it was a very important message; that I had an option on some valuable property that expired that night at 12 o'clock, and that, unless I could get this telegram delivered by 12 o'clock that night, my option would expire, and I would lose $12,500; and so I told him I wanted to send it at the regular rates and everything, and asked him what it would be, and he told me 25 cents. Now, I asked him if he would call me up at my residence and let me know the time of the delivery of that message, that I wanted to know what time it was delivered, and he said he would, and I told him my phone number, and he turned right over on the back of the original telegram and put down my phone number out at my residence, number 2973A.

Q. Who did you say put that down?

A. The operator, or the gentleman receiving the telegram in the office. . . .

Q. Well, sir, did you have any communication further with him about that at any other time subsequent to this time? If so, what was it?

A. Well, about 8 o'clock that night I hadn't heard from him, and I wanted to know about the telegram; so I called the Postal Telegraph office up by phone, and they answered, and I told the gentleman answering about the message in question, the message I had sent to Mr. Brewer at Friar's Point, and wanted to know what about it, whether they had delivered it or what about it, and he said "Wait a minute and I'll see." He went off and was gone from the phone a few minutes, and came back and said that the telegram had been delivered.

Q. What time was that, now?

A. That was about 8 o'clock that night.
28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The evidence shows that if the defendant had notified the plaintiff that it was unable to send the message,—that it had called the Friar's Point office and found it closed,—there being other channels of communication, the plaintiff probably could have closed the option by using one of them. It is not denied that the defendant failed to give notice of its inability to transmit the message on the night of October 16th. The plaintiff's telephone number had been left with the defendant's agent and was indorsed on the back of the telegram, so that notice could be given him when the delivery was made. Not hearing from the operator at 8 o'clock, he called by telephone to inquire about the message, and was informed that it had been delivered. The defendant being employed and paid to transmit the message, and being informed of its importance and the necessity for despatch, and being furnished with the plaintiff's telephone number, we think the most obvious suggestion of diligence and good faith required it to notify the plaintiff that it had been unable to deliver the message. If the jury should believe that the defendant's agent knowingly represented to the plaintiff that the message had been delivered when it had not been transmitted, it would, to say the least, authorize the inference of a want of good faith and a disregard of the plaintiff's rights. Under the circumstances, it was unquestionably the duty of the defendant to notify the plaintiff of the failure to deliver the message. This view is sustained by many authorities. Pacific Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Fleischner, 14 C. C. A. 166, 29 U. S. App. 227, 66 Fed. 899; Swan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 67 L.R.A. 153, 63 C. C. A. 550, 129 Fed. 318; Jones, Teleg. & Teleph. Co. § 277; 2 Thomp. Neg. § 2399; 2 Joyce, Electric Law § 744a. We are of opinion that the court erred in directing the verdict.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial.

KATHERINE KROLL, Plff. in Err.,
v.

ALBERT C. CLOSE, Admr., etc., of John Kaercher, Deceased.

(— Ohio St. —, 92 N. E. 29.)

Estoppel — essential facts — burden of proof.

1. The burden is upon the party who relies upon estoppel to prove clearly and unequivocally every fact essential to the estoppel.

Trial — question of reasonableness — law or fact.

2. Ordinarily, an issue as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of anything is a mixed question of law and fact; but where the facts are clear and undisputed, it is purely a question of law.

Executor's account — allowance — funeral expenses — reasonableness — duty of court.

3. It is the duty of the probate judge, upon the hearing of an administrator's or executor's account, whether exceptions have been filed thereto or not, to scan closely the amounts claimed to have been paid for funeral expenses; and in the absence of statutory or testamentary provisions, the allowance for such expenses must be reasonable, having regard to the amount of the estate, the station in life of the deceased, and the customs of the people in the same station, and, if unreasonable and extravagant, should be disallowed, even as against legatees and next of kin.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Erie County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas which reversed a judgment of the Probate Court confirming in part only the account of Albert C. Close, administrator of John Kaercher, deceased, to which exceptions had been filed. Modified.

Note. — What items and amounts are allowable as funeral expenses against deceased's estate.

This subject was treated in the note to Fogg v. Holbrook, 33 L.R.A. 665, and the present note is supplementary thereto.

Mourning apparel.

There appears to be a conflict on the question of the allowances for mourning apparel.

Thus, an allowance for mourning garments was made in Re Schroeder, 113 App. Div. 204, 99 N. Y. Supp. 176, affirmed in 186 N. Y. 537, 78 N. E. 1112.

And it was held in Re Meuschke, 61 Misc. 9, 114 N. Y. Supp. 722, that a reasonable expenditure for mourning for those members of the family for whose support the deceased was bound to provide was proper.

And the executor was allowed $100 spent in furnishing the slaves of deceased with mourning dresses, in Badillo v. Tio, 7 La. Ann. 487.

But it was held in Jenks v. Mathews, 31 Me. 318, that the deceased's estate could not be charged with the expense of mourning apparel.

Burial lot.

In Massachusetts a reasonable sum for a burial lot is by statute made a part of the funeral expenses. Marple v. Morse, 180 Mass. 508, 62 N. E. 966; Pettengill v. Abbott, 167 Mass. 307, 45 N. E. 748.

Where deceased has provided a lot and monument, his executrix cannot be allowed for others purchased by her after his decease. Re Woodbury, 40 Misc. 143, 81 N. Y. Supp. 503.

And the expense of a cemetery lot and monument is not a funeral expense within the meaning of a statute limiting funeral expenses to $300, and an independent allowance for such purposes will be made where the rights of creditors and legatees are not prejudiced. Sinnott v. Kenaday, 14 App. D. C. 1, reversed on other grounds 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) in 179 U. S. 606, 45 L. ed. 339, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 233.

And a debt incurred for inclosing the burial lot cannot be considered a part of the funeral expenses. Meyer's Estate, 18 Phila. 42.

But one who had done marble work inclosing the burying ground was allowed to recover the value thereof, in Crosson's Appeal, 125 Pa. 380, 17 Atl. 423.

See also infra, subsection on "Burial lots," under section on "Amount allowable."

Monument or tombstone.

Expenditures for monuments and tombstones are generally held authorized as part of the funeral expenses.

Thus, in the following cases it was held that the cost of a tombstone not disproportionate to the value of deceased's estate was allowable as part of the funeral expenses: Pierce v. Fulmer (Ala.) 51 So. 728; Re Koppikus, 1 Cal. App. 84, 81 Pac. 732; Phillips v. Duckett, 112 Ill. App. 587; Pease v. Christman, 158 Ind. 642, 64 N. E. 90; Re Gray (Ind. App.) 91 N. E. 745; Jackson v. Leech, 113 Mich. 391, 71 N. W. 846; Laird v. Arnold, 25 Hun, 4; Duffy's Estate, 9 Kulp, 409; Lutton's Estate, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 342; Miles's Estate, 13 Pa. Dist. R. 264; Titlow's Estate, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 40; Fisher's Estate, 16 Lanc. L. Rev. 333; Menzies v. Ridley, 2 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 544.

In Kentucky an allowance for tombstones as part of the funeral expenses is made by statute. Hespen v. Hespen, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1328, 105 S. W. 99.

In Sheetz's Estate, 2 Woodw. Dec. 407, it was held that an allowance for an appropriate monument might be made, the appropriateness to be ascertained by considering the position of the deceased, the amount of his estate, the traditions of his family, expenditures made by himself in the burial of his relatives, and the usages of the community where he lived.

And where the husband is poor and the wife leaves a considerable estate, the court may allow a reasonable amount from her

Statement by Davis, J.:

The plaintiff in error is the sole legatee under the last will and testament of John Kaercher, deceased. The defendant in error is the administrator with the will annexed of such estate. Exceptions were filed by the plaintiff in error to the account of the administrator. The probate court held that the charge for the coffin of the deceased was excessive, and reduced it from $150 to $100. In other respects the account was approved and confirmed. The administrator appealed to the court of common pleas, and, upon hearing, that court overruled the exceptions, and approved and confirmed the account. Plaintiff in error prepared, filed, and had allowed her bill of exceptions, and prosecuted proceedings in error in the circuit court. A estate for a monument. Re Weringer, 100 Cal. 345, 34 Pac. 825.

But it was held in Hisem v. Lemel, 19 La. 425, that the cost of erecting a tomb was no part of the funeral expenses.

See also infra, subsection on "Tombstones" under "Amount allowable;" and infra, section on "Insolvent estates."

Amount allowable.

The amount allowed for the expenses of the funeral and monument should be governed by the custom of the people of like rank and position in society with the deceased. Re Weringer, supra.

Where deceased was president of a corporation, left no known heirs or unpaid creditors, funeral expenses of $896 are not extravagant, although he left but $2,800, he having had a large number of friends who attended the funeral. Howard's Estate, 27 Pa. Co. Ct. 608.

And an allowance of $381.50 for funeral expenses of one who never earned large wages, but left $7,000 or $8,000 has been held proper where incurred in good faith. Re Meuschke, 61 Misc. 9, 114 N. Y. Supp. 722.

And an item of $144.75, including the expense of the funeral and of the masses at the church, was allowed in White's Estate, 13 Phila. 287.

So, an estate appraised at $2,400 warrants an allowance of $2 for funeral notices, $14 for carriages, and $15 for hearse and caring for body. Re Osburn, 36 Or. 8, 58 Pac. 521.

Flowers to the value of $15, ordered by deceased's housekeeper, may be charged as a funeral expense where he left no widow or children, and his estate was valued at $6,000. O'Reilly v. Kelly, 22 R. I. 151, 50 L.R.A. 483, 84 Am. St. Rep. 833, 46 Atl. 681.

In Carpenter's Estate, 16 Phila. 290, where an estate of about $400 apparently was insolvent, an allowance of $218 for funeral expenses was made, which included an item of $69.50 incurred in taking deceased's body to another state for burial. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

motion was made to strike the bill of exceptions from the files, which motion was overruled, and the case heard upon its merits. The circuit court dismissed the petition in error, and gave judgment for the defendant in error. In this proceeding the plaintiff in error seeks to reverse the judgments of the circuit court and court of common pleas.

Mr. H. L. Peeke, for plaintiff in error:

It was the duty of the probate court to examine the account of the administrator, and to reject any improper items or unreasonable charges.

1 Rockel, Probate Pr. ¶ 733, p. 656; Giaugue, Settlement of Estate, p. 569; 18 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1171; Woerner, Administra-

Allowances of $200 to an undertaker, $58 for burial lot and church services, and $30 for carriages, are liberal where the deceased, a domestic, left about $2,800. Campbell's Estate, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 729.

An executor is entitled to an allowance of $202.25 for funeral expenses, although the will provided for only $100, where he did not know of the provision until after the funeral, and the several items had been proved and allowed by the probate judge. Re Galland, 92 Cal. 293, 28 Pac. 287.

In Hasson's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 19, a charge of $477.75 for the burial of a domestic servant who left but about $2,000 was held excessive, although authorized by the administrator, where the circumstances were sufficient to have put the undertaker on inquiry.

So, where the slightest inquiry would have disclosed to an undertaker that deceased was worth only about $800, a claim of $331 for funeral expenses will be cut to $225, notwithstanding a relative of deceased, who was a minor, had told him not to mind the expense. Bauman's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 579.

And where a domestic servant left an estate of only $1,167.36, the sum of $810.90 charged by an undertaker requested by deceased's brother to take out letters of administration and furnish a first-class funeral is exorbitant, and will not be allowed. Cullen's Estate, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 304. The court in this case said: "And it is time it is clearly understood that only such a sum will be allowed for funeral expenses, cost of cemetery lot, erection of monument, etc., as will bear a just, fair, and reasonable proportion to the amount of the estate of the decedent and his or her station in life. Undertakers should also realize they take the risk of the estate proving insolvent, in which case, as against creditors, they will be held strictly to the requirements of the rule."

So, an allowance of $455 out of an undertaker's bill for $526, for the burial of an aged janitor whose companions were laboring men and whose estate was less than $5,000, is excessive. Foley v. Brocksmit, tion, ¶ 539, p. 1186; Re Sanderson, 74 Cal. 199, 15 Pac. 753.

The bill of the undertaker for $201.40 out of an estate of less than $800 was unreasonable, especially when no burial lot or tombstone was provided.

Messrs. Williams & Steinemann for defendant in error.

Davis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is objected that the circuit court erred in refusing to strike off the bill of exceptions taken in the court of common pleas by the plaintiff in error, for the reason that the defendant in error did not have the ten days provided by § 5301, Rev. Stat., in which to file his objections and amendments to the bill of exceptions. The presumption is that notice was given to counsel and that they had an opportunity to inspect and object to the bill, although the record is silent as to that fact. It does not appear that counsel did not waive the right to object to the bill within ten days after notice that it had been filed with the clerk. State v. Wirick, 81 Ohio St. 343, 90 N. E. 937.

There is scarcely any room for debate, and none is attempted here, as to the rule which governs in making an allowance out of an estate for funeral expenses. "The amount which will be allowed for funeral expenses, in the absence of statutory or testamentary provisions, is governed by the value of the decedent's estate, his station in life, and the customs of people of the same station; but the expenditure must in all cases be reasonable, and, if extravagant, will be disallowed, even as against the legatees and next of kin." 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1263; 18 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 438; Schouler, Exrs. 3d ed. § 421; 2 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, 2d ed. § 360; 1 Rockel, Ohio Pro-

And where the deceased infant's estate amounted only to between six and seven thousand dollars, the court, in Re Kiernan, 38 Misc. 394, 77 N. Y. Supp. 924, reduced the charge for a casket from $490 to $175.

An item of $950 for the entertaining of friends attending a funeral is not allowable as part of the funeral expenses. Bard's Estate, 13 Pa. Dist R. 552.

—tombstones.

Where deceased's estate consisted of two houses and $273 personalty, and there were no creditors, a credit of $1,100 for a gravestone was allowed. Geiger's Estate, 12 W. N. C. 439.

So, an allowance of $450 for the construction of a vault and an allowance for repair have been held proper. Re Fishbeck (Knapp v. Jessup) 146 Mich. 348, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 617, 117 Am. St. Rep. 646, 109 N. W. 666.

And an allowance of $150 for a monument was authorized in Phillips v. Duckett, 112 Ill. App. 587, where the estate was solvent and several heirs consented.

In Conway's Estate, 10 Pa. Dist. R. 509, an allowance of $700 for a tombstone was sustained where the deceased was an unmarried clergyman and left $2,500.

So, an allowance of $50 for a monument was held authorized in Re Meuschke, 61 Misc. 9, 114 N. Y. Supp. 722, where the deceased left about $8,000.

In Sheetz's Estate, 2 Woodw. Dec. 405, where the executor claimed $470.50 for a monument and iron railing around the deceased's lot, he was allowed half the cost of the monument, and his claim for the iron fence was disallowed, as was also a charge of $55 for a monument placed over the remains of deceased's first wife.

And in Jackson v. Leech, 113 Mich. 391, 71 N. W. 846, $250 was evidently allowed for a tombstone.

Where the net value of deceased's estate was over $10,000, an allowance of $470 for a burial lot, $200 for fencing, and $35 for sodding, was held reasonable and allowable in Re Liss, 39 Misc. 123, 78 N. Y. Supp. 969.

And $307 has been allowed under the Massachusetts statute authorizing an allowance for a burial lot, about one half the amount being for the lot and the balance for perpetual care. Pettengill v. Abbott, 167 Mass. 307, 45 N. E. 748.

And an allowance of $613 for a burial lot, with perpetual care, was approved in Marple v. Morse, 180 Mass. 508, 62 N. E. 966, where that was the usual price in the cemetery where the deceased had expressed a desire to be buried.

See infra, section on "Insolvent estates."

Miscellaneous.

An expenditure for flowers to place on deceased's grave was held not a funeral expense, in Re Schroeder, 113 App. Div. 204, 99 N. Y. Supp. 176, affirmed in 186 N. Y. 537, 78 N. E. 1112.

For a case allowing expense for flowers, bate Pr. § 650; Giaque, Settlement of Estates, 7th ed. 615-617. But it is insisted here (1) that the plaintiff in error is estopped; (2) that this court is concluded by the findings of the court below; and (3) that the amount paid by the administrator for funeral expenses was reasonable.

If we may admit that the liability of the administrator may be limited, and the conscience of the court circumscribed by the assent of the sole beneficiary of the decedent's will, grudgingly given and almost extorted, still it does not appear to us that the defendant in error has made out a case of estoppel against the plaintiff in error. While it is true that one who, having a right, induces another to act on the belief that the right will not be asserted, will not be afterwards allowed to exercise it, and while it is also true that one may estop himself by acquiescence or by silence when he ought to speak, nevertheless it is true that the burden is upon the party who relies on the estoppel, to prove clearly and unequivocally every fact essential to the estoppel. 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 424; 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 811, 812. Now, in this case the defendant in error, who is claiming an estoppel against the plaintiff in error, was the superior in knowledge and experience of the duties of an administrator. He testifies that when the plaintiff in error came to the undertaker's, the Odd Fellows had already practically purchased the casket; and he and other witnesses testify that the plaintiff in error consented to, or at least silently acquiesced in, the purchase. Yet they all admit that she objected on the ground that the deceased never believed in expensive funerals, and she wanted a cheaper casket, say, from $60 to $90. The plaintiff in error explicitly and circumstantially denies that she assented to the purchase which was made, and her denial, and the circumstances surrounding the transaction, raise such a sharp conflict of evidence that we are unable to say that the facts which are claimed to amount to estoppel are clearly and satisfactorily proven. The estoppel therefore fails.

Next, it is claimed that the finding of the circuit court is a finding of fact, and therefore conclusive upon us. Ordinarily, an issue as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of anything is regarded as a mixed question of law and fact; but where the facts see O'Reilly v. Kelly, supra, section on "Amount allowable."

A claim for the expense of a wake was disallowed in White's Estate, 13 Phila. 287.

But where the expenditures for cheese and crackers and tobacco for a wake were reasonable, they were held allowable as funeral expenses, in Johnson's Estate, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 1.

And in McCullough v. McCready, 52 Misc. 542, 102 N. Y. Supp. 633, affirmed in 122 App. Div. 888, 106 N. Y. Supp. 1135, it was held that an expenditure of $71.25 for provisions for consumption at a wake might be allowed where it was suitable to decedent's condition in life.

In Reeve's Estate, 12 Kulp, 137, credit was allowed for providing dinner for friends and relatives of deceased who came to the funeral from a distance.

But it was held in Santee's Estate, 9 Kulp, 142, that no allowance would be made for serving dinner and supper to those who attended the funeral nor for the care and feed of such persons' horses. See also Bard's Estate, under section on "Amounts allowable."

And an allowance for paying the fare of executrix, her brother, sister, and husband to attend the funeral was refused in Price Estate. 11 Kulp, 259.

In Hasler v. Hasler, 1 Bradf. 248, the administrator was allowed an expense of $12 for communicating the news of deceased's suicide to his relatives by special messenger, and also the necessary expenses of interment.

And where an estate is ample, the reasonable expenses of embalming deceased's body 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) and transporting it from India, where he died, to Philadelphia, are allowable. Parry's Estate, 188 Pa. 38, 68 Am. St. Rep. 850, 41 Atl. 384.

It was held in Foley v. Brocksmit, 119 Iowa, 457, 60 L.R.A. 571, 97 Am. St. Rep. 324, 93 N. W. 344, that a witness's estimate of the reasonableness of the expenses of a funeral is not binding on either the jury or court.

Insolvent estates.

It was held in Re Rooney, 3 Redf. 15, that an undertaker who furnished a funeral, judging from appearance, suitable to deceased's condition in life, was entitled to an allowance therefor, although the estate was insolvent.

And there are dicta in Phillips v. Duckett, 112 Ill. App. 587, that an allowance for a modest tombstone might be proper although the estate is insolvent.

But credit for a tombstone was refused in Villee's Estate, 9 Lanc. L. Rev. 353, where the estate was insolvent, and to the same effect is Moyer's Estate, 5 Kulp, 167.

And in Burbridge v. Rogers, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 42, it was held that $575 would not be allowed for a tombstone where the estate was insolvent.

And it was held in Hearing's Succession, 28 La. Ann. 149, where the succession was insolvent, that an item of $249 for funeral expenses should be reduced to $200, this being the largest amount which the court was authorized to allow. See also Carpenter's Estate, supra, section on "Amount allowable."

are clear and undisputed, it is to be regarded as purely a question of law. For example, in Tindal v. Brown, 1 T. R. 167, it was held that what is reasonable notice of nonpayment to an indorser is a question of law; and Lord Mansfield said: "What is reasonable notice is partly a question of fact and partly a question of law. It may depend in some measure on facts; such as the distance at which the parties live from each other, the course of the posts, etc. But wherever a rule can be laid down with respect to this reasonableness, that should be decided by the court, and adhered to by everyone for the sake of certainty." And in the same case Buller, J., remarked: "Whether the post goes out this or that day, at what time, etc., are matters of fact; but when those facts are established, it then becomes a question of law, on those facts, what notice shall be reasonable."

The same principle has been recognized in determining whether a rule of a railway company was a reasonable regulation. In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Adcock, 52 Ark. 406, 12 S. W. 874, it was said per curiam: The facts being uncontroverted, it was the province of the court to declare the regulations reasonable. To submit the question to the jury for determination, under such circumstances, was simply to leave the matter to their discretion, which was error." See also, Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Hammond, 58 Ark. 324, 24 S. W. 723; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Whittemore, 43 Ill. 420, 92 Am. Dec. 138; Vedder v. Fellows, 20 N. Y. 126; Hoffbauer v. Davenport & N. W. R. Co. 52 Iowa, 342, 35 Am. Rep. 278, 3 N. W. 121; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lyon, 123 Pa. 140, 2 L.R.A. 489, 10 Am. St. Rep. 517, 16 Atl. 607.

A similar rule was announced as to deviation in a marine insurance case. Riggin v. Patapsco Ins. Co. 7 Harr. & J. 279, 16 Am. Dec. 302. What is a reasonable time within which an act must be done may be a question of law. "Where the facts are clearly established, or are undisputed or admitted, reasonable time is a question of law." Hill v. Hobart, 16 Me. 164.

Where a statute imposed a penalty for issuing a marriage license without reasonable inquiry, it was held that the question as to what is reasonable inquiry, under a known state of facts, is one of law for the court. Trolinger v. Boroughs, 133 N. C. 312, 45 S. E. 662. Further statements of the rule and illustrations of its application by this court will be found in Walker v. Stetson, 14 Ohio St. 89, 84 Am. Dec. 362; Bassenhorst v. Wilby, 45 Ohio St. 333, 13 N. E. 75, and Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Myers, 62 Ohio St. 529, 49 L.R.A. 760, 57 N. E. 458.

and clearly proven facts disclosed in this record, it is within the proper province of this court to review the finding of the court below as to the reasonableness of the amount expended by the administrator for burial of the decedent.

The whole amount realized from the decedent's estate was $798.32, and the administrator claims credit for $201.40 paid for funeral expenses, of which the following item is most seriously contested, viz.: "One cloth casket, copper lined, with silver handles, engraved name plate, and use of car, $150.00." The deceased was an old man, with no immediate family surviving, and, in his later years, with no stated income or occupation. He had been a sailor on the lakes and an engineer in small steamers. His tastes and habits were simple, and his expenditures modest and economical. A short time before his death he had been an inmate of the Odd Fellows' Home at Springfield, Ohio, and at the time of his death, by suicide, he was living at a place called the Kunzman Hotel. For reasons satisfactory to himself, and which afterwards seemed sufficient to a court, he made a will making the plaintiff in error his sole legatee, and excluding his collateral relatives. A committee of Odd Fellows assumed charge of the funeral, and this committee, and some of the disappointed relatives, proceeded to order the funeral and select the casket, although they had been previously apprised of the fact that the deceased had left a will, and that the plaintiff in error was the sole legatee. The administrator called in the plaintiff in error, and, while it is a disputed question whether she consented to the purchase of this casket or not, it is not denied that she did object to it as inappropriate and unnecessarily expensive. The administrator appears to have been a person having knowledge of the usual duties of an administrator, for he had been a clerk in the office of the probate judge. He was there as a trustee for creditors and the legatee. He was not bound to listen to the desires and importunities of persons who desired to be liberal with money which was not theirs to spend. He is presumed to have known the law, and that, no matter who desired it or who assented to it, his act in purchasing that casket was liable to be reviewed, either with or without exceptions, by the probate court when he should account for the assets of the estate. According to the testimony of the undertaker himself, a decent and respectable burial, with broadcloth-covered casket, mounted with silver handles and name plate, may be had for $75, and even less. In view of all of these circumstances, and especially of the fact that the cost of this funeral was made to be one fourth of the entire estate, we think that the amount allowed by the court of common pleas and affirmed by the circuit court should be reduced to $100, the amount allowed by the probate court.

Judgment accordingly.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

THOMAS A. DEROSIA

v.

PETER FIRLAND.

(— Vt. —, 76 Atl. 153.)

Master — discharged servant — recovery for term.

1. A discharged employee cannot await the termination of the contract period of serv-

Note. — Right of wrongfully discharged servant to recover wages for contract period subsequent to discharge.

This subject is treated in a note in 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 439. A few cases in point have appeared since the preparation of that note.

In Chase v. Alaska F. & L. Co. 2 Alaska, 82; Durante v. Raimon, 115 N. Y. Supp. 115; Quick v. Swing, 53 Or. 149, 99 Pac. 418, and DEROSIA v. FIRLAND it is held in effect that the remedy by an employee wrongfully discharged before the expiration of the term is not assumpsit to recover for wages for the balance of the term, on the ground of constructive services, but is an action for damages for breach of the contract.

In G. A. Kelly Plow Co. v. London (Tex. Civ. App.) 125 S. W. 974, the court, in discussing the question of measure of damages for wrongful discharge, said that actions of this class are not suits to recover unpaid wages, but are for damages, and compensation for the injuries sustained is the object sought. But in this case the action seems to have been brought in the latter form, so that the court was not called upon to pass on the question whether an action in the form of assumpsit to recover wages could have been maintained.

The contrary is held in Blumenthal v. Bridges (Bluthenthal v. Bridges) 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 279, 91 Ark. 212, 120 S. W. 974, and apparently also in Allen v. Chicago Pneumatic Tool Co. 205 Mass. 569, 91 N. E. 887: The contrary is also held in Thurmond v. Skannal, 118 La. 6, 42 So. 577, probably by virtue of the Louisiana statute on the subject, though the statute is not expressly referred to (See page 453 of earlier note.)

ice to hold the employer liable for the wages which would have accrued had he continued in the service to the expiration of the term.

Pleading — suit for wages — amendment.

2. The declaration in an action to recover for services rendered under a contract for labor cannot be amended so as to claim damages for a wrongful discharge from the service.

(May 7, 1910.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Franklin County Court made during the trial of an action brought to recover wages alleged to be due under an employment contract which resulted in a judgment for plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. W. Steele, for defendant:

A servant cannot recover on the common counts for work and labor done and performed, without showing that he has per-

N. W. 48, also seems to recognize the right of a wrongfully discharged employee to recover as for salary for the portion of the term of employment remaining after the discharge, though it is not entirely clear from the report of the case whether the decision in favor of the plaintiff was on the ground that the action could be maintained in that form, or upon the ground that a cause of action for damages from the wrongful discharge was sufficiently stated by the declaration, which alleged the readiness of plaintiff to continue in the performance of the duties of his employment and the refusal of the defendant to pay. In this connection it is to be noted, as pointed out in the note to Howay v. Going-Northrup Co. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 68, that by liberal construction a complaint or declaration which contains allegations appropriate to an action for wages on the ground of constructive services may, under some circumstances, be upheld as a complaint for damages for the wrongful discharge.

So, in Quick v. Swing, supra, a complaint which did not specifically aver that the plaintiff had been damaged by the wrongful discharge, but, after stating the facts as to the employment and discharge, concluded with a demand for judgment for a specified amount of money, was upheld, in the absence of a demurrer, upon the ground that it sufficiently stated a cause of action for damages.

The remedy of a wrongfully discharged servant by action for damages for breach of contract is treated in a note in 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 50; the remedy of wrongfully discharged servant with respect to services actually rendered in a note in 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 579; and the rights and remedies of servant discharged for good cause in a note 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 524.

G. H. P.

formed work or labor for the defendant at his request, either expressed or implied.

Curtis v. Smith, 48 Vt. 116.

In order to maintain an action for wages, the plaintiff must have completely performed the work and fully complied with all the conditions of the executory contract, so that nothing remained to be done but payment of money.

Peeters v. Opie, 2 Wm.'s Saund. 350, note (2); Bradley v. Phillips, 52 Vt. 517; Davis v. Streeter, 75 Vt. 214, 54 Atl. 185.

And, if the plaintiff has not completely performed the work, it is necessary to declare specially if the defendant has wrongfully prevented him from performing his part of the contract.

1 Chitty, Pl. p. 360; Hulle v. Heightman, 2 East, 145; Appleby v. Dods, 8 East, 300.

As there was a positive and unqualified renunciation of the contract on the part of the defendant on account of the sale of the store, and not a mere expression of an intention not to perform, the plaintiff was discharged from the continued performance of his promise and entitled to sue at once for the breach.

Hosmer v. Wilson, 7 Mich. 294, 74 Am. Dec. 716; Smith v. Lewis, 24 Conn. 624, 63 Am. Dec. 180; Haines v. Tucker, 50 N. H. 311; Clement & H. Mfg. Co. v. Meserole, 107 Mass. 362; Parker v. Russell, 133 Mass. 74; Bassett v. Bassett, 55 Me. 127.

One party to an executory contract has the power to stop performance on the other side, by an explicit direction to that effect, always subjecting himself to such damages as will compensate the other party to the compact; and the party thus forbidden or dismissed cannot go on and complete the contract and at the end recover the contract price as such; his only remedy being for breach of contract.

1 Chitty, Pl. 360; Derby v. Johnson, 21 Vt. 17; Danforth v. Walker, 37 Vt. 240; Morgan v. Tucker, 78 Vt. 56, 61 Atl. 863; White v. Lumiere North American Co. 79 Vt. 206, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 807, 64 Atl. 1121; Clark v. Marsiglia, 1 Denio, 317, 43 Am. Dec. 670; Lord v. Thomas, 64 N. Y. 107; *Gibbons v. If a party be hired as a servant or clerk for a specific period, and in part perform the service and be ready to complete it, but be prevented from so doing by the employer, the wages or salary for the whole term cannot be recovered upon the indebitatus count.

Messrs. C. G. Austin & Sons, for plaintiff:

A servant wrongfully discharged before the end of the employment, under an entire contract for services, at an entire salary, payable in instalments, may wait until the termination of the time for which he was hired, and then maintain indebitatus assumpsit for wages under the contract.

The declaration is common counts in assumpsit. Plea, the general issue.

The plaintiff claimed, and his evidence tended to show, that on August 12, 1907, he made a contract with the defendant whereby he was to work for the defendant as clerk and salesman in his store at Highgate Center for the term of one year from that date, for the sum of $468, payable in instalments of $9 per week, with the agreement that he should be given employment for the full term; that when the plaintiff had worked 8½ weeks the defendant sold his stock in the store to one Loukes, notified the plaintiff that he had no more work for him, and paid him in full for the services he had performed; that the plaintiff remained at Highgate Center during the entire year, ready and willing to work for the defendant, but was not furnished with more work, and was paid nothing by him after the time of the dismissal; that during the remainder of the year the plaintiff did some work under other employment, and, deducting what he received therefor, together with the sums received of the defendant for the services actually performed, seeks to recover here the "balance due on services" for the full term of the contract, this suit being brought after the termination of that period. It was claimed in defense, and the defendant's evidence tended to show, that he did not hire the plaintiff for the term of one year, but did hire him by the week, and paid him up to the time he was discharged. The defendant seasonably objected and excepted to the admission of any and all evidence in support of the plaintiff's claim, on the ground that the declaration is general assumpsit, and not special for breach of the contract, and at the close of the evidence the defendant moved for a verdict; for that since the testimony on both sides shows that the plaintiff was paid his wages in full up to the time of his dismissal, no recovery can be had under the common counts in assumpsit. This motion was overruled, and an exception saved.

The plaintiff contends for and relies upon the doctrine laid down in Gandell v. Pontiguy, 4 Campb. 375, 1 Starkie, 198. There the action was indebitatus assumpsit for work and labor, with the common money counts. The plaintiff, employed by the defendant at a yearly salary payable quarterly, was discharged from his service about the middle of a quarter, and paid for the half quarter worked. Thereupon the plaintiff denied the defendant's power to discharge him in the middle of a quarter, and the next day made an offer to do the duties of the situation, which the defendant declined. Lord Ellenborough said, if the plaintiff was discharged without a sufficient cause, the action was maintainable. "Having served a part of the quarter and being willing to serve the residue, in contemplation of law, he may be considered to have served the whole." The doctrine of constructive service there laid down was followed in Collins v. Price, 5 Bing. 132, 30 Revised Rep. 542, and in other English cases. It was repudiated, however, by Lord Tenterden in Archard v. Hornor, 3 Car. & P. 349, as early as 1828. There the first count was special on a contract by which the plaintiff agreed that he and his wife would become the servants of the defendant at certain wages, and the defendant undertook, etc., to continue them in such service until the expiration of one year. Breach, that the defendant discharged them, without warning, before the year had expired. Pleas, nonassumpsit to the special counts, also to the other counts as to all but the sum of £11, and a tender of that sum. The tender was for the time of actual service. The plaintiff and his wife entered upon the performance of the contract in the month of December, and were discharged on the 6th day of February following. The plaintiff claimed wages for the time he had served, and for a quarter more. The evidence did not support the contract declared upon, but instead thereof showed a contract terminable at a month's notice. Consequently it was held that there could be no recovery on the special counts. And his lordship further held that wages could not be recovered, under the common count, for any more of the time than the plaintiff had actually served. In 1837 the case of Smith v. Hayward, 7 Ad. & El. 544, was heard before the court of King's bench. The declaration contained a special count which was not proved, and counts for work and labor, and on an account stated. Plea, nonassumpsit, and payment into court of £4 on the account for work and labor. The defendant employed the plaintiff for a quarter of a year and paid him therefor. The jury found that the agreement was subject to three months' notice. The plaintiff completed that quarter; but when he had worked some more than half a month on the second quarter he was dismissed by the defendant. The action was commenced three days later, the plaintiff having first offered to complete the second quarter's service. The money was paid into court as due for the time of actual service after the expiration of the first quarter. The plaintiff claimed pay for the whole quarter from that period. It was held that the action was brought too soon for any question to arise on this point. But in discussing the matter, Lord Chief Justice Denman said he thought the rule was granted for the purpose of bringing the case of Gandell v. Pontiguy into question; that the view taken by Lord Ellenborough of the point there decided was different from that which Lord Tenterden took of the same point in Archard v. Hornor, and, "if we were bound to decide between the two authorities, I should say that the later case is grounded on the better reason. There is obviously a great difference between suing for a breach of contract in dismissing the plaintiff and for work and labor which, by reason of the dismissal, has not been performed. The defense in the last case would be the nonperformance of the work; in the other, some excuse for breaking off the contract." The other three justices expressed themselves to the same effect. In 1847 the case of Fewings v. Tisdal, 5 Dowl. & L. 196, 1 Exch. 295, came before the court of exchequer. The declaration was indebitatus assumpsit for work and labor as a hired servant, and on an account stated. Plea, nonassumpsit. The plaintiff, when in the defendant's employ, was dismissed without previous warning, and was paid her wages up to the time of dismissal. The action was brought to recover a month's wages, commencing from the day of her discharge. The undersheriff nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground that the declaration should have been special, and that she could not recover under the common count for work and labor. The rule was discharged, Lord Chief Baron Pollock saying he regretted that the party was unable to recover her claim "in this form of count; it is not the proper form, but it should have been a special one. The case of Archard v. Hornor governs the present; it has been recognized by all the courts, and has been acted upon in this court, in the case of Broxham v. Wagstaffe, 5 Jur. 845." Barons Parke and Alderson concurred therein, the former saying: "The good sense of the matter is to be found in Archard v. Hornor, which was afterwards confirmed by the court of the Queen's bench in the case of Smith v. Hayward, and also by this court." In Emmens v. Elderton, 13 C. B. 495, 4 H. L. Cas. 624, Mr. Justice Crompton of the exchequer chamber wrote as follows: "The result of the modern authorities, as to the remedies of a servant wrongfully discharged, is well discussed in the passage in Smith's Leading Cases. . . . He is said to have the election of treating the contract as continuing, and suing for damages for the breach by the discharge; or of treating it as, and acquiescing in its being, rescinded by the wrongful act of the master, and bringing an action on the quantum meruit for the work actually performed; and, it is added, that he may wait till the termination of the period for which he was hired, and may then, perhaps, sue in indebitatus assumpsit for the whole wages, relying on the doctrine of constructive service. It is clear, since the decision of Fewings v. Tisdal, that this last remedy cannot be maintained in the shape of indebitatus assumpsit, for the simple reason that the allegation of his being indebted for work done is untrue." To the same effect are Goodman v. Pocock, 15 Q. B. 576; Wood v. Moyes, 1 Week. Rep. 166.

The exact question now presented does not seem to have been directly passed upon by this court. Yet in several cases determined by it kindred questions have been involved, and the decisions rendered are consonant with the rule which finally obtained in England, and are quite controlling in the case before us. In Derby v. Johnson, 21 Vt. 17, the action was book account, and the plaintiff presented an account for labor performed, and for materials furnished, by them, in the prosecution of work under a special contract by which the plaintiffs agreed with the defendants to do all the stone work and blasting on a certain piece of railroad, at prices specified. After the plaintiffs had worked a month in performance, the defendants directed and requested them to cease labor and to abandon the further execution of the contract, in consequence of which the plaintiffs immediately ceased laboring under the contract and abandoned its further execution. The auditor, finding that the items of plaintiff's account were reasonably and properly charged, upon the facts reported, submitted to the court the question whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and, if so, what amount. It was insisted by the defendants that their request and direction to the plaintiffs to cease work and abandon the execution of the contract should be considered in the light of a proposition which the plaintiffs were at liberty to accede to or disregard, and that, having acquiesced therein by quitting the work, the contract was to be treated as having been relinquished by the mutual consent of the parties. Thus the power of the employers to stop the execution of the contract by the employees, and the right of the latter to recover for services performed, were questions before the court. It was held that the direction of the defendants to the plaintiffs to quit the work was positive and unequivocal; that the employer in a contract for labor has the power to stop the completion of it, if he choose, subjecting himself thereby to the consequences of a violation of the contract; that the workman, after notice to quit, has no right to continue his labor and claim pay for it; that the plaintiffs, having been prevented from executing their part of the contract by the act of the defendants, were entitled to recover, as upon a quantum meruit, the value of the services they had performed under it, without reference to the rate of compensation specified in the contract; and that they might, in addition thereto, in another form of action, have recovered their damages for being prevented from completing the whole work. In Sherman v. Champlain Transp. Co. 31 Vt. 162, by the contract declared upon, the defendants were allowed to use, on two of their steamers, two machines, known as "Sickles' Patent Cut-Off," belonging to the plaintiff, and a patent right, known as "Stevens' Patent Cut-Off," also owned by the plaintiff, on another of their steamers, for an agreed sum per annum, so long as defendants continued to use said machine and said patent right. The company used the machines and the patent right for some seasons, paying therefor according to the contract, and then notified the plaintiff that they would not pay him anything further for the use of the cut-offs, but continued to use them the same as before the giving of such notice. It was urged that the company had the right to repudiate the contract, and refuse to suffer the other party to proceed under it, and thereby subject itself to damages for breach of the contract. The court said that, in cases of hiring, either party may always put an end to the contract by violating its terms, and only becomes liable for damages for the breach of the contract; stating in support thereof the rule declared in the later English cases to which we have made reference. It seemed to the court at first blush that this principle of law was applicable to the case, but upon more reflection it was determined otherwise, because of the peculiar species of the contract, and the defendants should not be allowed to repudiate it in part, and not in toto.

Perhaps it cannot be said that the court's statement of the law respecting the right of a party to terminate a contract of hiring, and the resulting liability, was essential to the disposition of that case, yet it was an expression of opinion upon a point argued by counsel and deliberately passed upon by the court; and if it is a dictum, it is "a judicial dictum as distinguished from a mere obiter dictum; i. e., an expression originating along with the judge writing the opinion, as an argument or illustration." [1 Bouvier, Law Dict. 568]. Rhoads v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 227 Ill. 328, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 623, 81 N. E. 371, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 111; Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 102 Wis. 137, 44 L.R.A. 579, 77 N. W. 748, 78 N. W. 771.

In Chamberlin v. Scott, 33 Vt. 80, the declaration contained a general count for work and labor, and a special count upon the contract. By the contract the plaintiff agreed to draw for the defendant, from premises described, a lot of timber, and deliver such portion thereof as the defendants should direct on board of the cars at a certain depot, and deliver the rest at one of the sawmills named as the defendants should direct, the whole job to be finished by a day specified. The evidence showed that the plaintiffs completed the drawing of the timber before the expiration of the time limited, but, as the defendant failed to furnish cars upon which to load the timber drawn to the depot until after that time had expired, they did not load it. The court reiterated the principles of law enunciated in Derby v. Johnson, as having been recognized in this state, and held accordingly. In White v. Lumiere North American Co. 70 Vt. 206, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 807, 64 Atl. 1121, the declaration was special to recover damages for breach of contract in dismissing the plaintiff without cause when in performance of his duties, and before the end of the period for which he was employed. The defendant excepted to the charge to the jury, that the consummation of the lease for a term which exceeded the plaintiff's employment, by the terms of which all the plant, property, and business of the defendant passed into the hands of the lessee, was a breach of the contract, entitling the plaintiff to maintain the action, unless his subsequent conduct precluded him from setting that up as a breach. This part of the charge was held to be without error, except that the last and modifying clause, relating to plaintiff's subsequent conduct, was erroneous, consequent on the further holding that the defendant had the power to dismiss the plaintiff without cause, by subjecting itself to damages for a breach of the contract, and the plaintiff was not at liberty to disregard the dismissal by continuing his labor and claiming pay therefor after notice of his discharge. The propositions of law there stated by the court were necessarily involved in the determination of the case, and consequently they are of the doctrine of the case for which the decision is authority.

Four cases from this court are cited and relied upon by the plaintiff in support of his position; but an examination shows them severally to be in harmony with those to which we have made reference. Thus, Boardman v. Keeler, 21 Vt. 77, was debt on bond, and general counts for work and labor. The plaintiff's intestate, Paro, executed a promissory note by which he promised to make for the defendant and deliver at his store four instalments of a certain number of pairs of boots, each by a day named, Paro to find pegs and wax, and the defendant "to find the rest of the stock." The condition of the bond was that, if Paro should perform the services specified in the note, and the defendant should, within ten days after "full payment" thereof, execute and deliver to Paro, or his assigns, a good and valid deed of certain premises, then the bond should be void; but otherwise, in force. Paro complied with the provisions of the note as to the first three instalments, also as to a portion of the fourth. The assignee of the bond, within the time allowed by the contract, demanded of the defendant the leather of which to make the rest of the boots due on the note; whereupon the defendant furnished leather for part of the boots so due, and refused to furnish more, leaving thirty-four pairs still due at the expiration of the time limited. It was considered that the case showed in substance a tender of the service according to the contract, and a refusal of it by the defendant, in refusing to furnish the essential leather as demanded; and "that the tender, wrongfully refused, should have the effect of actual performance, so far as to give a right of action on the bond." The plaintiff before us relies upon the holding shown by the clause here quoted, as a precedent in his favor. Yet not only is the force of the holding limited by the concluding modifying clause, but it clearly appears from the context that the court then understood, and made it plain, that the holding could have no application to the question of a right to recover for constructive service. The court below charged the jury that the measure of damages was the value of the land at the time it should have been conveyed, with interest thereon. The rule there laid down was held to be, in general, the proper one when the entire consideration for the conveyance has been received by the party who is to give the deed; yet in the circumstances there shown the measure of damages was the value of the land only in proportion as the land had been paid for; the court saying: "But a mere tender of service operates no actual benefit to the other party. And though, if he wrongfully refuse it, he may forfeit any consideration previously advanced in payment for the service, it is another question whether he is bound to render the same prospective compensation as if the service had in fact been performed. No principle of equal and exact justice would appear to indicate such a rule. . . . The just distinction is between a consideration already advanced for the service, and a payment to be made for it after performance. The first may probably be forfeited by a wrongful refusal of the service when duly tendered. But in the latter case, though the party tendering the service will be entitled to sue upon the contract, yet the recovery should be restricted to the extent of his actual damages." Paul v. School Dist. No. 2, 28 Vt. 575, was an action in assumpsit to recover for services rendered in teaching school, and damages for not being permitted to continue for the full term of the contract. The plaintiff being dismissed after part performance, it was held that, unless incompetency or unfaithfulness be shown, he could not be deprived of his right to complete the performance, without a claim to damages resulting from such breach of the contract. Cashen v. School Dist. No. 12, 50 Vt. 30, was in book account. When she had taught school in defendant district twenty-three days, in part performance of her contract for the term of twelve weeks, the schoolhouse was burned. After the fire, but on the same day, the plaintiff was told by the prudential committee that if he could get a place for the school she should go on with it; and she, not being discharged from the contract, nor it repudiated in any way, held herself in readiness to go on with the work through the entire term. She was given to understand that she was expected to be ready and able to resume her service of teaching, it being treated as contingent at most whether a place would be provided for a continuation of the school. It was held that she performed the service of her employment in just the way the employer enabled and required her to do it, and that she was entitled to be paid according to the terms of the contract. And Davis v. Streeter, 75 Vt. 214, 54 Atl. 185, the last of the four cases from this court on which the plaintiff relies, was an action of general assumpsit. There, the evidence tended to show that the plaintiff rendered services by way of work and labor for the defendant under a special contract which he forced her to abandon before complete performance. It was held that this evidence tended to support a quantum meruit recovery under the general count for such services performed.

No case has been called to our attention, and we have found none, in which the doctrine of constructive service has been applied, or recognized as law, in this state. On the contrary, we think the decisions of this court to which reference has been made, some of them precedential in nature, show the law here to be that a servant who was dismissed, during his performance of an entire contract, by the master, without cause, cannot, by waiting until the end of the term for which he was employed, sue for and collect wages, as such, for the portion of the term after the time of his dismissal. As before seen, the law does not permit a servant to continue to work and claim pay for it after his discharge. To allow him to do so would be inconsistent with the right of the master to stop performance by the servant, by taking upon himself the liability for resulting damages. How much more inconsistent would it be to say that, when no work is subsequently done by the servant, he may bring indebitatus assumpsit, and recover for constructive service? The reason given by Mr. Justice Crompton why such a remedy cannot be maintained, that the allegation of the master's being indebted for work done is untrue, is substantiated by the holding of this court in Curtis v. Smith, 48 Vt. 116, that a plaintiff cannot recover on the common count for work and labor done and performed, without showing that he has performed work and labor for the defendant at his request, either expressed or implied. It follows that the defendant's motion for a verdict should have been granted.

The plaintiff says, however, that the parties were heard on their evidence the same as they would have been had the declaration been special for damages, and hence, on the authority of Chaffee v. Rutland R. Co. 71 Vt. 384, 45 Atl. 750, an amendment of the declaration should be permitted by filing a special count to conform to the proof in this respect, and that on filing the same the judgment should be affirmed. The defendant objects thereto, denying that the case was fully heard on questions which would arise in a trial for damages. Regardless of the range of the evidence, leave to file such new count cannot be granted. As seen, to entitle the plaintiff to recover in the present case he must show that he performed work and labor for the defendant at his request; while in an action for damages for breach of the contract—the plaintiff's only available remedy—he would need to prove not that he performed such services, but that he was prevented by the defendant from so doing in completion of the existing contract between them. Clearly the causes of action are not the same, and the declaration cannot be amended to give the latter remedy. Brodek & Co. v. Hirschfield, 57 Vt. 12; Estabrooks v. Fidelity Mut. F. Ins. Co. 74 Vt. 202, 52 Atl. 420. And, since this suit cannot be maintained on any declaration which may be filed in amendment, final judgment will be rendered here.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for the defendant to recover his costs.

2. An amendatory act increasing the penalty of a bond essential to the suspension of sentence in a prosecution against a husband for abandonment is ex post facto as to prior offenses.

(June 29, 1910.)

EXCEPTION by the state to the dismissing by the District Court for Franklin County of a prosecution for abandonment by defendant of his wife and children. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George J. Marshall, George W. Ayres, E. U. Overman, and W. T. Thompson for the State.

Messrs. George W. Prather and Bernard McNeny for appellee.

Rose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An information was filed in the district court of Franklin county October 4, 1909, charging that on April 1, 1909, defendant unlawfully abandoned his wife and children. The prosecution was dismissed because the trial court was of the opinion that the legislature, between the dates mentioned, passed an amendatory act which deprived defendant of a substantial right possessed by him before its passage, and that the amendment was ex post facto as to the offense charged. For the purpose of settling the law an exception to the ruling below is presented here under § 515 of the Criminal Code.

The 1st section of the statute which defendant was charged with violating declares: "That every person who shall, without good cause, abandon his wife and wilfully neglect or refuse to maintain or provide for her, or who shall abandon his or her legitimate or illegitimate child or children under the age of sixteen years, and wilfully neglect or refuse to provide for such child or children, shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a desertion and be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not more than one year, or by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than six (6) months." Sess. Laws 1903, chap. 137, p. 642; Crim. Code, § 212a, Comp. Stat. 1909, p. 2273.

When the offense charged was committed, § 2 of the act was as follows: "Provided,

Note. — A search has revealed no other cases passing upon the question as to whether an act increasing the amount of a penal bond required in a criminal case comes within the constitutional prohibition against the enactment of ex post facto laws.

however, if, after conviction and before sentence, such husband or parent shall appear before the court in which conviction shall have taken place, and enter into bond to the state of Nebraska in the penal sum of $200, to the approval of the court as to surety, conditioned that such husband will furnish said wife with necessary and proper home, food, care, and clothing, or that such parent will furnish said child or children with necessary and proper home, food, care, and clothing, then said court may suspend sentence therein. Said bond shall remain in force as long as the district judge deems the same necessary; and whenever it shall appear to said court, either by affidavit or otherwise, that such husband or parent is, in good faith, furnishing his said wife, child, or children with the necessary and proper home, food, care, and clothing, then said court may annul said bond and dismiss the prosecution against said husband or parent." Sess. Laws 1905, chap. 196, p. 689.

After the offense charged was committed and before the case was called for trial, § 2 was amended to read as follows: "If, at any time after complaint has been filed in the justice court, or the county court of the county in which the offense shall have been committed, such husband or parent shall appear before the court in which he stands charged, and shall pay or secure to be paid to the wife or to the legal representative of the child or children other than the accused such sum or sums of money or property as may be agreed upon, provided that such sum so agreed or required to be paid shall not be less than $200 nor more than $1,000, then said court may discharge the party accused out of custody on his paying the costs of prosecution. And if, after conviction and before sentence, the accused shall make settlement with his said wife or with the legal representative of his said children, in the same manner as herein provided for settlement before conviction, and shall enter into bond to the state of Nebraska in the penal sum of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 to the approval of the court as to surety and as to sum, conditioned that such husband will furnish said wife with necessary and proper home, food, care, and clothing, or that such parent will furnish said child or children with necessary and proper home, food, care, and clothing, or will so furnish both said wife and child or children, on his paying the costs of prosecution, then the said court may suspend sentence therein. Said bond shall remain in force as long as the district judge deems the same necessary; and whenever it shall appear to said court, either by affidavit or otherwise, that said husband or parent is, in good faith, furnishing his said wife, child, or children with the necessary and proper home, food, care, and clothing, then said court may annul said bond and dismiss the prosecution against said husband or parent." Sess. Laws 1909, chap. 165, p. 580; Comp. Stat 1909, p. 2273; Crim. Code, § 212b.

The language of the 1st section has not been changed. At the time of the abandonment charged the 2d section of the act empowered the district court, in the event of defendant's conviction, to suspend sentence upon his giving bond in the sum of $200 to support his family. This provision was amended in 1909, after the commission of the offense charged and before trial, to authorize the district court, after conviction, to suspend sentence upon his giving bond in a sum not less than $200 nor more than $1,000. In other words, after the commission of the offense charged and before trial, the penalty of the bond to procure a suspension of sentence was increased from $200 to a penal sum not less than $200 nor more than $1,000. The new statute contained no saving clause, nor has attention been directed to one in the Criminal Code. Was the change ex post facto as to the offense charged?

In support of the exception to the ruling of the trial court, it is argued that the 1st section defining the offense and prescribing penalties has never been changed, and that therefore the amendment did not deprive defendant of any pre-existing right. In this connection counsel for the state cite Hair v. State, 16 Neb. 601, 21 N. W. 464, and State v. Wish, 15 Neb. 448, 19 N. W. 686. In these cases it is held that an amendatory act which merely reduces the punishment for a crime is not ex post facto as to prior offenses. The provisions which first authorized the district court to suspend sentence were in the 2d section. It was in the form of a proviso, and limited the 1st section, which defined the offense and fixed the penalties. Both sections were originally parts of the same act. The legislation changing the penalty of the bond from $200 to a penal sum not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 was an amendment of the proviso, and likewise limited the section defining the offense and fixing the punishment. The amendment was a substantive part of the legislation on the subject of abandonment, and cannot be detached therefrom for the purpose of holding that the 1st section remained unchanged. When the offense charged was committed, defendant was protected by a statute which authorized the district court to suspend sentence, and at that time the penalty of the bond was only $200. He then had a right to go to trial relying upon the terms of that statute to prevent his imprisonment in case of conviction. The proviso authorizing suspension of sentence limited the section prescribing the punishment, and the act amending the proviso changed the limitation. The question then is: Did the change in the law, when applied to the offense charged, deprive defendant of a substantial right within the meaning of that part of the Bill of Rights which declares that no ex post facto law shall be passed?

Ex post facto laws include an enactment "which alters the situation of the accused to his disadvantage." Re Medley, 134 U. S. 160, 33 L. ed. 835, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 384, Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 27 L. ed. 506, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 443. This interpretation of the constitutional provision forbidding the enactment of ex post facto laws has been accepted generally by the courts and text writers, and was quoted with approval by this court in an opinion by the present chief justice in Marion v. State, 16 Neb. 349, 20 N. W. 289. The statutory right to have the sentence suspended upon giving bond in the sum of $200, in the event of conviction, was a substantial one, affording a means of escaping imprisonment. The amendment permitted the court to require a bond of $1,000 as a condition of suspending sentence. It is argued, however, that it was within the power of the court to release defendant on a $200 bond under either statute, and that therefore he was not deprived of a substantial right. This argument does not meet the question. When the case was called for trial, it was within the power of the court to require a $1,000 bond, if the amendment was effective as to prior offenses. Under the new act the exercise of this power depended on the will of the court, and not on the wish or financial ability of defendant. If he were unable to give bond in excess of $200, when required by order of the court to execute a bond in a larger sum as a condition of having sentence suspended, the change in the statute would deprive him of his liberty in case of conviction. There may be a difference between a statutory right and the mercy of a court. In any event the penalty of the bond was increased. The Bill of Rights forbids the enactment of ex post facto laws. The command of the Constitution is directed to the legislature. It applies to legislative enactments, and makes no reference to the judgments of courts. Whether an amendment of the Criminal Code is ex post facto as to prior offenses depends upon the provisions of the new act, and not upon the authority or inclination of the courts to limit its operation to the purview of the statute amended. In conferring upon the court authority to require a bond in excess of $200, the legislature intended that the power should be uniformly exercised, without distinction as to prior and subsequent offenses. The lawmakers did not insert a saving clause in the amendatory act, nor otherwise call upon the courts to limit its operation as to prior offenses, to the terms of the original act. The amendment altered the situation of accused to his disadvantage, and to that extent the legislature exceeded its power. The exception to the ruling of the trial court is therefore overruled.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

ANNE ROBINSON, Admr., etc., of Patrick Robinson, Deceased, Respt.,

v.

CONSOLIDATED GAS COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Appt.

Master — injury to servant — res ipsa loquitur.

The fall of a scaffold upon which men are sent to work does not of itself show that it must have fallen because something was the matter with it, where it appears that at the time of the fall the men were trying to break the connection of a pipe, and were pressing against the scaffold with all their strength, which may have subjected it to excessive strain.

(January 5, 1909.)

Note. — Applicability as between master and servant of maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, to fall of scaffold.

As to applicability as between master and servant of maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, to fall of bridge, see note to Johns v. Pennsylvania R. Co. post, 591.

The question whether the maxim, Res ipso loquitur, is ever applicable as between master and servant, is considered in notes in 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 337, and 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 214. As there shown, it is denied by some courts that the maxim is ever applicable to that relation. In the present note, however, it is assumed that the maxim may be applicable, and the question here discussed is, Under what conditions may the negligence of the master be presumed from the mere fact that the scaffold has fallen and injured the servant?

The courts taking the view that the maxim may, in a proper case, be applied as between master and servant, frequently assert the rule that the mere fact that a scaffolding furnished by a master for his servant to work upon falls is prima facie evidence of negligence on his part.

Thus, in Westland v. Gold Coin Mines Co. 41 C. C. A. 193, 101 Fed. 59, the deceased servant was at work 900 feet below the surface, on a stull which had been erected by the defendant mining company in one of 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term, Part 10, for New York County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Theron G. Strong, for appellant:

The maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, does not apply until, by proof of surrounding circumstances or other facts, an inference is justified that there was want of due care on the part of the master; it cannot be inferred from the mere fall of the scaffold independent of the attendant circumstances.

Cunningham v. Dady, 191 N. Y. 152, 83 N. E. 689; Duhme v. Hamburg-American Packet Co. 184 N. Y. 404, 112 Am. St. Rep. 615, 77 N. E. 386; Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 188, 52 L.R.A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630, 59 N. E. 925.

The inference is more natural and reasonable that the fall of the scaffold was due to the exceptional strain, than that it was due to any inherent defect.

Wiwirowski v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 124 N. Y. 420, 26 N. E. 1023; Laidlaw v. Sage, 158 N. Y. 73, 44 L.R.A. 216, 52 N. E. 679; Voorhees v. Hudson River Teleph. Co. 109 App. Div. 465, 95 N. Y. Supp. 703, the levels of its mine, so as to enable the deceased with other employees to stand thereon while breaking down the mineral bearing rock. While the men were at work on the stull in the usual way shortly after a blast had been fired, the stull fell and the deceased was killed. After the accident three or more of the stull timbers were found at the bottom of the level, which were broken about in the center, and two witnesses expressed the opinion that the stull timbers were insufficient to support the weight which the stull was intended to carry. On the other hand, the defendant offered evidence that the stull was constructed with timbers of the same kind, size, and strength that were usually used for that purpose, and that the deceased and his fellow workmen had been cautioned by the foreman of the mine against firing such heavy blasts as they had once fired. The court said: "The fact that the stull fell demonstrates that it was insufficient to support the load with which it was burdened at the time it fell. The case in hand, then, is not of that kind of which it may be said that the occurrence of the accident affords no evidence of negligence. If the stull had been constructed as it should have been, it would easily have borne the weight that was upon it at the time it fell. Hence, the fall of the structure suggests forcibly that the stull timbers were insufficient either in

Mr. Edward F. Brown, for respondent:

The cause of the fall of the scaffold is a conjecture and inference, and the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, applies.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 29th of April, 1905, the plaintiff's intestate, a plumber in the permanent employment of the defendant, was so injured through the fall of a scaffold that he died in a short time. This action was brought under the Code of Civil Procedure and the employers' liability act, to recover the pecuniary damages sustained by his next of kin.

strength or number, or that the supports let into the side walls of the vein were insufficient, and that proper care had not been exercised by those who erected it. . . . A reasonable person might very well have reached the conclusions last stated by force of the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur."

So, in Cleary v. General Contracting Co. 53 Wash. 254, 101 Pac. 888, the plaintiff, while in the employment of the defendant, was injured by the fall of a scaffold furnished by the defendant, and the court, in holding that the maxim applied, quoted with approval the following statement from La Bee v. Sultan Logging Co. 47 Wash. 57, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 405, 91 Pac. 560, rehearing, 51 Wash. 81, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 408, 97 Pac. 1104: "When the servant shows that the master furnished him an instrumentality to be used for a particular purpose, that he used it for the purpose intended, in the manner intended, and that it broke when being so used, and injured him, he makes out a prima facie case of negligence against the master."

And the maxim was held applicable, where the collapse of a scaffold took place at a time when there was no weight on it beyond what it was intended to bear, in Cook v. Duncan, 20 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 180, cited in 2 Labatt on Master & Servant, p. 2304.

And in Giles v. Thames Ironworks Shipbuilding Co. 1 Times L. R. 469, where the plaintiff recovered a judgment for injuries received because of the fall of an alleged defective scaffolding, a new trial was denied, one of the court observing that the plaintiff had proved the accident, and the defendant had chosen to offer no evidence as to the conditions of the scaffolding.

Where a staging erected by the side of a wood pile, and used for the purpose of enabling the workman to pile the wood higher, was built under the direct supervision of one standing in the place of the master, and fell while it was being used directly under his commands, it was held, in Prendible v. Connecticut River Mfg. Co. 160 Mass. 131, 35 N. E. 675, that the fact that it fell in the manner and under the circumstances 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

was a proper one for consideration as tending to show that the master was negligent. So, in Arkerson v. Dennison, 117 Mass. 407, while the plaintiff and another bricklayer were at work on a scaffolding with the preparation of which the plaintiff had nothing to do, a hod carrier came up a ladder and emptied some mortar into a tub; as he turned to go, the scaffolding fell and the plaintiff was injured. There was no evidence of any other special strain upon the scaffold, and it did not appear that the mortar was dumped violently into the tub. The court said: "That it was insecure and improperly constructed in some way was sufficiently apparent from the account given of the manner of its fall."

But in Brady v. Norcross, 172 Mass. 331, 52 N. E. 528, the court said that even if it was assumed, following the Arkerson and Prendible Cases, that the giving away of a bracket holding a staging was of itself evidence of negligence in the construction on the part of someone, they did not think that it was evidence from which it could be fairly inferred that the negligence was that of the plaintiff's employers. The court said: "The evidence did not tend to show that they furnished the staging as a structure, nor that they assumed to exercise any control or supervision as to how it should be built or kept or adapted for the work, nor that they failed to furnish a sufficient quantity of suitable materials, nor that they employed improper workmen."

Section 18 of the New York labor law (Laws of 1897, chap. 415) provides that no one should "furnish or erect, or cause to be furnished or erected," any scaffolding, hoists, etc., "which are unsafe, unsuitable, or improper, and which are not so constructed, placed, and operated as to give proper protection to the life and limb of a person so employed or engaged."

Section 19 of the same act provided that all scaffolding should be so constructed as to bear four times the maximum weight required to be placed thereon. The previous law provided for the punishment of "knowingly or negligently" doing the acts prohibited in § 18, but the act of 1897 omitted these words.

tion, it was used by the defendant, but after that its history does not appear, except that it remained in the same position in the vault until, after the lapse of a year, it was again used by the defendant. It was about 9 or 10 feet from the floor, and had no support underneath. One end was suspended by two ropes, and the other rested on a wooden brace placed horizontally between two piers to relieve the lateral strain and thus to strengthen the building. The brace was not designed to sustain a vertical strain, and it was kept in place simply by wedges driven at either end. There was no other fastening. Owing to work on the subway in the street in front, the vault was open and the brace and the wedges were exposed to the variations in moisture and temperature pertaining to the climate for an entire year. The decedent, by the direction of the assistant foreman of the defendant in charge of its work, went upon the scaffold with another man to uncouple a large pipe overhead, but, owing to rust or some other cause, it was difficult to unscrew it. One man had a wrench and the other a pair of chain-tongs, and both exerted all their strength and put all the strain they could on the pipe and scaffold. By pushing upward, as the survivor testified, with all their "might and main," they subjected the scaffold on which they were sitting to a severe vertical strain, when the brace gave way, the scaffold fell, and the decedent was thrown to the floor with such violence as to cause his death. Upon the trial the jury found for These sections of the labor law were held, in Stewart v. Ferguson, 164 N. Y. 553, 58 N. E. 662, to enlarge the duty of the master in respect to scaffolds, and to extend it to responsibility for the safety of the scaffold itself, and thus for want of care in the details of its construction, which details previously might have been delegated to servants.

In the Stewart Case, in which a servant had been killed by the fall of a scaffold, there was no evidence tending to prove the cause of the fall other than the fall itself, and the trial court instructed the jury that the falling of the scaffold raised a presumption of the negligence of the defendant in its construction, and refused to charge that the happening of the accident created no presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant. The appellate court sustained the trial court, and said: "The evidence tended to show that this scaffold was not overloaded, but was bearing the weight usually required in the performance of the labor for which it was an appliance. Prima facie it was so constructed as to bear less than one fourth the weight required by § 19. Its fall, in the absence of evidence of other producing cause, points to the omission of the duty enjoined by the statute upon the defendant to the plaintiff in its construction, and points to it with that reasonable certainty which usually tends to produce conviction in the mind in tracing events back to their causes, and thus creates a presumption. It is circumstantial evidence, and if it does convince the jury, it justifies their verdict."

Following the principle laid down in the Stewart Case, the maxim was held applicable in the following cases, where the accident was of the nature indicated: Johnson v. Roach, 83 App. Div. 351, 82 N. Y. Supp. 203 (the falling of a scaffold on which a bricklayer was at work); Tierney v. Vunck, 97 App. Div. 1, 89 N. Y. Supp. 612 (the breaking of a plank in a scaffold); Madden v. Hughes, 104 App. Div. 101, 93 N. Y. Supp. 324, affirmed in 185 N. Y. 466, 78 N. E. 167 (the breaking of a platform consisting of 3-inch planks spliced by being nailed together, and supported at either end by a rope looped around the plank); Croce v. Buckley, 115 App. Div. 354, 100 N. Y. Supp. 898 (the dropping of an elevator the top of which had been used as a platform for the support of laborers at work upon an adjoining building); Convey v. Finn, 130 App. Div. 440, 114 N. Y. Supp. 864 (the breaking of a board laid across stringers in an unfinished building); Nixon v. Thompson-Starrett Co. 131 App. Div. 152, 115 N. Y. Supp. 130 (the breaking of planks laid across iron floor beams in a building in the process of construction).

The same principle has been applied where an injury to a servant resulted from the falling in of a floor, which was unexplained (Muhlens v. Obermeyer, 83 App. Div. 88, 82 N. Y. Supp. 527), and to the breaking of a ladder (Cummings v. Kenny, 97 App. Div. 114, 89 N. Y. Supp. 579). Cases involving the falling of floors and the breaking of ladders are not, of course, within the scope of this note, and these cases are included only because they follow the Stewart Case.

In Johnson v. Roach, supra, the defendant gave no evidence at all, and the court said that the fall of the scaffold unexplained was prima facie evidence of violation of the statute.

And in Nixon v. Thompson-Starrett Co. supra, the court said: "The charge that the fact that the plank tipping up was evidence prima facie that it was not sufficiently laid was not error."

So, in Croce v. Buckley, supra, it was held that it was not essential to the plaintiff's cause of action to show what caused the dropping of an elevator in a building adjoining the one upon which the plaintiff's intestate was at work, which elevator was being used by the defendant as a scaffolding for the plaintiff's intestate and other workmen, as her case was established by showing that the scaffold as such was defective and improper, and that the accident resulted therefrom.

And the same principle was applied in Huston v. Dobson, 123 N. Y. Supp. 892, where the injured servant, who was in the the plaintiff, and the judgment entered on the verdict was affirmed by the appellate division, one of the justices dissenting. The defendant appealed to this court, and through its counsel insisted that the judgment should be reversed on account of an error in the charge.

The trial judge in instructing the jury laid down the usual elementary propositions relating to negligence, contributory negligence, and assumption of risks. He charged further as follows: "Precisely how or why that scaffold fell is not told by any witness. There is no witness, as I recollect the testimony, who gives you any express facts to show why that scaffold fell, and therefore I instruct you under the maxim Res ipsa loquitur, which means that things speak for themselves, that the scaffold must have fallen because there was something the matter with it." The defendant excepted, and asked the court "to leave to the jury the question as to whether there was negligence of any person in the service of the employer, intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, or machinery were in proper condition, as a question of fact." After making this request, the counsel for the defendant added: "Your honor charged practically in the language of the statute that the negligence must be that of a superintendent or a person charged with superintendence, and I except to that statement, and ask you to leave it to the jury, as a question of fact, whether there was any such negligence." The court declined, and employ of a general contractor, made use of a scaffold of the defendant a subcontractor, at the suggestion of the defendant's foreman, in order to hasten the general contractor's work and facilitate that of the defendant contractor. There was some evidence that after the accident the timbers that had been used to support the scaffold that fell were rotten.

The court in Stewart v. Ferguson, supra, also said that, even before the passage of the labor law (Laws of 1897, chap. 415), it had been held that the falling of a scaffold without any apparent cause was prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the person bound to provide it; and a number of cases support this statement.

Thus, in Solarz v. Manhattan R. Co. 8 Misc. 656, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1123, affirmed in 155 N. Y. 645, 49 N. E. 1104, it was held that the unexplained breaking down of a scaffold made out a case sufficiently strong to go to the jury on the question of negligence.

And in Green v. Banta, 16 Jones & S. 156, affirmed without opinion in 97 N. Y. 627, it was held that the fact that the scaffolding gave away was prima facie evidence of negligence. And to the same effect was the decision in Flynn v. Gallagher, 20 Jones & S. 524.

The same rule is asserted in Cunningham v. Sicilian Asphalt Paving Co. 49 App. Div. 380, 63 N. Y. Supp. 357, citing the Solarz and Green Cases, where the servant was injured by the breaking of one or two planks the ends of which were supported by the sides of bins, and upon which he was required to stand while dumping material into the bins.

So, the mere fact that a floor gave away was held prima facie evidence of negligence. in Flynn v. Harlow, 46 N. Y. S. R. 872, 19 N. Y. Supp. 705, citing the Green Case.

And in Johnson v. Roach, 83 App. Div. 351, 82 N. Y. Supp. 203, the court said that, irrespective of the statute, there was sufficient to take the case to the jury upon the general question of negligence. It appeared that beams were thrust out from windows and rested upon the lintels, and in some cases upon loose bricks, and upon these beams were laid boards on which in turn rested iron scaffolds. This work was done by other servants of the defendant, and with it the bricklayers, including the plaintiff, had nothing to do, they being directed to work upon the scaffold thus provided. The evidence further tended to show that the structure was not firmly bound together. The court said that they had no difficulty in concluding that a sufficient basis was established for the finding of the jury that the defendant was negligent, the maxim being applicable.

In Fink v. Slade, 66 App. Div. 105, 72 N. Y. Supp. 821, the court seems to depart from the doctrine of the other New York cases when it says: "The rule of res ipsa loquitur can have no application in the absence of any evidence that it was the defendant's negligence which caused the injury sustained." And again the court says: "A rule that a servant can maintain an action for personal injuries against a master simply by showing attending circumstances from which the negligence of someone may be inferred, without showing either expressly or inferentially the personal negligence of the master,—some violation of his duty to the servant,—would be subversive of well-settled principles."

If, however, there is some evidence in the case as to the cause of the fall, as where it was due to the negligence of the servant himself, or to that of his fellow servants, then there is no occasion for the application of the maxim.

Thus, in Andrews v. Reiners, 112 App. Div. 378, 98 N. Y. Supp. 658, reargument in 115 App. Div. 909, 101 N. Y. Supp. 1111, where the scaffold was not stationary, but was suspended by ropes through pulleys, and it was part of the duty of the injured servant to raise and lower the platform as his work progressed, it was held that a verdict against the defendant could not be sustained where it rested on nothing but the proposition that the mere fact of the descent of the end of the scaffold, if it occurred, was evidence from which alone it could be found that the scaffold fell from defective-gave the defendant an exception. In his dissenting opinion, no other being written, Mr. Justice Ingraham said: "I think it was error to refuse to charge the defendant's ninth request. The evidence is contradicted that the deceased and his associate placed considerable strain upon this scaffold in trying to unscrew a pipe, and that it was while thus straining it that the scaffold fell. There was no evidence but that the scaffold would have been perfectly safe if used in an ordinary way." [125 App. Div. 915, 109 N. Y. Supp. 1144.]

We also are of opinion that the exceptions raised reversible error, because the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was improperly applied. The res of that maxim, which is sometimes misused, is not simply an accident resulting in injury, but the accident and the surrounding circumstances, necessarily shown by proving how the accident occurred; or, in other words, the occurrence as it appears by proof of the accident. The doctrine does not permit a recovery without some proof of negligence, but it regulates the degree of proof required under certain circumstances. If proof of the occurrence shows that the accident was such as could not have happened without negligence, according to the ordinary experience of mankind, the doctrine is applied even if the precise omission or act of negligence is not specified, and even when it does not appear whether the accident was owing to some act done or to some act not done. It is applied when the inference of negligence is required by the nature of the occurrence. Thus, the apparent cause of the accident may be want of care in constructing or maintaining or operating a machine, and, if the occurrence ness. The court went on to say: "The deceased may have been lowering the end of the scaffold where he was when it is claimed he fell (a thing he had to do continually at short intervals), and let the rope slip. There was no evidence that he was not doing so. The maxim only applies where the accident could not have happened except from defectiveness of the appliance."

So, in Lorenzo v. Faillace, 132 App. Div. 103, 116 N. Y. Supp. 326, it was held that if the defendants introduce evidence of disinterested witnesses to the effect that there was no defect in the timber which broke, but that the breaking was caused by the careless or negligent conduct of plaintiff's fellow servants in using the scaffold in a manner for which it was not designed to be used, and contrary to their express instructions, and there is nothing to contradict this testimony, either in the shape of direct testimony or circumstances tending to discredit the same, the presumption of negligence is completely overcome, and the defendants are absolved from responsibility.

So, where a master furnishes brackets in perfect condition to be used in supporting a platform or scaffold on which his workmen are to stand while putting shingles on a roof, and the appliances furnished, when properly used, provide a reasonably safe place for the workmen, it was held, in Knapp v. Voorhis (N. J.) 74 Atl. 440, that the slipping of the feet of one of the brackets, causing it to collapse, because not securely attached to the roof by a fellow servant who put up the scaffold, does not raise a presumption that the master did not exercise reasonable care in the selection of the appliance.

And in Tiedjen v. National Elevator Co. 130 App. Div. 504, 114 N. Y. Supp. 1056, the court said that the mere happening of an accident, where the scaffold itself does not give way, is not evidence that the accident was caused by a defect in the scaffold itself or in its supports and appliances, and there is nothing upon which a finding can be based that the scaffold was an improper one for the purpose for which it was furnished and used.

The rule of res ipsa loquitur is not applicable where the cause of the fall of the staging was shown by the defendant, and does not seem to have been in dispute. Parsons v. Hecla Iron Works, 186 Mass. 221, 71 N. E. 572. And see Brady v. Norcross, 172 Mass. 331, 52 N. E. 528, cited supra.

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was held in Ferrick v. Eidlitz, 195 N. Y. 248, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 837, 88 N. E. 33, not to apply to the fall of a temporary shed erected during the construction of a building, for the protection of machinery, while employees were removing it after it had served its purpose, so as to render the master liable to an employee injured by such fall, without further evidence of negligence on his part. It was claimed that the shed was being used as a scaffold.

In Fink v. Slade, 66 App. Div. 105, 72 N. Y. Supp. 821, supra, the court said that the evidence disclosed the fact that there may have been causes for the fall of the platform other than the negligence of the defendant, and that the accident was probably caused by the negligence of fellow servants. No reference is made to the Stewart case, cited supra, and it certainly is difficult to harmonize the language used in the two cases.

In some cases involving scaffolds where the court has held that the maxim is not applicable, it is difficult to tell whether the statement was intended to be a general statement that the maxim never applies as between master and servant, or whether the case at bar was not a proper one for such application. Among such cases may be noted the following: Schneider v. American Bridge Co. 31 App. D. C. 420; Bergman v. Altman, 127 Iowa, 693, 104 N. W. 280; Pellerin v. International Paper Co. 96 Me. 388, 52 Atl. 842; Quincy Min. Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 34, 3 N. W. 240.

W. M. G.

indicates that the accident could not have happened without negligence in one or more of these respects, it speaks for itself, and establishes a prima facie case for the jury to consider, even if it does not appear specifically whether or in what respect the machinery was negligently constructed, maintained, or operated. Under such circumstances, precision in the proof is not required, as the occurrence raises a presumption of negligence based on common experience, although no specific defect, act, or omission appears. The occurrence points to negligence as the cause of the accident, because, in the nature of things, there could have been no such occurrence without negligence. If the res, or the entire occurrence as proved, could not have happened without negligence of some kind, negligence is presumed without showing what kind, and the burden of explanation is thrown on the defendant. If, however, proof of the occurrence shows that the accident might have happened from some cause other than the negligence of the defendant, the presumption does not arise, and the doctrine cannot properly be applied. Under such circumstances, it is for the jury to find whether the accident was owing to negligence on the part of the defendant, or to some cause for which the defendant was not responsible. The principles upon which the doctrine rests, and the circumstances under which it should be applied, were so clearly pointed out by Judge Cullen in Griffen v. Manice, 106 N. Y. 188, 52 L.R.A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630, 59 N. E. 925, the leading case upon the subject, that further discussion thereof is unnecessary.

In the case before us, the occurrence did not speak for itself, nor permit negligence as the only inference, for the fall of the scaffold may not have been caused by the weight of the men upon it, but by their weight only when augmented in its effect by excessive pressure applied by all the strength they could exert when pushing upward, although indirectly, against a stationary object. One of them, as it was shown, had unusual, and the other, as it is presumed, had average, strength, and the strain of the pressure may have much exceeded the strain of the weight. The jury, if permitted, might have found that this caused the accident. It was an explanation for them to consider, tending to show why the scaffold fell; but, under the charge that it "must have fallen because there was something the matter with it," no consideration thereof was possible, and the defendant was deprived of its chief defense.

For this error, we think that the judgment appealed from should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

ELIZABETH C. JOHNS, by Next Friend,
Appt.,
v.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Master — fall of bridge — res ipsa loquitur.

1. The mere fact that a railroad bridge was carried away by the high water of the creek which it spanned, taking with it a portion of a train, and killing a brakeman, does not place upon the railroad company the burden of disproving its negligence to avoid liability for the death of the employee.

Evidence — condition after accident — admissibility.

2. Evidence of an examination of the foundation of a bridge which gave way, made five months after the accident, when conditions had so far changed that it could not be relied on as proof of the conditions existing before the bridge fell, is not admissible upon the question of negligence in the construction or maintenance of the bridge.

(January 3, 1910.)

Note. — Applicability, as between master and servant, of maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, to fall of bridge.

As to applicability, as between master and servant, of maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, to fall of scaffold, see note to Robinson v. Consolidated Gas Co. ante, 580. Reference is made to that note for the limitations observed in the preparation of this note.

There are but few cases involving the fall of a bridge in which the court, although recognizing the rule that the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, may be applicable as between master and servant, passes upon the question whether the case at bar is a proper one for the application of the maxim, but the court has done so in a few cases.

Thus, in Ristau v. E. Frank Coe Co. 120 App. Div. 478, 104 N. Y. Supp. 1059 (affirmed without opinion in 193 N. Y. 630, 86 N. E. 1132), the plaintiff proved the collapse of a trestle upon which he had been at work, and rested, relying upon the maxim. No particular defect to cause the collapse of the trestle was apparent, and there was nothing but the bare fact that the trestle collapsed while in the ordinary use for which it was constructed, and that it had been built only three years; and the court held that a nonsuit was error, as the maxim applied to the case. In respect to the contention of the counsel for the defendant that APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Court of Common Pleas for Allegheny County, refusing to take off a nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for the killing of plaintiff's husband, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Horace J. Miller for appellant.

Mr. M. W. Acheson, Jr., for appellee.

Fell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's husband was a brakeman on the defendant's road and was killed in an accident caused by the falling of a bridge on which his train was passing. The bridge was about 80 feet in length, and the iron superstructure rested on abutments at its ends and a pier at the middle of the creek it spanned. The creek was ordinarily quite small, but at the time of the accident the water was unusually high, while the water in the Allegheny river nearby, into which it flowed, was low. This condition caused a very rapid current in the creek, and a strong pressure on one side of the bridge. The whole structure, including the abutments and pier, was carried away, and a freight car loaded with cement was carried 75 yards down the stream. The bridge had been used by the defendant for forty years, and there was no evidence of defective construction, or that the bridge had become unsafe.

The contention that the burden of disproving negligence was on the defendant cannot be sustained. The maxim Res ipsa loquitur is an exception to the general rule that negligence is not to be inferred, but must be affirmatively proved, except in cases of absolute duty or an obligation practically amounting to that of an insurer. Stearns v. Ontario Spinning Co. 184 Pa. 519, 39 L.R.A. 842, 63 Am. St. Rep. 807, 39 Atl.

the maxim is made applicable in a given case, if at all, only by facts and circumstances indicating negligence of the defendant, proved in connection with the happening of the accident itself, the court said: "The fault of this is that if there were other facts showing negligence, the maxim would not be needed as evidence to carry the case to the jury at all; it is only where there is nothing but the bare happening of the accident that the plaintiff needs and the law gives him the help of the maxim to escape a nonsuit."

The court further said that this case was not distinguishable from the fall of scaffolds, floors, or other places of work, and cited Stewart v. Ferguson, 164 N. Y. 553, 58 N. E. 662, which is set out and discussed in the preceding note.

So, where the plaintiff, while at work

292; Zahniser v. Pennsylvania Torpedo Co. 190 Pa. 350, 42 Atl. 707. There was nothing in the circumstances that amounted to evidence from which negligence could be inferred, and that relieved the plaintiff from the burden of proof. An offer was made to prove by a witness that he had made an investigation to ascertain whether the bridge had a substantial foundation, and had found that there was "no permanent foundation upon the location that had been lately occupied by the pier." The accident occurred in March. This witness had testified that because of the high water no examination could be made for several weeks after the accident, and the examination he made was in August,—five months later; and that in the meantime there had been a change in the physical conditions by the action of the water, by the rebuilding of the bridge, and the dumping of stones in the bed of the stream. This offer was excluded. It was renewed, with the addition that there had been no change in the conditions, as far as the foundations were concerned, between March and August. The second offer was excluded for the reason that the testimony would be inadequate to establish a defect in original construction. The ruling of the court on the offer as first made was clearly right, and we cannot say that the exclusion of the offer as finally made calls for a reversal. The witness had testified to facts which showed that the result of his examination in August could not be relied on as proof of the condition existing before the fall of the bridge, and, if his testimony had come up to the offer, it would not have advanced the plaintiff's case. It would still have been barren of proof that the foundations which had withstood the floods of forty years were defective, and that the fall of the bridge resulted from their giving way.

The judgment is affirmed.

in a mine, was injured by the sudden giving way of a ledge upon which he was walking in going to his work, the court, in Lentino v. Port Henry Iron Ore Co. 71 App. Div. 466, 75 N. Y. Supp. 755, held that a nonsuit was improper where an injury results from the sudden and unexplained giving way of a place furnished to a workman in order to enable him to work, or which he is required to pass over in order to reach his work.

But, in Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Mendez (Tex. Civ. App.) 78 S. W. 25, it was held that a jury is not warranted in finding that the railroad company was negligent from the mere fact that the timbers of a bridge burned, leaving the rails unsupported, so that a train, in attempting to pass over the bridge at night, was precipitated, and the plaintiff injured. WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

PORT BLAKELY MILL COMPANY et al.,
Respts.,
v.
SPRINGFIELD FIRE & MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

(56 Wash. 681, 106 Pac. 194.)

Insurance — conditions as to automatic sprinkler — breach — effect.

1. Temporary breach by an insured of his warranty that due diligence will be used that the automatic sprinkler system shall at all times be maintained in good working order will not prevent his recovering on the policy, if, at the time of the loss, it was in good working order, and the breach had nothing to do with the loss,—at least, where there is no express provision in the policy for its becoming void for such breach, while such provisions are found in connection with other conditions and warranties.

Same — construction — forfeiture of rights — intention.

2. Insurance policies should not be construed to work a forfeiture of either party's rights unless it plainly appears that such was the intention of both contracting parties.

Same — extending automatic sprinkler — effect.

3. A warranty in an insurance policy that insured will use due diligence that the automatic sprinkler system shall at all times be maintained in good working order is not broken by the temporary disconnection of the system for the purpose of making extensions to it, where the work of making the alterations is prosecuted with due diligence.

Note.— Effect of temporary condition which ceased before loss, under general provision against increase of risk, or specific provision against certain conditions.

This question is discussed in the note to Sumter Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 736, in which it is declared that though there is a conflict of opinion as to the effect of the temporary violation of condition in a fire insurance policy, the weight of authority seems to support the rule that the breach of a provision which, by the terms of the policy, works a forfeiture thereof, merely suspends the policy during the continuance of the violation; and that, if the violation is discontinued during the life of the policy, and has no existence at the time of the loss, the policy revives, and the insurer is liable, though there was no consent on the latter's part to such violation, and the violation was of such a character that the

The facts are stated in the opinion.

When the risk was increased by the withdrawal of the protection afforded by the sprinklers, the policy became null and void by its express terms, and thereafter could not be revived except with the consent of the insurance company.

insurer would have declared a forfeiture therefor had it been aware of it at the time of its existence. Since the preparation of that note, this rule was applied in Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013, and recovery was allowed for the loss of a house by fire, under a policy providing that the same should be void if the house should become vacant and unoccupied, and so remain for a specified period, though it appeared that the house became vacant and unoccupied for a term longer than the specified period, but was occupied at the time of the fire. The court declared that the meaning of the provision in question was merely that if a loss occurred during the prohibited vacancy, the policy was void, and that it should not be construed so as to accomplish more than the purpose for which it was inserted, which was to protect the insurer from the risk resulting from vacancy; and that if the risk was terminated by reoccupancy, the reason for the condition was also terminated.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action upon a fire insurance policy written by appellant, insuring the property of the mill company against loss by fire in the sum of $10,000, with loss, if any, payable to the Detroit Trust Company. The policy was in the usual form, except that it had attached to it a rider containing a description of the property insured, and various special agreements with reference to the particular risk. On April 22, 1907, a fire occurred, whereby a portion of the insured property was damaged. The appellant, contending that the policy had been avoided by the failure of the mill company to observe one of the special agreements, claimed to be a "warranty," denied its liability, and this action was instituted to enforce payment, resulting in findings in favor of respondents, and a judgment in the sum of $6,452.90, with interest from July 15, 1907, from which this appeal was taken.

Three contentions are made by appellant, upon which we are asked to reverse the judgment.

(1) That the Detroit Trust Company may not maintain an action within this state, not having paid an annual license fee nor otherwise complied with the provisions of our laws in regard to foreign corporations doing business within this state.

(2) That the policy was avoided by the breach of a warranty therein contained.

(3) That an automatic sprinkler system connected with the mill plant was not in working order at the time of the fire.

Each of these contentions has been considered, but, having reached a conclusion upon the second which is determinative of the appeal, we will not discuss the first and third. The clause in the policy which suggests the second assignment of error is as follows: "Warranted by the insured that due diligence be used that the automatic sprinkler system shall at all times be maintained in good working order." The Port Blakely Mill Company was what is known in insurance circles as "a sprinkler risk," and the evidence discloses that the rate of premium upon "a sprinkler risk" was approximately 50 per cent less than upon the same mill without the sprinkler attachment. So that, by the maintenance of the sprinkler system and the insertion in the policy of the clause above referred to, the mill company obtained this policy upon the payment of $229 premium, which otherwise would have cost it approximately $458. It is apparent, therefore, that both parties had fully in mind at the time of the issuance of the policy the advantages that would result to each because of the existence of the sprinkler system, and the use of due diligence on the part of the insured to maintain it in good working order at all times. To the insured it meant a saving of $229 on the premium paid; to the insurer it meant a lessening of its risk,—ample consideration to each why this particular form of policy should be chosen, and the sprinkler clause made a part thereof; and having in mind this situation, it is not unreasonable to assume that the words used in the sprinkler clause were employed by both parties with a full understanding that it was a statement and assumption of condition and undertaking on the part of the insured, relating to the risk, and affecting its character and extent. While, as is said by Shaw, Ch. J., in Daniels v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co. 12 Cush. 416, at page 423, 59 Am. Dec. 192, "there is undoubtedly some difficulty in determining by any simple and certain test what propositions in a contract of insurance constitute warranties;" and conceding the leaning of the courts, in order to protect the insured and avoid a forfeiture, is to hold agreements and stipulations in the policy to be representations rather than warranties in all cases where there is any room for construction, it has nevertheless become fixed and settled, except in so far as it may have been changed and modified by statute in some of the states, that all statements regarding the risk, contained in or appearing on the face of the policy, are warranties. Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, p. 1133. And such is the rule, irrespective of the use of the word "warranty" or "warranted." Redman v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 47 Wis. 89, 32 Am. Rep. 751, 1 N. W. 393; Wood v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 13 Conn. 534, 35 Am. Dec. 92; Moulor v. American L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 341, 28 L. ed. 449, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466; Barnard v. Faber [1893] 1 Q. B. 340. Wood on Fire Insurance, vol. 1, at page 449, says: "The rule seems to be that such representations in or a part of the policy are construed to be warranties when it appears to the court that they have had in themselves, or in the view of the parties, a tendency to induce the company to enter into the contract on terms more favorable to the insured than without them. . . . Any statement or description of any undertaking on the part of the assured on the face of the policy, which relates to the risk, is a warranty,—an express warranty. . . . It is not necessary that it should be stated to be a warranty, or that it should be so by construction. It is enough that it appears upon the face of the policy and relates to the risk." The case before us would undoubtedly fall within such a rule as Mr. Wood refers to, when it appears that the premium on this policy upon a "sprinkler risk," and with the sprinkler clause added, was reduced approximately 50 per cent of what it would have been otherwise. This was certainly, in his language, "a tendency to induce the company to enter into the contract on terms more favorable to the insured than without them." In Wood v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. supra, p. 544, the court says: "The general rule in regard to what constitutes a warranty in a contract of insurance is well settled. Any statement or description or any undertaking on the part of the insured, on the face of the policy, which relates to the risk, is a warranty. . . . When it is once ascertained that it relates to the risk, and was inserted in reference to that, it must be strictly observed and kept or the insurance is void." To our minds the conclusion, both upon reason and authority, is that the clause in question was and is a warranty.

Having reached this conclusion, there is but one other question to be considered: Was there a breach of this warranty? It is undisputed that from April 1st to April 21st the sprinkler system in what was known in the mill as "No. 3" was disconnected. The fire occurred on April 22d, and there is a sharp conflict in the testimony as to whether or not No. 3 was in operation at the time of the fire. But, giving due weight to the finding of the court below, that it was connected upon April 21st, there was a period of nearly three weeks when it is admitted that no protection was afforded by the sprinkler system in No. 3. The repairs undertaken by the mill during this time were permissible under the policy, but it appears that it was the work of only a few hours to disconnect system No. 3 from its old location and move it to its new. Such being the fact, it was not "due diligence," as called for in the policy, for the mill company to continue the operation of the mill without the protection of sprinkler system No. 3. It was an undoubted and material increase in the risk, contrary to the terms of the warranty, and was a breach thereof. The mill company, having broken its contract of warranty by the failure to use due diligence in maintaining the sprinkler system at all times in good working order, by such failure released the appellant from liability under the policy, and the same thereby was avoided. So that whether or not the system in No. 3 was in good working order on April 22d is immaterial, since the policy, because of the breach of the warranty, was not then in force or effect. And it was likewise immaterial whether or not this breach contributed to the loss. The policy, being at an end because of its broken warranty, no longer covered any loss or damage to the mill property, and was wholly avoided.

That such is the effect of a broken warranty in a policy of fire insurance there can no longer be any doubt. The principle has been so oft asserted and so frequently announced by both courts and text writers that it must be regarded as settled. May on Insurance, vol. 1, § 156, thus states the rule: "Whether the fact stated or the act stipulated for be material to the risk or not is of no consequence, the contract being that the matter is as represented, or shall be as promised; and unless it prove so, whether from fraud, mistake, negligence, or other cause, not proceeding from the insurer, or the intervention of the law, or the act of God, the insured can have no claim." Marshall on Insurance, at page 249, states the same rule in this language: "It is also immaterial to what cause the noncompliance is attributable; for if it be not in fact complied with, though perhaps for the best of reasons, the policy is void." In the case of McKenzie v. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. 112 Cal. 548, 44 Pac. 923, the supreme court of California, quoting the above rules, adds: "The foregoing quotation is but the enunciation in brief form of a principle laid down by all the writers on the subject of insurance, and enunciated in the leading cases of this country and England." The Supreme Court of the United States recognizes the rule in Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Coos County, 151 U. S. 452, 38 L. ed. 231, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, and says: "If it appears that the contract has been terminated by the violation on the part of the assured of its conditions, then there can be no right of recovery." We have been furnished with a certified copy of the opinion of Judge Whitson in Port Blakely Mill Co. v. Royal Ins. Co. in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Washington, northern division (lately decided, but not yet published), in which that learned judge, in passing upon a similar clause in a policy covering this same risk, has reached a like conclusion to the one here announced.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss.

Rudkin, Ch. J., and Gose and Chadwick, JJ., concur.

Fullerton, J., dissents.

A petition for rehearing having been granted, Dunbar, J., on August 6, 1910, handed down the following opinion, which became the opinion of the court:

Action on fire insurance contract. Judgment was obtained in the superior court by the insured, respondents in this case, on a fire insurance policy issued by the appellant. An appeal followed, and the judgment was reversed by a majority decision of department 1 of this court, filed January 14, 1910, to which reference is made for a statement of the case. 56 Wash. 681, ante. 593. 106 Pac. 194. A petition for rehearing was filed, addressed to the court en banc. Said petition was granted, and the case again argued, and it is now here for final determination by the whole court.

There were three contentions made by the appellant in the first argument of the case: (1) That the Detroit Trust Company could not have maintained this action; (2) that the policy was avoided by the breach of a warranty therein contained; and (3) that the automatic sprinkler system connected with the mill plant was not in working order at the time of the fire. It was stated in the opinion that each of these contentions had been considered, but that, in view of the conclusion reached on the second, the first and third would not be discussed. Inasmuch, however, as the first proposition lay at the threshold of the case, and was determinative of the right to bring the action, the court must have decided that proposition against the contention of the appellant before it proceeded to the determination of the second proposition. In any event, we think the technical objection is without merit, for all the reasons urged by respondents. We have given painstaking consideration to the third proposition, for it involves the actual merits of this controversy. But from an examination of the long statement of facts, containing more than 600 pages, we are not convinced that the findings of the trial judge were not sustained by the weight of the evidence, and will therefore consider the case from the standpoint of such findings.

The sprinkler provision, appearing on a rider attached to the policy, was as follows: "Warranted by the assured that due diligence be used that the automatic sprinkler system shall at all times be maintained in good working order." Privilege was given the assured to make additions and repairs. The fourteenth and fifteenth findings of the court, bearing on this proposition, are as follows:

"(14) That on or about the 29th day of January, 1907, it became and was necessary, essential, and requisite to the business of the Port Blakely Mill Company that an addition, alterations, and repairs be made to that portion of said plaintiff's sawmill building which was known as the lath mill, and on or about April 1st, 1907, it became and was necessary—in order to make the automatic sprinkler equipment more efficient, and in order to extend the automatic sprinkler equipment to the addition to that portion of said plaintiff's mill building known as the lath mill, and in order to have all of said sawmill building, including said lath mill, protected by automatic sprinkler equipment—to make additions, alterations, and repairs to what was known as the No. 3 automatic sprinkler division in the easterly portion of said sawmill, and that accordingly, on or about the 29th day of January, 1907, the plaintiff, Port Blakely Mill Company, commenced the work of making said addition, said alterations and repairs to said lath mill, and on or about April 1, 1907, commenced the work of altering, repairing, and extending said No. 3 automatic sprinkler division to the new portion or addition to said lath mill, and for that purpose, it was necessary, essential, and requisite that the water be wholly turned off of said No. 3 automatic sprinkler division, and that said repairs and alterations could not be made to said sprinkler division, and said extensions thereof could not be made, unless the water was turned off of said division. That said repairs could not safely be made while said plaintiff's sawmill was in operation; that plaintiff, Port Blakely Mill Company, on or about April 1, 1907, had progressed with the work of said additions, alterations, and repairs to said lath mill sufficiently to enable it to operate said lath mill, and accordingly the lath mill was put in operation after said date. That said Port Blakely Mill Company continued with the work of making said repairs and alterations and extensions to said sprinkler division with due diligence, and at all times used due diligence that the automatic sprinkler system should at all times be maintained in good working order; and on April 21, 1907, the said alterations, repairs, and extensions to said sprinkler division were so far completed that the water was wholly turned on in said sprinkler division No. 3. That said water was turned on until and during said fire. No. 3 automatic sprinkler system, and all other divisions of said plaintiff's sprinkler system in said mill, were supplied with water in such quantities and with such pressure, that the heat produced by said fire in and about said mill did melt and release said sprinkler heads attached to said No. 3 automatic sprinkler division and all other parts of said sprinkler system in said mill, and permitted the water to flow through the same and out through the pipes distributed throughout said mill, and caused said water to be sprinkled upon said fire. That said sprinkler system in said mill, in all its parts and divisions, was in good and thorough working order at the time of and during said fire.

"(15) That said fire originated under what was known as sprinkler division No. 4 in said sawmill building of said Port Blakely Mill Company, immediately to the westerly in said mill building of said sprinkler division No. 3, aforesaid; and said fire did not originate in said sprinkler division No. 3, aforesaid; said fire originated at what was known as the friction pulley of and under the burner conveyor on the main floor, beneath the sawing floor of said sawmill, and spread immediately on belts and pulleys above the sawing floor to the roof of said sawmill building, causing the sprinklers in the roof of said mill to operate as the fire reached the roof; but said fire rapidly spread beyond the control of said sprinklers."

So that it must be conceded that there was no lack of diligence; that the sprinkler system was in operation at the time of the fire; that the violation of the contract, if there was any violation, was not the cause of the fire, and that the fire did not even originate in the sprinkler division where the repairs had been made. It must therefore readily be seen that, if our former opinion is sustained, it will not be upon any equitable ground, but by reason of sustaining the hard and inflexible rule contended for by appellant, that the covenant or agreement in this case amounted to a warranty or a statement of a condition precedent, a temporary violation of which would preclude a recovery, even though it affirmatively appear that such temporary suspension was not in existence at the time of the fire, and could not possibly have been the cause of the fire. This rule seems to be opposed to our primary conception of fair dealing, is not practised or tolerated in our everyday affairs with each other, is not a commendable rule of action under any circumstances, and is diametrically opposed to the general rule that only such damages can be recovered from the breach of a contract as are shown to be the result of such breach. This rule has stood the test of time, because it is based upon common sense and fair dealing, and no court has ever felt called upon to apologize for it or distinguish it out of existence. Of course, it is fundamental that courts cannot make contracts for parties, and it follows that they must enforce such contracts as are made; but, in interpreting contracts, they should not be bound by hard and fast rules or definitions which evidently were never within the minds of the contracting parties. Insurance contracts, like all other contracts, should be construed with reference to what the parties meant when interpreted in the light, not only of the language employed, but of the evident object of the contract, the benefits secured on one hand, the perils or risks sought to be avoided on the other. They should not be so construed as to work a forfeiture of either party's rights, or to defeat the very object of the contract for which a price has been paid, unless it plainly appears that such was the intention of the contracting parties, and that the effect of the language of the contract was well understood by them when the contract was entered into; and it ought in reason to be a sign to the court that there has been a misapprehension on the part of the contracting party whose rights are thus contracted away,—that the contract was not understood. Especially is this true in this character of contracts, where the language of the contract is the language of the insurance company, whose duty it is to see to it that, where unreasonable and one-sided provisions are incorporated into a contract, the contract is understandingly entered into.

This was the rule of interpretation indorsed by this court in Poultry Producers' Union v. Williams (Wash.) 107 Pac. 1040, referred to by appellant in its reply brief in support of the contention that it was the settled law of this state that the breach of a warranty rendered the policy void, even though the breach may have ceased at the time of the loss. Of course, the ordinary expression was indorsed that the truth of a warranty is a condition precedent, and there is no real objection to this statement if it means that the insured intended the representation to be a warranty which would render his contract void whether it was the cause of the loss or not. But to render a decision valuable on any given point, it is necessary to be informed what the case was which the court was deciding, and to construe the language used with reference to the facts discussed. That was an action by one Williams, an employee of the Poultry Producers' Union, who was afterwards made secretary, treasurer, and manager of the company. In this position a fidelity bond was required, and an application was made and signed by the president of the company. Among other questions asked and answered were the following: "(13) When were his accounts last examined? A. September 11, '07. (14) Were they at that time in every respect correct and funds on hand to balance? A. Yes. (15) Is there now or has there been any shortage due you by bondsmen? A. No." And the application contained the stipulation that "it is agreed that the above answers are to be taken as a condition precedent and as the basis of the said bond applied for." It was further conditioned that, "if the employee's written statement hereinbefore referred to shall be found in any respect untrue, this bond shall be void." It occurred that the answers to some of the pertinent questions were not true, and the insurance company resisted the payment of the policy on that ground; and the court said, in passing upon the question: "Whether the answers made by the applicant for a policy of indemnity or insurance are warranties or mere representations must depend upon the character of the question and its answer, the opportunity of the insurer to guard against the representation, in the light of its consequences, or whether it is material to the risk." It will be seen that in that case the company had no way to guard against the representation; that it certainly was material to the risk, and continued to be material to the risk, for it affected the reputation and character of the party upon whom the risk was placed. This was a risk that would be a continuing risk, running throughout the life of the insurance,—a different proposition altogether from the one at bar, where, if there had been a violation of a condition at some time past, such violation had ceased at the time of the loss, and could not possibly, in any event, have had any effect upon the loss.

In this connection, counsel for appellant also relied upon Hoeland v. Western Union L. Ins. Co. (Wash.) 107 Pac. 866. That, also, was a case where the defense was meritorious, the risk having been taken on representations concerning the health of the applicant, and it afterwards appearing that the representations were not true, the company refused to pay the policy. There could have been no suspicion of the violation of the representations in this case, for if the representations were not true, as we have just remarked in the other case, their effect would be to follow the risk through the life of the assured, and to finally effect the loss. It is true that the court, in discussing the case, said: "The rule is that when a representation made by an applicant for insurance is carried into a contract, and expressly made a part of it, it becomes a warranty, and its materiality is settled by the agreement of the parties,"—citing Elliott on Insurance, § 102. But that statement must have been made with reference to the facts in the case, and the writer of the opinion could not have meant to convey the idea that it would apply to all cases, even where there was a discontinuance of the violation, for the same authority cited, viz., Elliott on Insurance, in § 205, expressly says that such is not the rule under the weight of authority. Section 205 is as follows: "The decisions are conflicting upon the question of the effect of a violation of a condition in a fire insurance policy. The weight of authority seems to support the view that a violation of a condition that works a forfeiture of the policy merely suspends the insurance during the violation; and if the violation is discontinued during the life of the policy, and does not exist at the time of the loss, the policy revives and the company is liable, although it had never consented to the violation . . . and such violation has been such that the company could, had it known of it at the time, have declared a forfeiture therefor." But this question has been decided by this court in Hart v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 9 Wash. 620, 27 L.R.A. 86, 38 Pac. 213, and decided on principles applicable to and necessary to the decision in this case. In that case the stipulation was as follows: "It is understood and agreed that during such time said mill is idle, or not in operation, a watchman shall be employed by the insured, to be in and upon the premises constantly, day and night."

The contention of the appellant was that the terms of the policy constituted the measure of the insurer's liability, and, in order to recover, the insured must show himself within these terms. In other words, the compliance of the insured with the terms of the contract was a condition precedent to the right to recover, and the court instructed the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that at any time during the existence of the policy the assured failed to keep a watchman while the mill was not in operation, plaintiffs could not recover; adding, "unless you further find from the evidence that said fire was not due to, or the result of, their failure to keep such watchman." That instruction was sustained by this court. The stipulation or representation made in that case was as strong as the representation made in this case, with the exception that the word "warranted" is used in the case at bar, instead of the words "it is understood and agreed." Here it is "warranted" that due diligence be used that the automatic sprinkler system shall at all times be maintained in good working order. There it was "understood and agreed" that such and such things should be done. In our judgment the word "warranted" adds nothing to the force of the stipulation. It is well understood—in fact, it is conceded—that the expression of the word "warranty" does not necessarily constitute a warranty; that there may be warranties without the use of the word; that there may not be warranties when the word is used. In Charles Dickens Childs' History of England, in a review of the character of Lord Dunstan, the author said that, after he died, the people called him a saint; but naïvely remarked that calling him a saint did not make him a saint, any more than calling him a coach horse would make him a coach horse. And so it is with the stipulation in this case. The word "warranty" is of such general signification and of such general and discursive use that the expression as used here is absolutely without any legal signification. It is common for people in ordinary conversation to say that "I will warrant this" or "I will warrant that," or "I warrant this," "I warrant you" that so and so will happen, or will not happen, when there is no intention whatever on the part of the speaker to bind himself to make good the expression. The rule of construction must be that the word used is to be construed in its ordinary signification. The legal signification may have been understood by the insurance company when it employed this word, but in order to avail itself of such legal signification, it must appear that the other contracting party also understood it. While there may have been some things said in the discussion of the Hart Case, as there generally is in the discussion of cases, which were not material to the decision of the case, a review of it will show beyond question that the essential idea in the case was the same as the essential idea here, viz., whether, by reason of a breach which did not continue, the policy was avoided. The court, in discussing the case, said: "In an ordinary contract, no damages can be recovered by reason of a breach if the breach does not result in damage. In this case, if the rule contended for by appellants should prevail, if the respondents had failed or neglected to keep a watchman for one day, and the mill had not burned for a month afterward, and it positively appeared that the fire was in no way attributable to such neglect or breach, the company could escape its liability by reason of a breach which was entirely immaterial, and which in no way contributed to the damage." It will be seen that this language is especially applicable to the case at bar, where it appears affirmatively from the findings of the court that the fire was in no way attributable to the breach in relation to the maintaining of the sprinkler system, and that such breach had been corrected before the fire. Again, it was said in that case, that "the rule is universal that statements contained in the application will not be construed to be warranties if elsewhere in the contract there can be found reason to suppose that such was not the clear understanding of the parties;" and the court proceeded to show by other provisions of the contract that such could not have been the undersanding.

So in this case, as showing that it was not the intention of the contracting parties that the representation in regard to the sprinkler should work a forfeiture of the contract or render it void, there are certain statements or provisions and representations made in the contract in which it is especially provided that a forfeiture or avoidance of the contract shall be the result. For instance, in the watchman clause, after stating, as does the sprinkler clause, that "it is warranted by the insured that whenever any of the following named parts of the plant," etc., shall be idle, it is stated that; "if any of the above-named parts is idle or not in operation for a period of more than thirty days without the written consent of the company, this policy shall be void." The same provision substantially is in the "reduced rate average clause," the language being: "In consideration of the reduced rate at which this policy is written, it is expressly stipulated and made a condition of this contract that this company shall be liable for no greater proportion of any loss than the amount hereby insured bears to 70 per cent of the actual cash value of the property described herein at the time when such loss shall happen, nor for more than the proportion which this policy bears to the total insurance thereon." The term "made a condition of this contract" is probably equivalent to a stipulation that the contract shall be void if the condition is violated. Again, there is the following stipulation: "This entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance, or the substance thereof; or if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated herein; or in case of any fraud," etc. There would be nothing unconscionable in construing such provisions or stipulations in a contract of this kind as warranties, for the concealment or misrepresentation of any fact would work an actual hardship upon the insurance company. Again, it is provided: "If a building or any part thereof fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by this policy on such building or its contents shall immediately cease,"—another reasonable provision which is stated so definitely that there is left no room for controversy as to what was meant. Again: "This policy may, by a renewal, be continued under the original stipulation, in consideration of premium for the renewed term, provided that any increase of hazard must be made known to this company at the time of renewal or this policy shall be void,"—another positive expression concerning the avoidance of the contract, based upon reason and good conscience. In the Hart Case, supra, certain similar conditions were reviewed, and the court held that, under the rule of expressio unius est exclusio alterius, the particular clause could not be construed to be a warranty. That rule applies with especial clearness to this case, where so many provisions provide especially that the contract shall be void if they are not complied with, and where there is no such provision in the representation relied upon. In that case, quoting from May on Insurance, vol. 1, § 164, it was said: "They are not necessarily warranties because they appear on the face of the policy. In order to have the force of a warranty, the statement must indeed constitute a part of the contract; but it by no means follows that every statement which constitutes a part of the contract is therefore a warranty. Whether they are so or not will depend upon the form of expression used, the apparent purpose of the insertion, and sometimes upon the connection or relation to other parts of the instrument." That quotation is also expressly applicable to this case; for, contrasting the form of the expression used in this representation relied upon and the form of expression used in the other representations which we have noticed, and considering the relation of the stipulation discussed to the other parts of the instrument, it must appear that it was not the intention of the parties to constitute the representation a warranty. That case has stood as the law of this state since its announcement in October, 1894, up to the time that the opinion was rendered in this case, and should not now be abrogated without being specially overruled.

But, in view of the fact that we are called upon to overrule an opinion announced by a department of this court, we will examine the authorities generally, and especially those relied upon in the opinion to sustain the decision, with a view to ascertaining if the cases cited, in consideration of the facts of the cases which were before the court, actually do sustain the appellant's contention. In the first case cited, viz., Daniels v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co. 12 Cush. 416, 59 Am. Dec. 192, it will be found that it was expressly stipulated that, under certain conditions, the insurance should be void and of no effect. In addition to the fact that the policy provided that, if any misrepresentations were made, the policy should be void and of no effect,—a statement which is not in the provision under discussion,—the decision was against the contention of the insurance company, the court saying: "The defendants, relying upon a violation of the statements in the application, contended that these statements were warranties or conditions, and if they were not strictly and literally true at the time of the application, that the policy was void; and that if they were then true, and the plaintiffs afterwards ceased to comply with them, the policy thereupon became void, whether the same were or were not material to the risk. But the presiding judge instructed the jury, that the statements of the application were not warranties, requiring an exact and literal compliance, but that they were representations; and as such, must have been substantially true and correct as to things done existing at the time the policy was issued; and that so far as they related to the future,—to things to be done, and rules and precautions to be observed,—they were stipulations, to be fairly and substantially complied with." The supreme court said: "The court are of opinion that, looking at the policy and the application, this instruction was correct." Then follows a portion of the quotation set forth in the opinion: "There is undoubtedly some difficulty in determining by any simple and certain test what propositions in a contract of insurance constitute warranties, and what representations."

In Cooley's Brief on Law of Insurance, vol. 2, p. 1133, that author says: "In accordance with the principle discussed in subdivision (b), that warranties are part of the policy, it may be laid down as the well-settled rule that, subject to qualifications to be discussed hereafter, all statements regarding the risk, contained in or appearing on the face of the policy, are warranties." But the qualifications thereafter discussed render the rule announced almost without value, for no court has gone to the extent of holding that all statements regarding the risks contained in or appearing on the face of the policy are warranties; and the cases cited by Cooley to sustain the announcement made in the text treat mostly upon the qualifications which are mentioned in the citation, and hold almost uniformly that, where there is any doubt as to whether a statement in an insurance policy is an express warranty, the court should lean against that construction which imposes upon the assured the obligation of a warranty. In one of the cases cited (National Bank v. Union Ins. Co. 88 Cal. 497, 22 Am. St. Rep. 324, 26 Pac. 509) it was held that, although the Code of that state provided that a statement in a policy of a matter relating to the person or thing insured or to the risk as a fact is an express warranty, if, taking the entire policy in all its terms and language, it can be seen that such was not the intention of the parties, the statement of fact cannot be deemed an express warranty. Redman v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 47 Wis. 89, 32 Am. Rep. 751, 1 N. W. 393, does not, either in principle or in the facts, sustain the opinion. There the court laid down the general rule that a stipulation in an application for fire insurance should be construed in a doubtful case most strongly against the insurer, by whom it was framed; and that, in a doubtful case, that construction of a contract which will save it is to be preferred to one which will destroy it; that the use of the word "warranty" in a contract does not necessarily control its construction; there may be a warranty without the use of that word, and its use will not always create one; that the stipulation in the policy, that the application shall be considered a warranty by the insured, must be construed to mean such a warranty as is stipulated in the application itself. In that case, in answer to the question, "What material was used in lubricating the machinery?" the assured answered: "Lard and sperm oil;" and to the questions whether the machinery was regularly oiled, and, if so, by whom and how often, the answer was: "Yes, by engineer and miller, as often as necessary." The proof was that, during the whole life of the policy, an oil known as "Fire Engine Oil" was constantly used in the mill for lubricating purposes, and that the machinery was not usually oiled by the engineer or miller, but by another person, specially employed by plaintiffs for that purpose. The circuit court held that the answers to the above questions were absolute and continued undertakings in the nature of express warranties, and that the failure by the plaintiffs to use lard and sperm oil, and to have the machinery oiled by the engineer and miller invalidated the contract of insurance, and released the defendant from any and all obligations under it, and the plaintiff was nonsuited. This judgment was reversed by the supreme court, the court saying: "The stipulation was framed by the insurer, and had it been intended to require the insured to go beyond the interrogatories and disclose facts not called for therein (if any existed), material to the risk, a general interrogatory calling for such facts would have been inserted; or, at least, the stipulation would have been framed to express that intention more clearly. We cannot assume that the insurer would leave its intention in that behalf to rest in uncertain and doubtful inference, when it was so easy to express it clearly and unmistakably."

In Wood v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 13 Conn. 533, 35 Am. Dec. 92, while the court laid down and indorsed some of the most radical rules, going so far as to state that any statement or description, or any undertaking on the part of the insured, on the face of the policy, which relates to the risk, is a warranty, and that whether this is declared to be warranty totidem verbis or is ascertained to be such by construction, is immaterial; that in either case it is an express warranty and a condition precedent; yet, as we have before indicated, to avoid the harshness of this rule, the court discriminated the facts in the particular case involved, and decided the case in favor of the plaintiffs.

In Moulton v. American L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 335, 28 L. ed. 447, 4 Sup. St. Rep. 466, the court reaffirmed the doctrine that, when a policy of insurance contains contradictory provisions, or has been so framed as to leave room for construction, rendering it doubtful whether the parties intended the exact truth of the applicant's statements to be a condition precedent to any binding contract, the court should lean against that construction which imposes upon the assured the obligations of a warranty. This contention arose out of answers to certain interrogatories in relation to the health of the applicant and the health of his ancestors, he having answered that his father, mother, brothers, or sisters had not been afflicted with consumption or any other serious family disease such as scrofula, insanity, etc., since childhood, and that there were no circumstances which would render an insurance on his life more than usually hazardous. He also answered that, as an applicant, he "reviewed the answers to the foregoing questions, clearly understood them, and reaffirmed the answers;" and at the close of the series of questions was the following stipulation: "It is hereby declared and warranted that the above are fair and true answers to the foregoing questions, and it is acknowledged and agreed by the undersigned that this application shall form part of the contract of insurance, and that if there be in any of the answers herein made any untrue or evasive statements or any misrepresentation or concealment of facts, then any policy granted upon this application shall be null and void, and all payments made thereon shall be forfeited to the company."

Notwithstanding this strong expression on the part of the appellant, the court held that, in the absence of explicit, unequivocal stipulations, requiring such an interpretation, it should not be inferred that a person took a life policy with the distinct understanding that it should be void, and all premiums paid thereon forfeited, if at any time in the past, however remote, he was, whether conscious of the fact or not, afflicted with some of the diseases mentioned in the question to which he was required to make a categorical answer, saying that "if those who organize and control life insurance companies wish to exact from the applicant, as a condition precedent to a valid contract, a guaranty against the existence of diseases of the presence of which in his system he has and can have no knowledge, and which even skilful physicians are often unable, after the most careful examination, to detect, the terms of the contract to that effect must be so clear as to exclude any other conclusion;" and reversed the judgment of the lower court, which held that he could not recover. Wood on Fire Insurance simply states the general rule which is contended for by the appellant, only as decided by certain cases. We have been unable to obtain Marshall on Insurance, but as near as we can gather from quotations, the harsh and inflexible rule sought to be invoked by the appellant has been supported by courts which drew their conclusions from this old work, from which a majority of the courts have receded. In McKenzie v. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. 112 Cal. 548, 44 Pac. 922, the decision was based upon an absolute condition stipulated, and with the stipulation that, if the building should remain shut down for more than thirty days without notice, the policy should be null and void. The condition was broken without any excuse, and the court held that the provision was a warranty. In Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Coos County, 151 U. S. 452, 38 L. ed. 231, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, the policy provided that it should become void if, without notice to the company, and its permission indorsed thereon, mechanics were employed in building, altering or repairing, and it was held that a violation of this worked a forfeiture of the policy under the express stipulation of the policy that "this policy should be void and of no effect if, without notice to the company and permission therefor [in writing] indorsed hereon, . . . the premises shall be used or occupied so as to increase the risk . . . or the risk be increased by any means within the knowledge or control of the assured . . . or if mechanics are employed in building, altering, or repairing premises named herein; except in dwelling houses, where not exceeding five days in one year are allowed for repairs."

It is unquestionably true, however, that there are cases, though not by any means a majority of the hundreds of cases that have been decided upon this question, that hold to the strict rule contended for; but in grateful contrast to those courts which adopt the rule of strict construction by, it seems to us, making a fetish of words, expressions, and definitions, and attributing potent magic to the word "warranty," or words of similar import, comes like a refreshing breeze from the sea of judicial enlightenment, the voice of the supreme court of Kentucky, in Germania Ins. Co. v. Rudwig, 80 Ky. 223, where the rule is condemned. In the course of the opinion it was said: "There is no doubt that an insurance company relies upon the truth of the representations made in either case, and equally certain that, if untrue and material to the risk, no inquiry will be directed for the purpose of determining whether the statement was fraudulently or innocently made. The injury to the insurer is the same; but when no injury can possibly result to the company, where is the breach and what is the penalty? It would certainly be no breach of warranty in a chattel if the quality was better than that warranted, unless the inferior article alone would conform to the wants of the purchaser; and if a breach, the damages would be merely nominal; but in regard to insurance contracts, that which neither increases nor diminishes the risk, and which could not have influenced the action of either party in making the contract, is seized upon as a ground for forfeiting the entire policy, and depriving the assured not only of all the benefits of the contract, but permits the insurer to retain all the premiums paid. . . . Such contracts are to be interpreted like other agreements, and must be governed by the same rules, good faith . . . being especially required, as one of the parties is necessarily less acquainted with the details of the subject of the contract than the other." The defense in this case was raised because the applicant had made a mistake as to the age at which his father and mother died; and had also violated the provisions of the contract in relation to going outside of certain territory for a limited time, which was forbidden by the contract.

In Westfall v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co. 2 Duer, 490, where a clause in the policy of insurance declared against the use of camphene, etc., it was held that there was no evidence that the loss resulted from the use of camphene, and if there was no other evidence than the breach of the alleged warranty, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. Said the court: "If the use of camphene was meant to be prohibited in the same sense as the storage of gunpowder, we can discover no reason why the prohibition was not express, in the one case as well as in the other. Had the intent been the same, it seems to us that such would have been the language."

And so in the case at bar. Had the intent been to make a warranty of the stipulation in relation to the sprinkler, it would have been so expressed, as it was in the other clauses above mentioned.

The case of Au Sable Lumber Co. v. Detroit Mfrs. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 89 Mich. 407, 50 N. W. 870, was cited by this court in the case of Hart, supra, and it was there said: "If it was intended that any failure to keep a watchman rendered the policy void, the parties would have so declared." That case was expressly in point in the case considered, and we think is as clearly in point in this case. To the same effect is McGannon v. Michigan Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 127 Mich. 636, 54 L.R.A. 739, 89 Am. St. Rep. 501, 87 N. W. 61. Selby v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. (C. C.) 67 Fed. 490, was practically the same kind of a case, where the parties had fixed the penalty for breach of warranty by stipulations in the contract in relation to some things, but not in relation to the matter which constituted the defense. In Phoenix Assur. Co. v. Munger Improved Cotton Mach. Mfg. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 49 S. W. 271, it was decided that a temporary breach of a stipulation in a policy to which there was not attached a specific forfeiture, which breach did not exist at the time of the fire loss, and which did not contribute thereto, does not prevent recovery on the policy. The appellant contends that this case is not applicable to the case at bar, but it seems to us that the case is exactly applicable, both as to what is stated in the opinion of the court, and as to the matters decided. In Sumter Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Phoenix Assur. Co. 76 S. C. 76, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 736, 121 Am. St. Rep. 941, 56 S. E. 654, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 780, where an insurance policy provided that an increased hazard within the knowledge of the insured would avoid the policy, the owner of the building insured rented to a tenant a portion thereof, to be used for a business more hazardous than contemplated by the policy, and it was held not to avoid the policy, because the temporary hazard ended without loss, and the loss occurred from another source, the court saying: "And if a temporary change of possession, increasing the risk while it lasts, but discontinued before the fire, does not totally avoid the policy, but merely suspends it during the prohibited use, the provisions of the policy above quoted cannot avail the defendant."

This case answers the contention that is made much of, that, by reason of the provision in the policy that the sprinkler system should be employed, the insured obtained insurance at a considerably less price than he could have obtained it for if there had been no such provision. But it seems to us there is no merit in this contention, for the reason that the limited price was accorded to the insured because, by reason of the installing of the sprinkler system, there would be less liability of fire, the object and efficacy of the system being to put out incipient fires. It may have been that that object was attained in this case many times before the fire which had occurred, through the agency of this sprinkler system. But, in any event, the object was attained and insured to the benefit of the insurance company, when it is conceded that the sprinkler system was in vogue and in good running order at the time of the fire; and when it must be further conceded that, if it had not been installed at the time of the fire, the insured could not have recovered at all. The case just quoted, in the course of its argument, says: "The reasoning in Kyte v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 149 Mass. 116, 3 L.R.A. 508, 21 N. E. 361, the Massachusetts case just referred to, is that, unless the policy be regarded as at an end the moment the hazard is increased, the insurance company would be held to furnish insurance for which it had not received the consideration it was entitled to demand, and which, with knowledge of the facts, it would have demanded. But this reasoning seems fallacious, for the insurer is generally held to be not liable at all if the fire occurs during the continuance of the increased risk, and in consequence of it.

Appellant, in its reply brief, answers this case by saying that no warranty was involved in it, and there was no discussion therein of the law of warranty; but there was a decision of a case which involved the identical question which is presented in this case. The underlying principle was discussed and decided without, possibly, any mention of the word "forfeiture," and it is really a more helpful case in determining the question under discussion than if it had been hampered by a discussion of terms and expressions. In New England F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wetmore, 32 Ill. 221, where a policy of insurance provided that, should the premises insured be applied during the term of insurance to any prohibited use, the policy thenceforth and so long as the same should be so appropriated and applied or used should cease and be of no force or effect, it was held that the application of the property to a prohibited use within the term would not affect the right of the assured to recover in case of a loss, if, at the time of the loss, the property was not being so improperly applied or used, and it did not appear that such antecedent misapplication or use increased the risk or contributed to the loss.

In Schmidt v. Peoria M. & F. Ins. Co. 41 Ill. 295, it was held that, where it was provided in a policy of insurance that "if after insurance is effected either by the original policy or by the renewal thereof, the risk be increased by any means or occupied in any way so as to render the risk more hazardous than at the time of insuring, such insurance shall be void and of none effect," these words are construed to mean that the policy shall become inoperative only while the increased risk shall be in existence, and when it terminates the liability of the company shall recommence. This case was reaffirmed in Insurance Co. of N. A. v. McDowell, 50 Ill. 120, 99 Am. Dec. 497. In Traders' Ins. Co. v. Catlin, 163 Ill. 256, 35 L.R.A. 595, 45 N. E. 255, it was held that the change of the use of an insured building, increasing the hazard, will not prevent recovery, where such use has been abandoned without the declaration of a forfeiture by the company before a loss occurred, and such increase of the hazard in no way continued to affect the risk at the time of the loss, although there had been a stipulation that there should be no increase of hazard. The language in that stipulation was plain and emphatic, being as follows: "If the assured shall fail to make known to the company at once any fact or circumstance which renders the risk more hazardous than at the time of insuring, or if the hazard be increased by any means within the control of the assured, or if gasoline or petroleum or any of its products are deposited, used, or kept, or burning gas is made, generated, or carbureted within the building and contiguous thereto, then and in every such case this policy shall be void unless consent is indorsed by the company thereon."

It was contended by the learned attorney for the insurance company in that case that the case which we have just cited from Illinois had been determined upon the authority of New England F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wetmore, supra, and that that case had not really determined the questions raised in the subsequent cases and the question which was raised in the case of the Traders' Insurance Company, now under consideration. But, notwithstanding that contention, which seems to have some merit in it, the court refused to retreat from the principles announced in the subsequent cases, and emphatically held that the representation was not a continuing one, and did not avoid the policy. It is contended by appellant, as in the preceding case, that the court in Illinois was not considering a warranty, and that there was no discussion in the opinion as to a breach of warranty, and no reference whatever made to the law of warranty. But we have the same answer to make to this criticism that was made supra. It is insisted, however, that the supreme court of Illinois, in the case of Norways v. Thuringia Ins. Co. 204 Ill. 334, 68 N. E. 551, expresses the view of the supreme court of that state on the subject of forfeiture. This case is also cited by appellant in its reply brief, but an examination of the case shows that it in no way contravenes the doctrine just cited. There the policy provided that it should be void if gasoline was kept on the premises excepting by permission, and the testimony shows that not only was gasoline kept on the premises between the time that the policy was issued and the time of the fire, but that it was on the premises at the time of the fire. The court, in its opinion, stated that that proposition had been firmly established and undisputed, and that the burden could not be thrown upon the insurance company to prove that the fire was attributable to the unlawful storing of the gasoline in the house. This opinion seems to be in consonance with both reason and authority.

In Born v. Home Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 379, 80 Am. St. Rep. 300, 81 N. W. 676, where a policy on property provided a forfeiture for mortgaging it without the company's consent, and assured did mortgage a portion of the property, but before loss paid the encumbrance, it was held that such payment operated to restore the property to the protection of the policy, and hence plaintiff was entitled to recover for the loss thereof. "The theory," said the court, "upon which an existing mortgage is held to be a violation of a clause in the policy against an increase of risk is that it does increase the risk." But, according to the opinion of the court, there was no increase of the risk after the mortgage had been paid off. So the theory upon which the insurance company in this case stipulated for the instalment of the sprinkler system was that such instalment would decrease the risk. And it did increase the risk during the time it was not in working order, but the same reasoning would apply as in the mortgage case in holding that, after its instalment, the increase of risk would be at an end.

In Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013, the policy contained the following provision: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void . . . if a building herein described, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant or unoccupied and so remain for ten days." The house covered by the policy became vacant and unoccupied and so remained for thirty days, when it was reoccupied. The house was destroyed after reoccupancy. Held, that the policy did not become absolutely void by reason of the house having become vacant and remaining so for thirty days, but the insurance was merely suspended during the period of violation, and revived upon the reoccupancy of the house, and became again of binding force and effect. In Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Pitts, 88 Miss. 587, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 627, 117 Am. St. Rep. 756, 41 So. 5, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 54, under a provision of a fire policy that it should be void if the building be or become vacant or unoccupied and so remain for ten days, where the building was unoccupied for more than ten days, but a fire occurred afterwards, during its occupancy, it was held that the policy did not become void. In Omaha F. Ins. Co. v. Dierks, 43 Neb. 473, 61 N. W. 740, where an insured encumbered his personal property by a chattel mortgage after such property had been insured, and contrary to the provisions of the insurance policy, he was allowed to recover the value of the insured property destroyed by showing that, at the time of its destruction, it was free from the lien of the mortgage; citing State Ins. Co. v. Schreck, 27 Neb. 527, 6 L.R.A. 524, 20 Am. St. Rep. 696, 43 N. W. 340. In Hinckley v.

Germania F. Ins. Co. 140 Mass. 38, 54 Am. Rep. 445, 1 N. E. 737, it was held that the temporary illegal use without a license of property insured, if un contemplated at the time of taking the policy, would not of itself and as a matter of law render the policy void during the whole of the rest of the time it was to run. It would simply viti ate the policy during the time of the il legal use, and, when the illegal use stopped, the policy would revive; the court saying: "It is not the necessary meaning of the word 'void,' as used in policies of insurance, that it shall, under all circumstances, imply an absolute and permanent avoidance of a pol icy which has once begun to run; but the meaning of the word is sufficiently satisfied by reading it as void or inoperative for the time being,"—citing Phillips on Insurance, vol. 1, § 975, where it is said: "After it [the policy] has begun, so that the premium is become due, it surely is but equitable that a temporary noncompliance should have effect only during its continuance. To carry it further is to inflict a penalty upon the as sured, and decree a gratuity to the insurer, who is thus permitted to retain the whole premium when he has merited but part of it,"—citing many cases to sustain the rule.

It is useless to cite a greater number of cases. But we are satisfied, from an exam ination of all the cases cited by both ap pellant and respondents, and of all that we have examined on our own motion, that the statement of Elliott on Insurance, above quot ed, to the effect that the weight of authority seems to support the view that a violation of a condition that works a forfeiture of the policy merely suspends the insurance during the violation is a correct announcement. In Traders' Ins. Co. v. Catlin, supra, the court, to show the fallacy of the rule contended for, says: "That a recovery on a policy on a building in the center of the burned district in Chicago's great fire should be defeated because a gallon of gasoline was therein kept and used a year before that time does not commend itself as a reasonable rule."

To still further show the fallacy, by dis torting the proposition, yet still leaving it within the bounds of possibility or even probability, under the rule contended for, if the holder of a life insurance policy in the state of Washington, which prohibits by its terms the departure of the applicant from the territory of the United States, should in advertently or otherwise straggle across the boundary line into British Columbia, and, after detecting the mistake which he had made geographically, should return to the state of Washington, live here for twenty, thirty, or forty years, paying his annual pre miums, which are accepted and appropriated by the company, upon his death, occurring by an accidental discharge of a firearm or by being cremated in a burning theater,— causes which could not possibly have been af fected by the breach of his contract,—his beneficiary would be deprived of the benefit of his life insurance policy by reason of such violation. The thought is too abhorrent to be maintained for a moment, and yet in principle it is exactly the same.

But, in addition to all these questions which we have discussed, we think probably there is no case which would hold that the appellant in this case could successfully urge this defense, for, according to the findings of the court, there has been no violation of any contract whatever by the respondents. Con ceding that there was a warranty, there was no warranty that the assured should at all times maintain the automatic sprinkler sys tem, but the representation was only that the assured should "use due diligence" in maintaining the sprinkler system; and, as we have seen, under the findings of the court, due diligence was used in that regard. So that it seems absolutely at variance with any theory of the law to prohibit the insured from recovering under this policy.

The judgment of the lower court will therefore be affirmed.

Crow, Parker, Fullerton, and Mount, JJ., concur.

Morris, J., dissenting:

I dissent for the reasons given in the opin ion on the original hearing in Department 1, to which I still adhere. The majority opin ion, as herein expressed, wipes out the law of warranty in this state,— a principle that is as old and well founded as any other principle in insurance law. There is no con flict between the Hart Case, referred to in the majority opinion, and the rule announced in the opinion on the original hearing herein. The Hart Case deals with a representation which the court refuses to extend into a warranty, either by interpretation or impli cation, and holds that, in order to be read as a warranty, the provision must appear to be expressly so intended by the insured and insurer, and, in case of ambiguity or doubt, the construction should be that of a repre sentation rather than a warranty. The same rules are announced and adhered to in the original opinion, and there was no expressed or implied intention to depart from them. It is said in the Hart Case that, notwithstand ing the policy contains hard and unjust con ditions, the insurance company has the right to make such a contract, and, when so made, it is the duty of the courts to enforce them regardless of their harshness, when it ap pears such a contract was actually made. The original opinion goes no further. Finding an express warranty in the policy, based upon a reduction of the premium, it gave effect to it, and in so doing followed the law, both in principle and upon authority.

JAMES B. BURROUGHS, Appt.

(— Ala. —, 50 So. 1025.)

Lien — vendor — agreement to support.

No vendor's lien exists where the consideration for the conveyance of land is an agreement to support the grantor during life.

(November 18, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Tuscaloosa County Court directing the enforcement of a vendor's lien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Oliver, Verner, & Rice for appellant.

Mr. Daniel Collier for appellee.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decree appealed from declared, and directed the enforcement of, a vendor's lien as prayed in complainant's (appellee's) bill. The bill, in paragraph 4, expressly alleges that the consideration for the conveyance of her land, by complainant to J. B. Burroughs, "was that Burroughs should support and maintain the complainant for the balance of her life; that the support and maintenance of the complainant for the period of her natural life was and is the agreed purchase price for the said lands;" or that the consideration was that Burroughs should furnish reasonable amount necessary to her support during her life. The bill, in the cited paragraph, pointedly alleges that the sum recited in the deed exhibited with the bill, viz., $150, was not the consideration for the conveyance, and that it never was paid. Following the first stated averments, the true consideration for the conveyance is alleged as quoted above. Accordingly the cause must be considered without reference to the argued inquiry, based on one of the principles treated in Hooper v. Savannah & M. R. Co. 69 Ala. 529, whether a vendor's lien arises where the promise or covenant of the grantee has, by agreement of the parties, a fixed, certain, monetary substitute, to be effective upon the contingency of a failure of the grantee to perform as he covenanted or agreed to do. There being no allegations in the bill on which to predicate the application of the principle mentioned, a decree rested on the principle cannot be sustained. Much of the argument of the solicitors in the cause becomes inapt on the state of the pleading here.

The question, then, is: Has a grantor a lien upon the subject of the sale and conveyance, when the sole consideration therefor is the agreement of the grantee to care for and support the grantor during life? We think there can be no doubt that one essential condition to the creation of a vendor's lien is that there is a definite, "ascertained, absolute debt, owing alone for the purchase price of the land conveyed;" on the contrary, that no such lien arises where the consideration for the conveyance is an uncertain, indefinite, contingent demand. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1250, 1251, and authorities cited in notes thereto. Under this doctrine, the Note. — Agreement for support in consideration of conveyance, as basis for equitable lien.

This subject is treated in a note to Abbott v. Sanders, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 725. Some additional cases are given below.

Where the owner of lands conveys them to another in consideration that the latter will pay the former's debts and support him during life, but the grantee refuses, after receiving the deed, to put the contract in writing, or to pay the debts or furnish the support, equity will charge the lands with the debts and the support of the grantor. Hamilton v. Barricklow, 96 Ind. 398.

In Norris v. Archibald, 29 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 289, a deed recited that it was given in consideration of $1 and the covenant contained in a separate agreement. The agreement referred to, after reciting the giving of the deed, bound the vendee, his heirs, executors, and administrators to support the vendor. It was held that, although the support of vendor was a personal debt, there could be no lien or charge on the land, as none was created by express words.

When land was conveyed with the verbal understanding that the income should be devoted to the support of a third person, and the grantee thereafter executed a deed of trust wherein he agreed to support such third person, but limited his liability to the rents of the land or the interest on the purchase money should the land be sold, it was held in McArthur v. Gordon, 51 Hun, 511, 4 N. Y. Supp. 584, that no vendor's lien exists in favor of the third person, as he is not a vendor, but is a vendee of an equity in the premises, whose rights may be enforced in equity. This case was modified in 126 N. Y. 597, 12 L.R.A. 667, 27 N. E. 1033, on another point.

complainant, as upon the averments of this bill, had nor has a vendor's lien. No debt, ascertained and definite, was created by the agreement between the parties for the sale and conveyance of the land. Her remedy was "on the undertaking," as Gardner v. Knight, 124 Ala. 273, 274, 27 So. 298, adjudges.

The decree is reversed, and a decree will be here rendered dismissing the bill.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the complaint in this action that on the 17th day of February, 1893, plaintiff's husband was the owner of certain land in Nicollet county, of the value of $4,500, which then, and for many years prior, had constituted the family homestead; that on the date stated plaintiff and her husband, being then well advanced in years, and desirous of making such disposition of the property as would secure to them sufficient support and maintenance in health and sickness during the remainder of their lives, and whereby they might be relieved of the care and responsibility in connection with the operation of the farm, entered into an agreement with Louis Bruer, their son, whereby they by warranty deed conveyed the property to said son in consideration of a contemporaneous execution by him of an agreement for their support for the remainder of their lives. This agreement was in the following form and language, viz.:

Know all men by these presents, that I, Louis Bruer, of the town of Courtland, in the county of Nicollet, and state of Minnesota, am held and firmly bound unto Caroline and Henry Bruer, her husband, of the same place, in the sum of two thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States, to be paid to the said Caroline Bruer and Henry Bruer, her husband, or the survivor thereof, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, for which payment, well and truly to be made, I bind myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents.

Sealed with my seal, and dated, this seventeenth day of February, A. D. 1893.

The condition of the above obligation is such that, whereas, the said Caroline Bruer and Henry Bruer, her husband, have this day granted, bargained, sold, and conveyed to said Louis Bruer certain valuable pieces of real property, situate in said Nicollet county; and whereas, the said Louis Bruer, in consideration of said conveyance, covenanted and agreed to and with said Caroline Bruer and Henry Bruer, her husband, to keep and maintain them, the said Caroline Bruer and Henry Bruer, during their natural lives, and the survivor thereof during his or her natural life, in suitable lodging, board, and clothing, and necessary firewood, dried, cut, and split, in suitable size for the stove, all his own expense and free from any charges to said Caroline or Henry Bruer, this at his own residence in said county of Nicollet, if possible, and that, in case they could not agree to live peaceably together in the same house, then in that case, at the request of said Caroline Bruer, he, the said Louis Bruer, should and would build a suitable dwelling for them to live in, on his premises, and furnish them with suitable food, clothing, and firewood as above mentioned; and whereas, the said Louis Bruer further covenanted and agreed, consideration of said conveyance, to pay annually and each and every year during her natural life to said Caroline Bruer the sum of fifty dollars in lawful money of the United States, the first payment thereof to be made on the first day of December, A. D. 1893, and annually thereafter on or before each succeeding first day of December, and it being further covenanted and agreed, between the parties above named, that in the case of the death of said Louis Bruer before the death of said Caroline Bruer, that she, the said Caroline Bruer, shall be entitled to claim and receive from the estate of said Louis Bruer the sum of one thousand dollars in lieu of and in payment in full of the annuities hereinbefore mentioned to be delivered to her and her husband in full satisfaction of this bond:

Now, therefore, if the above bounden Louis Bruer shall well and truly perform all the obligations and make all the payments at such time and times as he hereinbefore to perform the same and make payment thereof, then this obligation to be null and void; otherwise, to remain in full force and virtue.

Witness my hand and seal, and dated, this seventeenth day of February, 1893.

This contract and agreement on the part of the son constituted the sole and only consideration for the conveyance of the property to him. Defendant Bertha Bruer is the wife of defendant Louis Bruer. Soon after the execution of these instruments, plaintiff's husband died. The complaint alleges that defendant has failed and refused to comply with his agreement in many substantial respects, which are particularly enumerated therein. The prayer for relief is that the deed, together with the record thereof, be canceled and declared null and void, and that plaintiff have such other or further relief as the court may deem proper and just. Defendants joined in a general demurrer to the complaint, and appealed from an order overruling it.

As we understand the facts as pleaded, the conveyance to defendant was in the ordinary form of a warranty deed, containing no exceptions or reservations respecting the estate conveyed, and it passed to defendant the unconditional title to the property. The agreement of support, a separate contract, though a part of the same transaction, and the sole consideration of the deed, in no way limits the operation and effect of the deed, nor does it, expressly or otherwise, declare that a failure to comply with its provisions shall work a forfeiture of the title or other rights acquired by the conveyance. In view of this situation, it is the contention of defendants that, conceding the breach of the contract, plaintiff is not entitled to the relief demanded, viz., cancellation of the deed, but is limited to an action for such damages as have resulted to her from defendants' failure to perform.

It is elementary that forfeitures are not favored, and that conditions in a conveyance of real property, a breach of which by the terms of the deed work a forfeiture of the estate, are construed strictly against the grantor, and if doubt arises, from the language of the instrument, whether a forfeiture or reversion of the estate was intended, it will be resolved in favor of the grantee, and the grantor put to his remedy by an action for damages; but where clearly expressed, and free from doubt, a forfeiture will be declared by the court in all cases where a breach of the conditions is shown. Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Hanson, 101 Minn. 260, 118 Am. St. Rep. 623, 112 N. W. 217; Hamel v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 97 Minn. 334, 107 N. W. 139. What particular provisions in a conveyance constitute conditions subsequent, as distinguished from mere covenants, the breach of which will work a forfeiture, is a subject upon which the courts are not in entire harmony. In ordinary transactions of the kind, an unconditional sale and conveyance of the property upon the promise and agreement of the grantee to pay the purchase price at some stated time in the future, or to do some other act or thing in consideration of the conveyance, where there is no express provision for re-entry, or forfeiture for a failure to perform, a forfeiture will not be declared by the court, and the remedy of the grantor is an action for damages. This rule or principle is invoked by defendants, and it must be applied, unless the particular class of contracts of which the one under consideration is a member is for some reason removed from its operation.

Contracts and agreements of the kind are quite familiar to the courts. They are, as a rule, made by people well along in years, with a child or other relative, and are intended to secure to the old people proper and suitable support and maintenance during their declining years, at the same time relieving them of the care and responsibility incident to the management of their affairs. They part with their property in the expectation and belief that their future necessities and comforts are fully provided for, and in an abiding faith that natural affection and filial duty will prompt and secure a faithful discharge of the obligations assumed by the child to whom they convey. There is in such transactions an element of confidence reposed by the old people in their grantee, sacred in its nature, a breach of which, and retention of the benefits, no court should tolerate by a refinement upon technical rules and principles of law. By the modern trend of authority these transactions are placed in a class by themselves, and enforced without reference to the form or phraseology of the writing by which they are expressed, or whether by the strict letter of the law a forfeiture of the estate is expressly provided for. The Wisconsin supreme court recently has taken a broad view of such contracts, and laid down a rule which commends itself as fair and equitable, and results in effectuating the intention of the parties to the transaction. The agreement of support, whatever its form, is construed by that court as a condition subsequent, and not a mere covenant. Glocke v. Glocke, 113 Wis. 303, 57 L.R.A. 458, 89 N. W. 118. Other states apply substantially the same rule of construction, or at least afford relief commensurate with the peculiar nature and purposes of such contracts. Leach v. Leach, 4 Ind. 628, 58 Am. Dec. 642; Richter v. Richter, 111 Ind. 456, 12 N. E. 698; Patterson v. Patterson, 81 Iowa, 626, 47 N. W. 768; Dodge v. Dodge, 92 Mich. 109, 52 N. W. 296; Reeder v. Reeder, 89 Ky. 529, 12 S. W. 1063; Stebbins v. Petty, 209 Ill. 291, 101 Am. St. Rep. 243, 70 N. E. 673.

The question, on facts like those in the case at bar, has never before come squarely before this court. Peters v. Tunell, 43 Minn. 473, 19 Am. St. Rep. 252, 45 N. W. 867, though somewhat similar in its facts, did not involve the question whether the agreement of support was a condition subsequent, a breach of which would work a forfeiture of the title conveyed. That was an action to recover the purchase price of the property, both real and personal, conveyed to a son, and to enforce the same against the land, as a vendor's lien. This the court held could not be done. The questions whether the agreement of support amounted to a condition subsequent, or whether plaintiff could have a forfeiture declared for a breach thereof, were not presented or argued by plaintiff's counsel, and the remark of the court, in the first paragraph of the opinion, that such relief could not be granted, was not necessary to a decision of the question presented, and therefore not of binding force. In so far as the court there held that the plaintiff had no remedy by way of enforcing his claim as a lien against the land, the case would seem to have been in effect overruled by Doescher v. Spratt, 61 Minn. 326, 63 N. W. 736, and Childs v. Rue, 84 Minn. 323, 87 N. W. 918, though the case was not referred to in either opinion. The opposite conclusion was reached in both those cases, and this notwithstanding the fact that the deed containing the agreement for support did not provide a forfeiture for a breach of the conditions, or in any manner make the claim for support a charge upon the land. In Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Hanson, supra, the agreement was embodied in the deed, in connection with the express stipulation that, if the grantee failed to comply with it, the deed should be null and void. This was held a condition subsequent. Such were in effect the terms of the deed involved in Johnson v. Paulson, 103 Minn. 158, 114 N. W. 739, where the same conclusion was reached, with a qualification that a failure of performance would not necessarily require a decree of forfeiture of title, but that the particular relief to be granted would depend upon the nature and extent of the grantee's delinquency, and all the equities between the parties, as disclosed by the evidence. The case of Ebert v. Gildemeister, 106 Minn. 83, 118 N. W. 155, involved only the sufficiency of the evidence to support a judgment of forfeiture there declared, unless defendant should comply with its mandate and make certain money payments within the time specified therein. In Pinger v. Pinger, 40 Minn. 417, 42 N. W. 289, there appears to have been a failure of the grantee, after procuring a deed from his parent, to enter into the contract of support, and the effect of such an agreement was not passed upon.

So far as our research has extended, these are the only cases in which contracts of this character have been before this court, and, as pointed out, none of them are precisely like that at bar. In Doescher v. Spratt and Childs v. Rue, supra, the stipulation of support appeared in the body of the conveyance, and did not amount to a condition subsequent, yet the court held that equity would afford appropriate relief. In the case at bar the agreement of support is contained in a separate instrument, and in the form of a bond in the penal sum of $2,000, conditioned for the payment of that amount in the event defendant failed to perform his agreement. In this respect the case is similar to Glocke v. Glocke, supra, where the grantee secured his agreement of support by a mortgage upon the property conveyed to him, yet the supreme court of Wisconsin held the agreement a condition subsequent, and enforced it.

In view of the decisions of this court in the cases referred to, and the general trend of judicial opinion elsewhere (Abbott v. Sanders, 80 Vt. 179, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 725, 66 Atl. 1032, we are of opinion, and so hold, that the form of agreement of support is unimportant. Its effect is in no way changed, whether it appear in the body of the conveyance, or in a separate instrument by way of bond or mortgage; and, as it appears in this case the defendant had failed and refused to carry out the conditions of his agreement, plaintiff is entitled to such relief as the evidence may, on trial, show her entitled to. We cannot hold, in view of prior decisions, that the agreement constituted a condition subsequent, entitling plaintiff to a return of the land; but, as remarked in the Johnson Case, the court may grant such relief as the facts will in equity and good conscience justify. For this relief the complaint is sufficient, and contains all necessary and essential allegations.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOSIE MCKINLEY, Appt.

v.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Carrier — ejecting trespasser — Liability.

1. A railroad company is not liable for ejecting from its train a woman whose ticket was not good on its road, and who refused to pay fare, about a mile from the station at which she embarked in a city in the night, where she made no request to be put off at any other place, except to be returned to the embarking point, if the place of ejection is as convenient to her as any place along the line, unless she should be returned to the embarking point or carried to destination.

Same — opinion as to route.

2. A carrier's agent selling a passage 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

ticket is not bound to volunteer information unsought with respect to the route over which it must be used.

Same — direction as to train.

3. A ticket agent at a union junction point at which a passenger changes cars is not, when asked by him when a train leaves for his destination, bound to ascertain which route his ticket requires him to take, and see that he takes the right train; but performs his duty, in the absence of any special request, by stating the times at which trains leave over the several routes which reach the passenger's destination.

(April 22, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Daviess County dismissing the petition in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful ejection from a train. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Little & Slack, for appellant:

It was the duty of the carrier's agents at the depot, on request, to instruct and advise passengers holding tickets as to time of departure of trains, and as to what train they might or should take.

1 Supp. Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 887, note 4.

The agent of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, having induced plaintiff to get on one of its trains, from which she was ejected because her ticket was for another route, was guilty of actionable negligence.

Note. — Carriers: duty to traveler on wrong train through his own mistake.

This question is discussed in the note to Robertson v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588, in which it is declared to be the law that a person who by his own mistake gets on a passenger train other than the one on which he intended to ride is nevertheless a passenger. This proposition finds support in the cases reviewed in that note, and also in St. Louis & S. W. R. Co. v. Pruitt (Tex. Civ. App.) 79 S. W. 598 (writ of error denied in 97 Tex. 487, 80 S. W. 72), in which it was held to be the general rule that where a passenger by mistake boards the wrong train, it is the duty of the carrier to return him to the place where the mistake occurred, or, at least, leave him at some point where he would not be subjected to any serious annoyance, and return him to the place where veyance near, and especially when she was ill.

Plaintiff was guilty of no negligence in relying on information furnished by defendants' agents.

Duling v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 66 Md. 120, 6 Atl. 592.

Plaintiff had the right to rely on information received from the agent of defendants in answer to inquiries concerning matters material for her to know.

Messrs. Blewett Lee and Trabue, Doolan, & Cox, with Mr. J. D. Atchison, for appellee Illinois Central Railroad Company:

Lassing, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Mrs. Josie McKinley, sued the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Illinois Central Railroad Company for damages alleged to have been sustained because she was wrongfully ejected from one of the trains of the Illinois he took the wrong train by the first returning train.

But in Finnegan v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 48 Minn. 378, 15 L.R.A. 399, 51 N. W. 122, it was held that a person who, after discovering that he was on the wrong train, voluntarily left the same in the dark between stations, ceased to be a passenger, and could not recover for injuries sustained by his falling into a cattle guard on the track.

In Page v. New York C. R. Co. 6 Duer, 523 (affirmed without discussing this question in 24 N. Y. 599), it was held that if a passenger, by reason of his own want of reasonable care and caution to obtain all the requisite information as to the route to be traveled, fails to change cars at a particular station and to take cars going to the place to which he has paid his fare, and continues in the cars in which he started and is carried to another station, the result is to be attributed to his own negligence, and not to a breach of duty or contract on the part of the carrier.

J. A. C.

Central Railroad Company under the following circumstances: On November 19, 1907, she purchased a ticket at Owensboro, Kentucky, entitling her to passage to Maxwell, Tennessee, by Nashville. This ticket was purchased at the union station in Owensboro of an agent who was the joint employee of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and the Louisville, Henderson, & St. Louis Railroad Company. Both the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Illinois Central Railroad Company were operating lines from Henderson to Nashville, and the distance from Henderson to Nashville was practically the same over the respective lines. Plaintiff did not indicate at the time she purchased the ticket which line she desired to travel over, and the agent in charge of the station at Owensboro, who sold her the ticket, routed her over the Louisville & Nashville from Henderson. She accepted this ticket, paid for it, and shortly thereafter took passage on one of the Louisville, Henderson, & St. Louis trains for Henderson. She reached Henderson about midnight. Shortly thereafter she entered the ticket office at the union station at Henderson and told the agent in charge—who was likewise the employee of the three roads above designated—that she had a ticket from Owensboro to Nashville, and asked him how long it would be before a train would leave for Nashville. The agent informed her that there were two trains going to Nashville that night, one a Louisville & Nashville train and the other an Illinois Central train, and that either would carry her to Nashville. She remained in the depot until about 3 o'clock, at which time she boarded an Illinois Central train. As she was in the act of doing so, the brakeman asked her where she was going, and she replied Nashville; whereupon he permitted her to enter the car. After she had traveled something more than a mile on said Illinois Central train, the conductor put her off the train because she refused to pay her fare. The night was dark and it was raining. She was compelled to and did walk back to the union station, a distance of something more than a mile, carrying her baggage and a four-year-old child.

These facts were in substance set out in her petition, wherein she sought to recover damages in the sum of $2,000 from the defendant companies. Each company filed a general demurrer to the petition. That of the defendant the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company was sustained; but as the petition alleged that the plaintiff, when she was ejected from the train, had a ticket entitling her to passage over the Illinois Central Railroad from Henderson to Nashville, the demurrer of the Illinois Central was overruled. It thereupon answered, and, in addition to traversing the material allegations of the petition, set up the fact that the ticket which plaintiff had did not entitle her to passage over the Illinois Central, but over the Louisville & Nashville Railroad from Henderson to Nashville, and a copy of the ticket was set up and described in the pleading. With these facts fully before it, the court permitted the defendant the Illinois Central Railroad Company to renew its demurrer, and it was sustained. Plaintiff declined to plead further, and her petition, first as to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and later as to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, was dismissed. She appeals.

Two questions are raised for determination: First. Does the petition state a cause of action against either or both defendants? Second. Has plaintiff's right of appeal been lost or waived because she failed to object to the motion to dismiss her petition after the demurrer had been sustained, and failed to except to the ruling of the court when the judgment had been entered?

Appellant's ticket called for passage over the Louisville & Nashville Railroad from Henderson to Nashville, and, of course, did not entitle her to passage over the lines of the Illinois Central. As she had no ticket entitling her to passage, and refused to pay her fare, she cannot complain of the action of that company in refusing to transport her to her destination. This court has frequently upheld the right of carriers to eject passengers where they failed to produce a ticket or pay their fare. As said in the case of Flood v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2135, 80 S. W. 184: "One who enters a passenger train and refuses to pay fare becomes a trespasser, and may be ejected by the conductor." Of course, if, in putting the passenger off of the train, the conductor uses any unnecessary force, or offers to the passenger any insult or indignity (Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Fowler, 123 Ky. 450, 96 S. W. 568, or ejects him from the train at a time and place when serious injury would likely result to him (Brown v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 103 Ky. 211, 44 S. W. 648), the company would be liable,—not for putting him off, but for the manner in which it was done. In ejecting appellant the conductor used no force whatever; nor was he rude or insulting in his manner; nor were the circumstances and surroundings such that, in ejecting her where he did, it was likely she would receive serious injury. She wanted to go to Nashville, and it was perhaps really better for her that the conductor ejected her when he did rather than take her to the next station, where it is most likely that, on account of the lateness of the hour, she would have had no accommodations or place of shelter, and would have been compelled to wait until the next day to get a train back; whereas, by walking the mile or so back to the depot, while no doubt fatiguing, and on account of the rain disagreeable, she was able to take the train on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad for Nashville that night. She made no request that she be not put off between stations, or that she be carried to the next station. Her demand was that she be returned to the Henderson depot. With this request, of course, the conductor could not comply, and appellee was under no duty to do so. Under all the circumstances, it was perhaps more convenient to appellant to be put off where she was than at any other place along appellant's line of road, unless she had been carried to her destination.

No ground of complaint being afforded her by being ejected from the train when, where, and as she was, if appellees or either of them were negligent, it was the failure of their agents at Owensboro and Henderson to properly instruct appellant as to how she should proceed; and it is upon this point that her counsel in the main relies. It is argued that the agent at Owensboro was negligent in not telling appellant when he sold her the ticket over which road it routed her and how she must go. Undoubtedly, if she had asked such question, it would have been his duty to have advised her, but his duty did not require him to volunteer information unsought. Appellant asked for a ticket to a certain point in Tennessee by way of Nashville. The agent had the right to presume that she not only knew where she wanted to go, but the way to reach that point. He sold her a ticket entitling her to passage from Owensboro to Maxwell, Tennessee, over the lines of the Louisville & Nashville. The ticket, in plain and unmistakable terms, showed that she was routed over the Louisville & Nashville. He had a right to presume that she could read, and if she could, and exercised any degree of care whatever, she could have easily informed herself as to the road over which she would travel. Possessed of this information, all that remained for her to learn of the agent was the time of the departure of the train from Owensboro. This she evidently learned, for it is recited in her petition that shortly after the purchase of the ticket she boarded a train for Henderson, which place she reached shortly after midnight, without accident. Clearly the agent at Owensboro who sold her the ticket cannot be charged with being negligent in any respect whatever. Upon arriving at Henderson, she notified the agent that she had a ticket from Owensboro to Maxwell, Tennessee, by way of Nashville, and made inquiry when the train left for Nashville. She was told by the agent that there were two trains, an Illinois Central train and a Louisville & Nashville train, and that either would take her to Nashville. The time of the departure of each was given her. This was all the information she really needed if she had read her ticket, as the ticket in her possession called for passage over the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. When the agent had informed her of the time of the departure of this train, she had received all of the information necessary to enable her to continue her journey. If she could not read so as to inform herself as to which train she must take, upon being informed that there were two trains running from Henderson to Nashville, she should have called upon the agent for information, and told him that she could not read, and did not know over which road her ticket routed her, or else should have exhibited her ticket to him and asked him to direct her what train to take. This slight care on her part would have avoided all opportunity for trouble, but, as she did neither, and the agent answered correctly and accurately the question asked of him, we fail to see wherein he was recreant in the discharge of any duty owing to her. The station agent's duty is primarily to look after the business of his employer, and to give to prospective passengers and others having business with the road such advice and information relating to their business as is sought. We are furnished with no authority which places upon the company through its station or ticket agents a duty higher than that defined in 1 Supp. Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 887, note 4, which requires that, on request by a passenger or prospective passenger, it is the duty of the agent to advise him of the time of the departure of trains and as to what train he should take. This duty is entirely rested upon and arises only when the information is sought by the passenger. It need not be volunteered, and, when it is not sought or requested by the passenger, the presumption is that the passenger is already informed, and is not in need of the advice or information. No such request was made here. Appellant asked only as to the time of the departure of the train for Nashville. Of this she was informed fully. She did not advise the agent as to what road she desired to travel. She did not exhibit her ticket to him and seek his advice. He had no means of knowing over what road she was routed, and hence he gave her all of the information that it was possible for him to give under the circumstances, to wit, he told her when the train on each road left, and this information, with that which she could have received by reading her ticket, was ample to have guided her aright. In failing to give appellant information which was not sought and which he could not know was needed, the agent at the station at Henderson violated no duty owing by defendants or either of them to appellant, and her failure to take the right train and the consequent inconvenience suffered was the result of her own negligence, for which appellees are in no wise responsible.

The trial court did not err in holding that the plaintiff stated no cause of action. It is unnecessary to pass upon the other question raised.

Judgment affirmed.

Note. — Right of action for damages for inducing breach of contract.

This subject is covered in a note to Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Gardiner Dairy Co. 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 746. As to the right to an injunction to restrain a third person from inducing a breach of contract or aiding therein, see note to Beekman v. Marsters, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 201. As to civil liability for enticing servant to quit, see note to Thacker Coal & Coke Co. v. Burke, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1091. As to civil liability for procuring discharge of employee or preventing employment, in absence of conspiracy or concerted action, see note to Huskie v. Griffin, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 966.

It is intended to include herein only cases decided subsequently to the note in 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 746, above referred to.

The doctrine which, as shown in the foregoing notes, is supported by the weight of authority, to the effect that a third person is liable for intentionally and maliciously inducing a breach of contract, and may be restrained therefrom, or from aiding in such breach, is supported by the cases which have considered the question subsequently thereto.

Thus, in Wheeler-Stenzel Co. v. American Window Glass Co. 202 Mass. 471, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 89 N. E. 28, an action for tort for damages against a third person for maliciously inducing a breach of a contract, the court said that it was well settled that it is actionable maliciously to induce another to break his contract, and added the gist of the action is maliciously or without justifiable cause inducing another to break his contract.

In South Wales Miners' Federation v.

to nonsuit. The plaintiff contends that he contracted with the defendant Noble to purchase all the pine and juniper timber on certain lands belonging to the Cox heirs, said Noble being their attorney in fact, with power to sell the land; that the defendants West and Johnson conspired together, and induced Noble to violate his contract with plaintiff by purchasing the lands from Noble for a corporation, the West Lumber Company, in which West and Johnson are interested; wherefore, for such alleged tort, the plaintiff claims substantial damage. The principle of law upon which plaintiff founds his right of action is thus stated in Comyn's Digest, Action on Case, A: "In all cases where a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of another, he may have an action upon the case to be repaired in damages." The intentional causing such loss to Glamorgan Coal Co. [1905] A. C. 239, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 436, it is asserted by Lord Macnaghten that malice, in the sense of spite or ill-will, is not the gist of an action by an employer against third persons for maliciously inducing employees to breach their contract of employment. The doctrine of that case, however, is in line with the foregoing Massachusetts case, the only difference being as to the sense in which the word "malice" is used. In the Massachusetts case intentionally inducing the breach of a contract for the purpose of injuring another, rather than primarily to benefit the person inducing the breach, was regarded as malicious, while in the English case similar conduct was regarded as wrongful. In this case the defense was made that persons inducing the breach were not actuated by any ill-will toward the employer. This fact was, however, held to be no defense to an intentional interference with contractual relations, without a sufficient justification for such interference.

In Globe & F. Ins. Co. v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. (Miss.) — L.R.A.(N.S.) — 52 So. 454, the court held upon demurrer that a declaration stated a cause of action by alleging that defendants conspired unlawfully and maliciously to interfere with complainant's employee by intimidating and coercing him to leave his employment for the sole purpose of harming the employer. In reaching this conclusion the court distinguished between such a state of facts, and interference with such a contract relation for the primary purpose of benefiting the persons so interfering. Upon this point it was said: "Under the facts alleged in the declaration, it may have been perfectly permissible for the defendants to have employed the agent of plaintiff and to pay him better for his services. They might employ him, or any number of plaintiff's agents similarly in the employ of plaintiff, without violating any principle of lawful right, if the object of the employment was in the honest furtherance of their own business enterprises. But the facts stated in the declaration show a determination to destroy and drive plaintiff out of business, and the declaration alleges a conspiracy for this purpose. Surely no individual or corporation may maliciously and wantonly set about to ruin a competitor. As an incident to the advance of one's own business, and for the purpose, he has the right to use all proper methods, and his competitors must be able to cope with his ingenuities."

all interference by third persons with contracts of others, which result in their breach, is an actionable wrong. Such interference may be justified on the ground of business competition, or that the primary purpose was to benefit the person interfering, and that injury caused thereby was the result of the exercise by him of an absolute right.

Thus, purchasing certain timber with knowledge that the seller had contracted with another to saw it, and refusing to allow the completion of such contract, will not render the purchaser liable in tort, although the contract for sawing was thereby breached; and this is true even though the motive of the purchaser was malicious. Biggers v. Matthews, 147 N. C. 299, 61 S. E. 55.

It is not an actionable wrong to make a second contract with a promisor, although he is known to have had a prior contract on the same subject with another, and the result of the second contract is a breach of the prior one. Sweeney v. Smith, 167 Fed. 385, affirmed in 96 C. C. A. 91, 171 Fed. 645.

And see also Dunshee v. Standard Oil Co. (Iowa) — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 126 N. W. 342, wherein a person was held liable for maliciously inducing others to cancel orders given by hanging out a sign, the purpose being not to benefit the one inducing the cancelation of the orders, but to injure the person to whom the orders were given. On this point the court remarked that "any legal act done to accomplish real benefit to the actor is not actionable, no matter what the motive. But the trend of recent authority is to the effect that if one [quoting from the note to State ex rel. Durner v. Huegin, 62 L.R.A. 727], with the 'sole and malicious purpose of injuring another, and without any benefit, interest, or pleasure . . . to himself or others, commit an act which, if done in good faith, would be justifiable, he is liable in an action in favor of such other person for the damages he may have sustained therefrom.'"

This doctrine was also recognized and asserted in National Phonograph Co. v. Edison-Bell Consol. Phonograph Co. 96 L. T. N. S. 218, which held that a defendant engaged in retailing phonographs and phonographic goods was not guilty of an actionable wrong in inducing another to breach an agreement not to resell goods purchased thereunder to the defendant at particular discount prices. In reaching this conclusion the court asserted that every another, without justifiable cause and with the malicious purpose to inflict it, is of itself a wrong. This principle has been applied in some jurisdictions to the violation of contracts for personal service, and was so applied in this state in Haskins v. Royster, 70 N. C. 601, 16 Am. Rep. 780, although by a divided court. It has been applied to the malicious enticing away of workmen; to the loss of a contract of marriage by means of a false and malicious letter; to maliciously enticing and inducing a wife to remain away from her husband; and to maliciously inducing an opera singer to abandon her contract; but we find no case in any court where it has ever been applied to breaches of contracts to convey title to property. It is true that in Jones v. Stanly, 76 N. C. 356, it was applied where the president of a railroad company maliciously pre-procuring of a breach of contract did not give a right of action. The case reviews the prior English decisions on the subject, and it is pointed out that they involve interferences by third persons with contracts for personal services of a particular character, and the language of Rigby L. J. in Exchange Teleg. Co. v. Gregory [1896] 1 Q. B. 147, to the effect that it is not every procuring of a breach of contract that will give a right of action is quoted with approval. As an illustration of a contract a breach of which a third person would not be guilty of an actionable wrong in procuring, it is said: "Sometimes it happens that a lady having contracted to marry A is induced to change her mind and marry B, it must be presumed upon a pressing invitation by him to do so. If B was aware of the lady's previous engagement to A, can A, instead of bringing an action for breach of promise against the lady, recover damages in an action of tort against her husband, B, upon the ground that he has interfered with a contractual relation between the lady and A, and induced her to break her contract? Could A, if he commenced his action soon enough, obtain an injunction against B to restrain him from procuring the lady to marry him? If the contention of the counsel of the plaintiffs before me be correct, these questions would have to be answered in the affirmative. Again, suppose A is employed by B, with a stipulation that after the termination of the engagement he shall not enter into any similar employment in the same neighborhood: then suppose A, being no longer employed by B, enters the service of C, carrying on a similar business in the same town, can B sue C for damages, and obtain an injunction to prevent his employing A, when he is no longer in the service of B? We have heard lately that publishers, when they issue a book at a net price, stipulate that the booksellers they supply shall not resell within six months at less than such net price. Does anyone who, within six months of the publication of such a book at a net price, asks, or if you like induces, the bookseller to let him have a copy for less than the net price, render himself liable to an action at the suit of the publisher? I do not think that any contract by A with B merely not to do a particular act or particular acts—for instance, not to purchase goods from or sell goods to C—constitutes a contractual relation, though it may be a valid contract between A and B."

Ark. 130, 110 S. W. 225, wherein a stepson and the wife of a person who, in disposing of a business, contracted not to re-engage in such business, were held guilty of an actionable wrong in knowingly aiding and assisting in the breach of this contract by engaging in that business with the covenantor, and also permitting him to engage in the business in their name.

And see also Fleckenstein Bros. Co. v. Fleckenstein, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 913, wherein the court restrained third parties from, in the same manner, aiding and assisting a covenantor to breach a similar covenant.

A distinction has sometimes been made between the liability of a person for maliciously procuring the breach of a contract, and for maliciously procuring the termination of a contract terminable at will or procuring a breach of a contract not legally enforceable, and in the latter classes of cases it has been held that it does not amount to an actionable wrong to induce the termination of a contract terminable at will or the breach of a contract not legally enforceable.

Thus, in McGuire v. Gerstley, 26 App. D. C. 193, affirmed in 204 U. S. 489, 51 L. ed. 581, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 332, it was held that a third person was not liable for maliciously inducing another to terminate a contract of partnership which was terminable at will.

And in Roberts v. Clark (Tex. Civ. App.) 103 S. W. 417, the court refused to apply the doctrine of liability for maliciously inducing a breach of contract to an optional contract for the purchase of real estate, and the real-estate broker interested in carrying out such contract was denied the right to recover from a third person for inducing its breach by purchasing the property himself, and thereafter selling same to the original purchaser. The fact that there was a combination between such third person and the parties to the original agreement thereby to defeat the right of the real-estate broker to his commissions was said not to confer upon him the right to maintain such an action.

And in Davidson v. Oakes (Tex. Civ. App.) 128 S. W. 944, the doctrine of liability for inducing a breach of contract was held to have no application to the breach of a contract unenforceable at law; and procuring the breach of such a contract, even if actuated by a malicious motive, was held not to render a third person liable to the injured party.

vented his company from performing a contract of carriage of freight, and in that case Judge Rodman says: "The same reasons cover every case where one person maliciously persuades another to break any contract with a third person." This is but a dictum, and in commenting on it the supreme court of Kentucky, in a well-considered opinion in Chambers v. Baldwin, 91 Ky. 121, 11 L.R.A. 547, 34 Am. St. Rep. 165, 15 S. W. 57, says: "We have seen no other case where the doctrine is stated so broadly." This Kentucky authority, with the voluminous notes of the annotator and the numerous cases cited, supports fully the text of Judge Cooley that "an action cannot in general be maintained for inducing a third person to break his contract with the plaintiff; the consequence, after all, being only a broken contract, for which the party to the contract may have his remedy by suing upon it." Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 497. To this rule there are but two generally recognized exceptions,—one where servants and apprentices are induced from malicious motives to leave their master before the term of service expires, and the other arises where a person has been procured against his will, or contrary to his purpose, by coercion or deception of another, to break his contract. Green v. Button, 2 Crompt. M. & R. 707; Ashley v. Dixon, 48 N. Y. 430, 8 Am. Rep. 559. This is based upon the idea that a person has no right to be protected against competition, but he has a right to be free from malicious and wanton interference in his private affairs. If disturbance or loss comes as the result of competition, or the exercise of like rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria. Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 564. It is only where the contract would have been fulfilled but for the false and fraudulent representations of a third person that an action will lie against such third person. Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. 385, 20 Am. Dec. 621, citing Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51, 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 235.

The case of Ashley v. Dixon, supra, is in every respect similar to the one under consideration. In that case the New York court holds: "If A has agreed to sell property to B, C may, at any time before the title has passed, induce A to sell it to him instead; and if not guilty of fraud or misrepresentation, he does not incur any liability; and this is so although C may have contracted to purchase the property of B. B cannot maintain an action upon the latter contract, as he cannot perform, and can only look to A for a breach of the former." This doctrine is supported by abundant authority. Cooley, Torts, supra; Otis v. Raymond, 3 Conn. 413; Young v. Covell, 8 Johns. 25, 5 Am. Dec. 316; Johnson v. Hitchcock, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

15 Johns. 185; Gallagher v. Brunel, 6 Cow. 347; Hutchins v. Hutchins, 7 Hill, 104. Tested by these generally accepted principles, the plaintiff has entirely failed, for he does not allege, and there is not a shred of evidence to prove, that Noble was ready and willing to perform his alleged contract with plaintiff, but that he was prevented against his will from so doing by the false and fraudulent representations of West and Johnson, or either of them. In fact it is hard to discover in the record any evidence that, at the time West is alleged to have purchased the timber, the plaintiff had any subsisting contract with Noble. The latter had given plaintiff an option, but it had expired. Then Noble placed the deed with his attorney, Wooten, to be delivered in case plaintiff paid the purchase money in three days as agreed, which the plaintiff failed to do. Tested by the dictum of Judge Rodman in Jones v. Stanly, supra, the plaintiff also fails, for under that authority, if followed, plaintiff must both allege and prove malice upon the part of West and Johnson, and he fails as to both. The evidence does not disclose any illegal act committed by either West or Johnson, much less an evil one. The latter agreed to buy the timber from plaintiff, who then held an option on it, provided his attorney, Judge Shepard, pronounced the title good. He examined it and pronounced it bad, and Johnson declined to purchase. After plaintiff had failed to take up the deed from Wooten, and pay the price agreed upon between him and Noble, West purchased the timber from Noble, and deposited the money to await the perfecting of the title. It is very hard to discover in the evidence any moral, much less legal, wrong done the plaintiff by these defendants, or either of them. He lost the purchase of the timber, not by any fraudulent practices of West or Johnson, whereby Noble was prevented from selling to the plaintiff, but because he failed to pay Wooten the money for Noble and take the deed at the time agreed upon.

The judgment is affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

THOMAS W. MILLER, Appt.,
v.

S. D. FERGUSON et al.

(— Va. —, 65 S. E. 562.)

Partnership — purchase of judgment — set-off.

One member of a partnership organized for a limited purpose may purchase with his own funds a judgment against his co-partner having no connection whatever with the partnership transaction, prior to the institution of any proceedings affecting the partnership affairs or the existence of any funds out of which the latter is entitled to claim profits, and use the same as a set-off in settlement of its accounts.

(September 9, 1909.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wythe County distributing the proceeds of a sale of certain partnership property contrary to his contention in a suit to establish a special partnership. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Scott & Buchanan, for appellant:

Defendants are not entitled to use the judgment as a set-off in settlement of the partnership accounts.

Bibb v. American Coal & I. Co. 109 Va. 261, 64 S. E. 32; Alexander v. Morris, 3 Call (Va.) 89.

Messrs. Robertson & Wingfield and Robertson, Hall, Woods & Jackson, for appellees:

Defendants had as much right to buy the judgment against Miller as anyone else, and in doing so they were dealing at arm's length and violated no rule of law.

Parsons, Partn. p. 204; 1st Minor, Real Prop. § 501; McKenzie v. Dickinson, 43 Cal. 119.

Interests adverse to a copartner may be lawfully acquired by a partner when these are outside the partnership affairs, for in such transaction they are in no sense confidential agents or trustees of one another.

30 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 454; McKenzie v. Dickinson, supra; Wheeler v. Sage, 1 Wall. 518, 17 L. ed. 646; Latta v. Kilbourn, 150 U. S. 524, 37 L. ed. 1169, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 201.

Whittle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before us for the second time. The original suit was brought by the appellant, Thomas W. Miller, against the appellees, Ferguson and Terry, to enforce an alleged parol agreement between the parties for the purchase of the Miller Hill property, in the city of Roanoke, upon the stipulations that Miller and Ferguson were to advance the purchase money, and the property, when acquired, should be divided into lots and sold; and, after defraying expenses and refunding the purchase price with interest, the net profit arising from the sale was to be shared equally by the parties.

The circuit court dismissed the bill, but on appeal this court reversed the decree, and, having established the partnership as outlined above, remanded the case with directions that, unless the parties in interest could reach an agreement among themselves, the circuit court should sell the property upon such terms as it might prescribe, and dispose of the proceeds of sale in accordance with the views expressed in the written opinion of this court. Miller v. Ferguson, 107 Va. 249, 122 Am. St. Rep. 840, 57 S. E. 649, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 138.

The parties failing to agree, the land was sold, and it is admitted that the net proceeds of the sale amount approximately to $18,000.

We shall dispose of the contention of the appellant that he is entitled to the entire fund under the former decision of this court, by the statement that the circuit court has correctly interpreted the opinion and decree of this court in holding that Miller "was a partner in the land transaction in the bill and proceedings mentioned, and, as such, was entitled to one third of the proceeds of the sale of the land, after defraying the expenses of obtaining the same and refunding the purchase price thereof with interest."

The sole question which claims our attention on this appeal arises upon the petition of Ferguson and Terry, in which they seek to offset the costs awarded Miller in this court with a judgment recovered by the Fidelity Loan & Trust Company against him,

Note. — Right of one partner to acquire individual claim against the other.

The decision reached in the above case finds support in McKenzie v. Dickinson, 43 Cal. 119, in which it was held that there was no principle of equity which forbade one partner from purchasing with his own funds a judgment or other evidence of indebtedness against his copartner in business, or forbidding him from enforcing its collection by a levy upon or sale of the interest of the other in the firm assets. The court declared that the obligations of copartners inter sese, whatever might be their nature and extent, referred only to the conduct of the business in which the firm was engaged, and, where the partnership was not engaged in purchasing judgments or other securities, whatever transaction either partner might effect in that respect by the use of his own private means would be for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the firm.

In Wheeler v. Sage, 1 Wall. 518, 17 L. ed. 646, and in Latta v. Kilbourn, 150 U. S. 524, 37 L. ed. 1169, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 201, cited with McKenzie v. Dickinson, supra, in MILLER v. FERGUSON, as supporting the rule there laid down, the decision was merely that a partner might traffic outside the scope of the partnership business for his own benefit and advantage.

and to subject his interest in the fund under the control of the court to its satisfaction.

That judgment was assigned by the Fidelity Loan & Trust Company to Ferguson and Terry on July 10, 1905, a short time before the institution of the suit by Miller against them to establish the partnership. Miller, in his answer to the petition, denies that the judgment is a subsisting lien, and attempts to show that prior to the assignment the judgment had been satisfied by certain transactions between himself and the secretary and treasurer of the Fidelity Loan Trust Company.

It would serve no good purpose to trace the history of the negotiations by which Miller sought to have the judgment declared satisfied. It is sufficient to say that his efforts in that regard proved unavailing, and that the evidence shows that the judgment, subject to credits with respect to which the circuit court has directed an inquiry, constitutes a valid lien upon his property.

But it is insisted that, even though the judgment be still unsatisfied, the confidential relations arising out of the contract of partnership forbade that Ferguson and Terry should acquire a judgment against their copartner, to be used as a set-off upon the settlement of the partnership accounts.

It is true that a relation of trust and confidence exists between partners in respect to their dealings with matters pertaining to the partnership; and it is upon that principle that where one partner buys property belonging to the firm, or where he buys a claim against the firm, he acquires it for the benefit of the partnership, and can assert it against the firm only for the amount which it actually costs him.

The doctrine is thus stated in 1 Minor on Real Property, § 501: "It is a general principle of equity no less than of conscience that a trustee should not employ the property he holds in trust for his own private gain, but all profits accruing from such employment must be held to redound to the advantage of cestui que trust. Hence, if the trustee compounds a debt due from the trust fund, or buys it for less than its nominal amount, the benefit accrues, not to himself personally, but to the fund."

Still the purchase by one partner with his own means of an individual judgment against another partner at a time when no funds had arisen out of which the latter was entitled to claim profits, is outside of the scope of the partnership business; and whatever view may be taken of such transactions from the standpoint of propriety, we know of no rule of law which forbids it.

The case of Alexander v. Morris, 3 Call (Va.) 89, is relied on by the appellant to 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sustain the contrary doctrine. The points decided in that case are correctly set forth in the syllabus as follows: "A factor indebted to his principal at the time cannot sell the property of the principal to pay indorsements in the course of his factorage. Nor can a factor buy up the debts of his principal at an under rate, and claim credit for the nominal amount; but in such a case he will only be allowed what he actually paid, although the purchase was made after the factorage had ceased and the principal had brought suit for an account."

In Alexander v. Morris, the factor had been guilty of a breach of trust in withholding his employer's funds for ten years, and at the close of a protracted litigation with the principal, after his liability had been fixed, a court of equity refused to permit him to "trump up claims" against his principal by purchasing outstanding bills at a heavy discount, and to use them as set-offs at their face value.

As remarked, the purchase by Ferguson and Terry of the judgment in question was made with their individual means and before suit brought or profits accrued, and had no connection whatever with the partnership, which was of an extremely limited character, involving the single transaction of buying the Miller Hill property for the purpose of subdividing it into lots and selling them at a profit.

In 30 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 459, after treating of prohibited transactions between partners, it is said: "Interests adverse to a copartner may, however, be lawfully acquired by a partner, when these are outside of the partnership affairs, for in such transactions they are in no sense confidential agents or trustees for each other."

This principle is well sustained by authority. Story, Agency, § 125; McKenzie v. Dickinson, 43 Cal. 119; Wheeler v. Sage, 1 Wall. 518, 17 L. ed. 646; Latta v. Kilbourn, 150 U. S. 524, 37 L. ed. 1169, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 201.

For these reasons we are of opinion that there is no error in the decree complained of, and it must be affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

GUARDIAN TRUST COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

KANSAS CITY SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

(96 C. C. A. 285, 171 Fed. 43.)

Injunction — suit in other court — facts — conclusion.

1. In a suit in the United States circuit court, founded on a creditors' bill against the belt company, a debtor, the trust company, a secured creditor, and others, the southern company, a purchaser at foreclosure sales, intervened. The purpose of the suit was to apply the property which the trust company had received from the belt company and from others to the payment of the claims of the creditors of the latter company. The issue of the state of the accounts between the trust company and the belt company had arisen, and they had stipulated that there should be an accounting between them in the creditors' suit, and that judgment for the amount due should be rendered against the party found to be the debtor. The belt company had alleged that certain of its promissory notes held by the trust company were void, and prayed that they be canceled. The southern company had intervened, and claimed the property which the trust company had received from the belt company and from the other corporations. Thereupon the trust company brought three actions at law in a state court against the southern company, on the grounds that the belt company was indebted to it upon the promissory notes and upon an open account, and that the gulf company was also indebted to it, and that the southern company had assumed and agreed to pay to it all these debts. Upon these facts the southern company, upon a dependent bill in the equity suit, secured an injunction against the prosecution of the actions at law in the state court. Held:

Headnotes by SANBORN, Circuit Judge.

(1) The prosecutions of the actions at law would not prevent the effectual decision of the issues and the administration of the rights and remedies involved in the equity suit.

(2) It would not withdraw or interfere with the legal custody of any specific property which the national court had acquired, or prevent in any degree its subsequent disposition of that property.

(3) The trust company had the legal right to prosecute its actions at law in the state court, and the issue of the injunction was an error.

Same — personal action for same cause.

2. The pendency in another jurisdiction of an action in personam for the same cause, which involves no claim to or lien upon any specific property in the possession or under the dominion of a national court of equity, and no issue of which it has acquired exclusive jurisdiction, presents no ground for a dependent bill or an injunction to stay the action at law.

Same — when issued.

3. A court may, by means of a dependent bill and by the use of injunctions and writs of assistance, prevent the prosecution in other courts by the parties to a suit before it of all subsequent actions at law or suits in equity, (1) which will prevent its effectual determination of the issues, and its administration of the rights and remedies of which it has acquired exclusive jurisdiction in the litigation before it, or (2) which will withdraw or interfere with the dominion it has acquired over specific property to such an extent that its determination of the controversy about it, and the enforcement of its ultimate decree concerning it, may be in any degree prevented.

Action — splitting cause — injunction — laches.

4. Where a complainant presents a part of the existing and known facts which it claims entitle it to an injunction, and fails to secure it, and subsequently presents by another bill the other part of those facts, thereby splitting its cause of action, it exhibits a lack of diligence which is fatal to the second application.

Appeal — disposition of cause.

5. Where, on appeal from an order granting a temporary injunction, or appointing a receiver, it clearly appears that there is no equity in the bill, the appellate court may consider and determine that question and direct its dismissal in order to save the parties to the suit further expense resulting from the endeavor to secure impossible relief.

(April 2, 1909.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri, enjoining it from prosecuting certain actions at law which it had instituted in the Circuit Court for Jackson County, Missouri. Reversed.

Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

This is an appeal from an order which enjoined the Guardian Trust Company, a corporation, from prosecuting three actions at law against the Kansas City Southern Railway Company, another corporation, which the trust company had commenced on March 15, 1905, March 28, 1905, and July 2, 1906, in the circuit court of the county of Jackson, in the state of Missouri, to recover personal judgments against the southern company for about $545,000. The first and second actions were founded upon the claim of the trust company that the Kansas City Suburban Belt Railroad Company originally owed it about $500,000, and that the southern company had assumed and agreed to pay that debt. The third action was based upon the claim of the trust company that the Kansas City, Pittsburg, & Gulf Railroad Company originally owed it several thousand dollars, and that the southern company had assumed and agreed to pay that debt.

Note. — As to injunction against action or proceeding in foreign court, see note to O'Haire v. Burns, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 267.
28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The southern company had succeeded to the rights and had assumed the liabilities of a committee of reorganization which had purchased at foreclosure sales in March, 1900, and in December, 1901, the property of the gulf company and the property of the belt company, respectively, and it was in those years that the trust company alleged that its causes of action against the southern company accrued. The injunction in this case was issued upon a dependent bill filed on November 16, 1907, by the southern company, the belt company, and its receiver, in a creditors' suit instituted by the Cambria Steel Company, a judgment creditor of the belt company, on September 6, 1900, for the purpose of subjecting the property of the belt company to the payment of the judgment of the Cambria Company, and to the payment of claims of other creditors of the belt company, similarly situated. In that suit the Cambria Company made the belt company and the trust company, but neither the gulf company nor the southern company, parties defendant, alleged that the trust company held the promissory notes of the belt company, and that by the account books of the companies the belt company appeared to be heavily indebted to the former upon the notes and upon open accounts, and that the trust company held a large amount of property which had been delivered to it by the belt company to secure this indebtedness, but that in fact the belt company was not indebted to the trust company, but the latter owed the former, and the Cambria Company prayed for an accounting between the trust company and the belt company, for the payment of any balance owing by the trust company to the belt company, for the application of the property which the trust company had received from the belt company to the payment of the creditors of the latter, for an injunction, and for other relief. Thereupon the court issued a restraining order which forbade the trust company to assign, pledge, or dispose of any of the property mentioned in the bill. The trust company denied by its answer the equities of the bill, and prayed that it be dismissed. On November 20, 1901, the belt company, the trust company, and their receivers, stipulated in the Cambria Company's suit that the accounting between the trust company and the belt company should be expedited, and that a judgment for the amount found due should be rendered against the debtor in that suit. The receivers of the belt company then filed a cross bill in which they alleged that the promissory notes which evidence a part of the indebtedness of the belt company to the trust company, which the latter company avers in its actions at law was assumed by the southern company, were without consideration, and they prayed for an accounting, that these notes be delivered up and canceled, and that they recover of the trust company the amount that it should be found indebted to the belt company. The trust company answered this cross bill that the notes were made for a valuable and full consideration, that the belt company was indebted to it upon the notes and upon other accounts, that the trust company was entitled to all the property it had ever received from the belt company; and it prayed that its title to that property might be protected, and that it might have judgment against the belt company and its receivers for the amount due it.

On February 27, 1905, under a stipulation with the trust company and others, the southern company filed its intervening petition in the Cambria Company's case, and on May 1st its amended intervening petition, wherein it set forth certain property that had been received by the trust company at various times, alleged that by virtue of the foreclosures of the mortgages of the belt company, of the gulf company, and of other corporations, under which it had become the purchaser, it was entitled to some of this property, to the proceeds of another part of it, and to the value of still another part of it; and it prayed for a recovery thereof from the trust company. The trust company by an answer denied all the equities of this intervening petition, alleged that the belt company was indebted to it, that the southern company had assumed and agreed to pay that indebtedness, and prayed that the intervening petition of the southern company be dismissed. Meanwhile the three actions at law had been brought in the state court, and in August, 1905, the southern company filed a bill in equity and obtained a temporary injunction from the court below against the prosecution of the first two actions at law, and in May, 1906, the order granting that injunction was reversed by this court. Guardian Trust Co. v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 76 C. C. A. 615, 146 Fed. 337.

The southern company answered in the actions at law, and in May, 1907, it made a motion to stay the proceedings therein upon the same grounds upon which the bill for this injunction rests. The state court denied the motion in June, 1907, and against the protest of the southern company upon a second motion of the trust company, and after a hearing on September 14, 1907, it set the actions at law for trial on December 2, 1907. On November 16, 1907, the bill for this injunction was filed by the southern company and its assistants, the belt company and its receiver.

The transcript of the record in this case is voluminous,—it comprises 742 printed pages,—but no other facts are disclosed therein which can in any way modify the decision which those that have been recited compel.

Argued before Sanborn and Adams, Circuit Judges, and River, District Judge.

Messrs. John A. Sea and George H. English, Jr., with Mr. Edward P. Gates, for appellant:

The injunction was improvidently issued, because the actions in the state courts sought to be enjoined were mere actions in personam, and the effect of maintaining them would not be to disturb any property which is or could be in the custody of the court in the main case.

Messrs. Samuel W. Moore and F. H. Wood for appellees.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The cause of action in the suit brought by the Cambria Company, so far as the trust company, the belt company, and the southern company and their receivers are concerned, is the misappropriation by the trust company of property which it received from the belt company and other corporations, and the relief sought is the recovery from the trust company of that property, or of its proceeds, or of its value. The causes of action in the three cases in the state court are the debts of the southern company to the trust company, and the only relief sought in those actions consists of personal judgments against the southern company. The suit in equity is not upon the same cause of action as any of the actions at law. The trust company has not in the equity suit prayed or in any way sought to obtain a judgment against the southern company on account of any of the causes of action pleaded in the actions at law in the state court.

Counsel for the southern company say that the indebtedness of the belt company to the trust company, and the cancelation of the notes which evidence a part of that alleged debt which the trust company claims was assumed by the southern company, are at issue and will be ultimately determined upon the accounting in the equity suit, and they argue that if those issues should be determined against the trust company in that suit, there would be no basis for the alleged assumption of a debt of the belt company by the southern company, or for any judgments against it. Be it so, but the suit in equity was brought and is pending in the United States circuit court for the western district of Missouri. The actions at law were subsequently commenced and are pending in another jurisdiction,—in the circuit court of the county of Jackson, of the state of Missouri. Even if the subsequent actions at law were between the same parties and involved the same cause of action, as they do not, these facts would furnish no ground for an injunction against their prosecution. The existence of an earlier suit in equity between the same parties, for the same cause, in one jurisdiction, will not sustain a plea in abatement or an injunction to stay the prosecution of a later action at law in another jurisdiction, where the prosecution of the later action does not prevent the determination of the issues and the administration of the rights and remedies involved in the former suit. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Brune (Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Harris) 96 U. S. 588, 593, 24 L. ed. 737, 740; Franklin v. Conrad-Stanford Co. 70 C. C. A. 171, 175, 178, 137 Fed. 737, 741, 744; Ogden City v. Weaver, 47 C. C. A. 485, 489, 108 Fed. 564, 568.

In the first case there were two claimants of the moneys owing by the insurance company upon two policies of insurance issued to Brune. One of the claimants, Mrs. Barry, brought a suit in equity in the supreme court for the city and county of New York, against the insurance company, Brune, and his assignee, Whitridge, in which she pleaded her claim to the money, and prayed that the company might be enjoined from paying the amount due upon the policies to Brune or to Whitridge, and that it might be compelled to pay it to her. The in-insurance company, Brune, and Whitridge answered the bill, and the parties made an agreement in the suit that the insurance company should pay the money into court, where the ownership of it should be adjudicated. Thereafter, and before the adjudication, Whitridge sued the insurance company at law upon the policies for the amount due in the United States circuit court for the district of Maryland. Thereupon the insurance company exhibited its bill in equity in that court, wherein it set forth the prior suit in New York, and prayed for an injunction against the prosecution of the subsequent action at law, but the court refused to issue the injunction and dismissed the bill, and the Supreme Court sustained its action. That court said: "Certain it is that the plea of a suit pending in equity in a foreign jurisdiction will not abate a suit at law in a domestic tribunal. This was shown in a very able decision made by the supreme court of Connecticut, in Hatch v. Spofford, 22 Conn. 485, 58 Am. Dec. 433, where the authorities are learnedly and logically reviewed. See also Colt v. Partridge, 7 Met. 570, and Blanchard v. Stone, 16 Vt. 234. If, then, a bill in equity pending in a foreign jurisdiction has no effect upon an action at law for the same cause in a domestic forum, even when pleaded in abatement; if, still more, it has no effect when pleaded to another bill in equity, as the authorities show, it is impossible to see how it can be a basis for an injunction against prosecuting a suit at law. It follows that the refusal of an injunction by the circuit court was not erroneous."

In the second case a suit in equity had been brought in a state court of Montana to foreclose a mortgage, and to procure a judgment against the maker of the mortgage note for the deficiency after the sale. The sale had been made and reported, and there was a docket entry that $8,805.60 remained unpaid upon the mortgage note, but no decree or judgment had been entered for this amount against the maker of the note, who was a party defendant in the foreclosure suit. The successor in interest of the complainant in that suit then brought an action at law upon the note against its maker in the United States circuit court for the district of Utah for the $8,805.60, and recovered. Judge Marshall said: "Lastly, it is contended that the foreclosure suit is still pending in the state court of Montana for the purpose of obtaining a deficiency judgment, and that such pending suit is ground for abating this action. This is an action at law in personam. It in no way involves any interference with the conduct of the suit in the state court of Montana, nor does it affect any property within the jurisdiction of that court. Under these circumstances it is settled by the highest authority that the pendency of an action in a state court is no ground for abating an action subsequently brought in a Federal court upon the same cause of action. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Brune (Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Harris) 96 U. S. 588, 24 L. ed. 737; Stanton v. Embrey, 93 U. S. 548, 23 L. ed. 983; Ogden City v. Weaver, 47 C. C. A. 485, 108 Fed. 564, 567."

His decision applies to the case at bar, and it was affirmed by this court.

In Ogden City v. Weaver, 47 C. C. A. 485, 489, 108 Fed. 564, 568, the city had brought a suit in equity in the district court for the third judicial district of the state of Utah against the Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company, called the irrigation company, and against the Bear Lake & River Waterworks & Irrigation Company, called the waterworks company, and it had obtained an interlocutory decree that a certain contract between the city and Bothwell, under which the companies had been furnishing water to the city, was invalid, and that an accounting should be had between the companies and the city regarding their prior business transactions. In that condition of the equity suit, the receivers of the Irrigation Company, who had succeeded to the interests of that company, and were bound by all that had been done in the suit in the state court, commenced an action at law against the city upon the Bothwell contract for water furnished to the city thereunder by the Irrigation Company. Counsel for the city contended that the action at law must be stayed on account of the pendency of the suit in equity, but Judge Thayer, delivering the opinion of this court said: "This contention, however, is based upon a misconception of the character of the present proceeding, which is an action at law, in personam, to recover a sum of money due under a contract. It is not a case which affects the custody of any property over which the state court has first acquired jurisdiction. Neither is it a case which involves any interference with the orderly conduct of the litigation in the state court. It is simply one of those cases, such as frequently occur, where a state court and a Federal court, in the exercise of a jurisdiction which rightfully belongs to each, are called upon to determine the same question; and the fact that they may disagree and decide the question differently in no wise interferes with the right of either to proceed. It is well settled that the fact that a suit upon a cause of action is pending in a state court will not sustain a plea of lis pendens to a suit upon the same cause of action, subsequently filed in a Federal court."

It is equally true that the fact that a suit upon a cause of action is pending in a Federal court will not sustain a plea of lis pendens to a suit upon the same cause of action subsequently filed in a state court.

These decisions of the Supreme Court and of this court answer many arguments of counsel in support of this injunction. They establish the propositions that the averments in the equity suit of no indebtedness of the Belt Company, and of the invalidity of the notes, together with the prayers for the accounting and for the cancelation of these notes, did not withdraw from the jurisdiction of the state court or prevent the trial in that court of the issue of debt or no debt in the subsequent actions at law therein, for that question was adjudged in the Cases of Brune and of Ogden City; that the fact that the remedy at law is not as complete, prompt and adequate as the remedy in equity, by an accounting or otherwise, is no ground for an injunction against the prosecution of the actions at law in another jurisdiction, for that question was adjudged in the Ogden City Case, and if that fact would sustain such an action, then no action at law for the same cause as a prior suit in equity could be maintained, for the remedy by the latter is always more complete, adequate, and effective than the remedy at law; that the stipulation between the belt company and the trust company, that an accounting between them should be had, and a judgment against the debtor should be rendered in the suit in equity, furnishes no reason for enjoining the prosecution of the subsequent actions at law, for that question was adjudicated in the Case of Brune, where there was a similar agreement between the parties to the action at law. By so much the more is the stipulation in this case ineffectual, because the southern company was not a party to it, nor to the Cambria Company's Case at the time the stipulation was made.

Counsel contend that the restraining order of September 6, 1900, forbade the actions at law. But the limit of the restraint upon the trust company by that order was "from in any manner, directly or indirectly, selling, transferring, assigning, pledging, or otherwise disposing or parting with the possession or control of, any of the property, assets, notes, stocks, bonds, claims, and demands mentioned and referred to in the bill of complaint;" and it in no manner prohibited the trust company from collecting, by suit or otherwise, any of the notes, accounts, or claims there mentioned. It did not require the trust company to permit the statute of limitations to run upon its causes of action against the southern company or others.

Counsel invoke the conceded rules that a court may, by means of a dependent bill and by the use of injunctions or writs of assistance, prevent the prosecution by the parties to a suit before it of subsequent actions at law or suits in equity, (1) which will prevent its effectual determination of the issues and its administration of the rights and remedies of which it has acquired exclusive jurisdiction in the litigation before it (Sharon v. Terry [C. C.] 1 L.R.A. 572, 13 Sawy. 387, 36 Fed. 337; Starr v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. [C. C.] 110 Fed. 3; French v. Hay [French v. Stewart] 22 Wall. 250, 22 L. ed. 857; Harkrader v. Wadley, 172 U. S. 148, 43 L. ed. 399, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 119; Dietzsch v. Huidekoper [Kern v. Huidekoper] 103 U. S. 494, 26 L. ed. 497), or (2) which will withdraw or interfere with the legal custody of specific property which it has acquired, so that its determination of the controversy about it and the enforcement of its decree concerning that property may be in any degree prevented (Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Lake Street Elev. R. Co. 177 U. S. 51, 61, 44 L. ed. 667, 671, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. 612, 12 L. ed. 841; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. 450, 16 L. ed. 749; Moran v. Sturges, 154 U. S. 256, 38 L. ed. 981, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1019; Central Nat. Bank v. Stevens, 169 U. S. 432, 42 L. ed. 807, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403; Williams v. Neely, 69 L.R.A. 232, 67 C. C. A. 171, 185, 134 Fed. 1, 15; Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Morris, 67 L.R.A. 761, 66 C. C. A. 55, 58, 132 Fed. 945, 948; Lang v. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. 87 C. C. A. 307, 160 Fed. 355, 360; Sullivan v. Algrem, 87 C. C. A. 318, 160 Fed. 366, 370; Gates v. Bucki, 4 C. C. A. 116, 124, 12 U. S. App. 69, 53 Fed. 961, 969).

But the prosecutions of the actions at law in question in this case cannot in any way prevent the effective determination of the issues or the administration of the rights and remedies involved in the suit in equity in the national court, nor can it interfere with the legal custody of the specific property of which that court has jurisdiction. The liability of the southern company to pay the debts which the trust company alleges in the actions at law it has promised to pay is not in issue, and cannot be determined in the suit in equity, and the state court has no jurisdiction over and cannot interfere in those actions in personam with the specific property which is the subject of the litigation in the Federal court. This case falls far within the unquestioned rule that the pendency in a state or other court of an action in personam which involves no claim to or lien upon specific property in the possession or under the dominion of a national court of equity, and no issue of which that court has acquired exclusive jurisdiction, presents no ground for a dependent bill to stay it. Stanton v. Embrey, 93 U. S. 548, 554, 23 L. ed. 983, 984; Standley v. Roberts, 8 C. C. A. 305, 314, 19 U. S. App. 407, 59 Fed. 836, 844; Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Morris, supra; Merritt v. American Steel-Barge Co. 24 C. C. A. 530, 535, 49 U. S. App. 85, 79 Fed. 228, 233; Green v. Underwood, 30 C. C. A. 162, 164, 57 U. S. App. 535, 86 Fed. 427, 429; Hughes v. Green, 28 C. C. A. 537, 539, 84 Fed. 833, 835; Hubinger v. Central Trust Co. 36 C. C. A. 494, 496, 94 Fed. 788, 790; Ogden City v. Weaver, 47 C. C. Kansas City Southern R. Co.* 76 C. C. A. 615, 618, 146 Fed. 337, 340.

There is another objection to this injunction. The issue of it was not a matter of right. It rested in the discretion of the court, not in its arbitrary whimsical will, but in its sound judicial discretion, informed and directed by the principles, rules, and practice of equity jurisprudence. The good faith and the reasonable diligence of the moving party and his probable irreparable injury if the injunction was not issued were indispensable conditions to the decision that it should issue. The actions at law which were enjoined were commenced in the state court in March, 1905, and in July 1906. In the month of August, 1905, the southern company filed its first bill to enjoin the prosecution of the first two actions, and obtained an order for a temporary injunction, which was reversed by this court in May, 1906. At the time it filed this first bill all the facts which it now claims entitle it to this second injunction existed and must have been known to it, but it failed to plead them. In May, 1907, the southern company made a motion in the state court to stay the progress of the actions at law upon the same grounds which it presented to the court below in the present bill, and the state court denied its motion. In September, 1907, that court set the actions at law pending in it for trial upon the motion of the trust company on December 2, 1907. On November 16, 1907, the present bill was filed, and for the first time the southern company prayed the court below to stay these actions for the reasons now urged, which had existed during all the time after March, 1905. The failure of that company to present these reasons in its former bill, the splitting of its cause of action for this injunction which that failure wrought, the unnecessary delay and expense thereby imposed upon the litigants in this suit, establish such a deleterious lack of diligence as appeals with compelling force to the discretion of a court of equity to deny such an injunction. And when to this inexcusable and expensive delay is added the fact that the trust company had the undoubted legal right to prosecute these actions at law, so that no legal injury could result to the southern company therefrom, the conclusion is irresistible, not only that the injunction was erroneously issued, but that there was no equity in the supplemental bill upon which it is founded.

Where, on an appeal from an order granting or continuing a temporary injunction, or from an order appointing a receiver, the equity of the bill is challenged, and the attack upon it appears to be well founded, the power is conferred, and the duty is imposed, upon the appellate court to consider it, and if it is of the opinion that the relief sought by the bill cannot be granted, to so decide, and thus to save the parties to the suit further expense resulting from the endeavor to secure impossible relief. Smith v. Vulcan Iron Works, 165 U. S. 518, 524, 41 L. ed. 810, 812, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407; Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co. v. Columbian Equipment Co. 168 U. S. 627, 630, 42 L. ed. 605, 606, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240; Cabaniss v. Reco Min. Co. 54 C. C. A. 190, 192, 116 Fed. 318, 320; Chicago Wooden Ware Co. v. Miller Ladder Co. 66 C. C. A. 517, 521, 133 Fed. 541, 545; Arkansas Southeastern R. Co. v. Union Sawmill Co. 83 C. C. A. 224, 231, 154 Fed. 304, 311; Mann v. Gaddie, 88 C. C. A. 1, 158 Fed. 42, 48; Shubert v. Woodward, 92 C. C. A. 509, 167 Fed. 47.

The order for the issue of the injunction must be reversed, and the case must be remanded to the court below, with directions to dismiss the supplemental bill for want of equity; and it is so ordered.

And it is further ordered that the mandate in this case issue ten (10) days after the filing of this opinion.

It is to be observed by way of precaution, however, that this note does not purport to cover the general question as to when limitation commences to run against actions of this kind, and the above cases are cited simply for their bearing on the general question whether demand is a condition of the action. Whether, even upon the assumption that demand is a condition of the right to bring the action, limitation will commence to run after the lapse of reason-

v. Turner, 36 Ark. 580; Berthold v. Reyburn, 37 Mo. 587; Levan v. Sternfeld, 55 N. J. L. 41, 25 Atl. 854; Freeman v. Fleming, 5 Iowa, 460; Smith v. Anders, 21 Ala. 783; The Good Hope, 40 Fed. 608; Chapman v. Burt, 77 Ill. 337.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this action alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of certain bonds issued by the Gunnell Gold Mining & Milling Company, that upon the 1st day of January, 1900, there were interest coupons due thereon amounting to $1,295; that the International Trust Company of Denver was in possession of the bonds and coupons for plaintiff, and delivered them to the defendant for collection; and that upon the 8th of January, 1900, the defendant collected for the use and benefit of the plaintiff the sum of $1,295 on account of these coupons. The seventh paragraph of the complaint is as follows: "That said defendant, having received said sum of $1,295, for the use and benefit of this plaintiff, and for and on her account, then and there promised and agreed to pay the same to her upon demand; yet the plaintiff says that, though frequently so demanded, the said defendant has heretofore failed, neglected, and refused, and still fails, neglects, and wholly refuses, to pay the said sum of money or any part or portion thereof to this plaintiff." The defendant filed an answer, in which he admitted all of the allegations of the complaint except able time in which to make the demand, and before actual demand is made, is not within the scope of this note.

In Burton v. Collin, 3 Mo. 315, it was said: "It is well settled that an agent who receives money or property for his principal, or a factor who sells goods or property, or receives goods or property which remain unsold, is not liable to an action until the money, goods, or property has been demanded, or an account of sales, where the goods or property has been sold."

In Ferris v. Paris, 10 Johns. 285, it was held that a factor or consignee apprising his principal of the sale of goods consigned to him may wait to receive directions as to the mode of remitting the proceeds, and he is not liable to an action until a default on his part.

In Cooley v. Betts, supra, where an action was brought for the recovery of the proceeds for goods sold, the court took occasion to say: "I am not disposed to deny that there may be a sound distinction between an action for not accounting, and an action for not paying over the proceeds of the goods. It is the duty of an agent to render an account of his transactions to his principal within a reasonable time; and when it appears that he has neglected to do so, an action for not accounting may, perhaps, be maintained without a demand. But here there was no evidence to show that the defendants had not rendered an account. And besides, the action is for not paying over the proceeds of the goods,—the special counts being laid out of the case,—and in such an action it is necessary to show a demand or instructions to remit."

In Roberts v. Armstrong, supra, it was said that an attorney's liability rests upon the principle of his agency for his client; and it would seem to be in opposition to the very nature of the trust imposed by his agency to hold him liable to an action for money collected by him until after a refusal on his part to pay it over.

It must be said, however, that a diversity of opinion does exist on this question, for a number of cases, in accordance with YOUNG v. KIMBER, have held that it is not necessary before institution of a suit to recover money collected by an agent. This seems to have been recognized in Shepherd v. Crawford, 71 Ga. 458 (money collected by attorney); Looney v. Looney, 116 Mass. 283 (money collected on insurance policy); Merchants' Bank v. Rawls, 21 Ga. 289 (money collected by bank president).

In Tinkham v. Heyworth, 31 Ill. 519, there is an obiter statement to the effect that an attorney who collects money for his client must pay it over immediately, without demand.

So, in Coffin v. Coffin, 7 Me. 298, where the question was as to when limitations commenced to run against an action to recover from an attorney money collected, the court, after calling attention to the fact that the statement in regard to demand, made in Staples v. Staples, supra, was merely obiter, continued: "Any impressions received as to the necessity of a demand upon an attorney for money collected by him, before he can be considered as liable to an action, will be removed by the present opinion. Indeed, we are satisfied, on further examination of the subject, that we are not authorized to distinguish an attorney from other agents, and that the language used by the court, even if applied exclusively to that case, could not be sanctioned as correct."

And see Hawley v. Sage, 15 Conn. 52, infra, also set out in the YOUNG CASE.

In New York, although the earlier cases uniformly held that demand was necessary to recover money collected by an agent, the courts soon showed a tendency to depart from that rule; but in doing so, some of them, at least, attempted to distinguish the earlier cases, while others, although, as far as the facts are concerned, not necessarily opposed to those cases, at least used language broad enough to deny the rule altogether.

In Lillie v. Hoyt, 5 Hill, 395, 40 Am. Dec. 360, the court, after reviewing the earlier New York cases, and saying that the utmost that those cases established is that a foreign factor and an attorney at law, are not liable until request, held that, so far as a mere collecting agent is concerned, it this seventh paragraph, which was denied. In a separate defense he pleads certain matters which are not material to this controversy, as we shall presently see, and this is also true of plaintiff's replication. When the matter came on for trial in the district court, the plaintiff read the pleadings to the jury, and stated that she was willing to rest her case upon the admissions contained in defendant's answer. Defendant likewise stated that he was willing to rest. The plaintiff then called defendant to the witness stand, and, after having asked him some preliminary questions, defendant's counsel objected to the testimony being taken, for the reason that both sides had rested, and any testimony which plaintiff would be entitled to introduce would be in rebuttal of that which defendant had introduced. Defendant not having introduced any testimony, there was nothing to rebut. Plaintiff admitted the correctness of this contention and withdrew the witness. Plaintiff then moved that the jury be instructed to return a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant moved for a nonsuit. The court instructed the jury to return a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $1,695.08, upon which verdict judgment was rendered. All that portion of the verdict in excess of $1,295 was for interest.

The important question presented in this record is as to whether or not it is necessary to make a demand upon a party who has received money for the use of another before an action may be maintained to recover the is his duty to pay over within a reasonable time; and if he does not do so, the principal may maintain an action for money collected, without any previous demand.

In Mills v. Mills, 115 N. Y. 80, 21 N. E. 714, the question arising as to whether the statute of limitations had run, it was held that demand on the part of the plaintiff was not necessary to recover the surplus remaining in a brother's hands after he had fully reimbursed himself out of the proceeds of the sale of lands which had been absolutely deeded to him to cover debts owing him by the former. The court in this case said: "When money is received by one to and for the use of another, under such circumstances that it is his duty at once to pay it over, then an action for money had and received may be brought to recover it, without any demand."

To the same effect are Wood v. Young, 141 N. Y. 211, 36 N. E. 193 (collecting of insurance money by brother), and Hickok v. Hickok, 13 Barb. 632 (collecting money on note by person not an attorney or foreign factor).

In the last two cases the question of demand arose also in connection with the statute of limitations.

In Re Cole, 34 Hun, 320, also concerning the running of the statute of limitations, it was held that demand is not necessary on the part of a wife to recover from her husband's estate money which had been paid to him "for the use and benefit of his wife." The court said: "The test of the necessity for a demand is whether it was then and there the legal duty of the husband to pay this money to his wife. It was her money, and not his. He received it for her use and benefit, and not for his own. He kept the money that was her due. If he could lawfully withhold it from her, it must be by virtue of some understanding or contract with her, and none is shown. Such contract or understanding exists in the case of a deposit of money with a bank, or a special deposit, to be gratuitously kept and returned in specie."

action was brought to hold the sureties of an auctioneer liable on his bond, it was held that it was not necessary to prove demand of the auctioneer for the money collected by him upon the sale of goods.

And see the cases cited in the YOUNG CASE.

Exceptions to general rule.

Although, as was above stated, the general rule is that demand is necessary before institution of a suit to recover money collected by an agent, from the very nature of the question there must exist many circumstances which will dispense with the necessity of demand.

Thus, in Krause v. Dorrance, 10 Pa. 462, 51 Am. Dec. 496, supra, the court took occasion to say that circumstances may exist which will dispense with the necessity of demand. As, when the attorney has been guilty of fraud or malpractice, or of culpable negligence in not giving notice of the receipt of the money in a reasonable time; or when he puts in a sham plea for delay; or when he exhibits a manifest desire to baffle the plaintiff, and withhold from him his just demand.

In Clark v. Moody, 17 Mass. 145, the law in regard to whether demand is necessary to recover from a factor the money collected as the proceeds of sales was laid down as follows: "Generally the consignor of goods accompanies his consignment with directions how to apply the proceeds; either to pay them over to a third person, or to remit in bills, or in merchandise, or in specie, or to hold them to answer his future orders; and in these cases there can be no difficulty. For the factor cannot be liable until he has actually or impliedly broken his orders. I say impliedly, for if the factor should become bankrupt or insolvent, with the goods of the principal, or their proceeds, in his hands, so that he is disabled from remitting them or otherwise appropriating them according to the instructions of the principal, there seems to be no reason why an action would not immediately lie against him, by analogy to the common-law principle, that same. There is apparently a great diversity of opinion on this question among the courts of last resort. This diversity is more apparent than real, however; each case seemingly having been determined upon its own peculiar facts. Upon receiving the money, it was defendant's plain duty to have remitted it to the plaintiff. There was an implied contract upon the part of the defendant that upon the receipt of the money he would deliver it to plaintiff, and a party is usually bound to perform his contracts without being first requested so to do, unless there be an express stipulation to the contrary. We are inclined to believe that no demand was necessary before the institution of the suit. That belief is supported by the following authorities: In Howard v. France, when a duty is to arise upon a demand, and the party liable has disabled himself from performing, the necessity of a demand ceases. And if this were not so, creditors here, who could not for a long time cause a demand to be made, would have no opportunity of securing themselves out of the effects of the factor in this country; while creditors of a different description, but not more meritorious, would meet with no impediment in securing their debts. The practice here has conformed to this principle; for many instances are known to have occurred, of actions brought and sustained against factors in foreign countries, although no demand had been previously made upon them to render an account. And it is probably upon this ground, if at all, that a principal may prove his claim against his factor, under a commission of bankruptcy in England, although no demand had been made upon him; so that the debt was contingent, according to the general liability of factors. . . . It is also the duty of factors to account to their principals in a reasonable time, without any demand, in cases where a demand would be impracticable or highly inconvenient; so that a factor abroad, who should receive goods to sell, without special directions as to the mode of remittance, would be held, according to the course of business, to give his principal information of his progress in the transaction; and if he should neglect unreasonably to forward his account to his employer, this negligence would be a breach of his contract, and subject him to an action. So, if he should render an untrue account, even without any intention of fraud, claiming greater credit than he was entitled to, so that the balance shown was not true, we conceive the principal would have a right of action, without a demand. For he would not be obliged to submit to such charges as the factor should choose to make, or to wait, perhaps at the risk of his debt, until his agent should voluntarily correct his account, and acknowledge a just balance. But if the factor should receive and sell the goods, without any special orders as to remittance, upon 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

43 N. Y. 593, it was said by Mr. Judge Allen: "It is the duty of one who has received money to the use of another to pay it over; and no demand is necessary by the latter before action." "No demand is necessary before bringing an action for money received to plaintiff's use, where it was the duty of the defendant to have remitted it." Stacy v. Graham, 14 N. Y. 492. A, B, C, and D were proprietors of a fishery, and B, who was called agent, treasurer, and clerk, received the money for the sale of the fish, made the disbursements, and kept the accounts. The accounts were settled and a balance struck in favor of the proprietors, but B omitted to pay to D the balance that belonged to him. Held, that D might maintain an action in assumpsit against B, to an understanding, express or implied, that he is to hold the proceeds to the order of his principal, and he does nothing in violation of those orders, or to disable himself from complying with them when they shall be received, and transmits a true account of sales, in a reasonable time, according to the course of business, and is ready to remit or answer drafts upon him, we think that no action will lie against him for the balance in his hands. For his contract is to sell and render an account, and he ought not to be held to remit at his own risk; and he cannot remit at the risk of his principal, unless in compliance with instructions."

It has accordingly been held that when an agent wrongfully converts the money collected to his own use, an action will lie for the recovery of the money without any demand therefor before suit brought. Terrell v. Butterfield, 92 Ind. 1.

So, in Moore v. Garner, 101 N. C. 374, 7 S. E. 732, demand was held not necessary to recover money collected by an agent, where he did not apply the money to the payment of certain judgments, as he was instructed to do.

In Dever v. Branch, 18 Tex. 615, it was held no demand was necessary to recover from an agent the money collected on a sale of cattle, where, contrary to the principal's instructions, the cattle had been driven to a certain city, and, in selling them, had been united with a drove belonging to a third person.

In Brazier v. Fortune, 10 Ala. 516, it was held that one whose agency consists of placing a claim in the hands of an attorney for collection, but who in fact collects the money himself, is not entitled to insist on demand previous to a suit against him for the money.

But the mere fact that the agent takes notes payable to himself, in discharge of the sum due to his principal, is not, by itself, such evidence of a conversion as will dispense with proof of a demand. Kidd v. King, 5 Ala. 84.

There are cases closely related to the above, but which, for the reason that they recover the balance, without first making a special demand of payment. Robinson v. Williams, 8 Met. 454. S. H., the holder of a promissory note made by W. for $500, indorsed it to J. H., who, at the same time, gave the following receipt: "When S. H. shall pay me his note of $100, given by him this day to me, then I will deliver up to him a note of $500, which he has indorsed over to me." W. paid his note to J. H., and subsequently both S. H. and J. H. died. It was held that, upon the payment of W.'s note, the law, without any act upon the part of J. H., applied so much of the account as was necessary in payment of the note of S. H.; that the residue might be recovered by the administrator of S. H. as money had and received to his use; that such action might cannot be said to be actions for money collected, have not been included within this note.

Such a case is Etter v. Bailey, 8 Pa. 442, where it was held that the unauthorized sale of stoves which came into the agent's hands was a conversion which rendered him liable in trover without a demand.

So, when an agent, instead of selling shares on commission, as he was authorized to do, exchanged them for other property, he was guilty of conversion, and excused the principal from proof of demand before bringing suit. Haas v. Damon, 9 Iowa, 589.

A similar case is Ainsworth v. Partillo, 13 Ala. 460, where it was held that the act of an agent instructed to sell a house, in exchanging it for another, is a conversion, and he becomes liable to the owner for the value of the house, without a demand.

If the agent denies his liability to the principal, and thus shows that a demand would be fruitless, the principal is relieved from the duty of making it. Hammett v. Brown, 60 Ala. 498; Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 104, 33 Pac. 836 (denial by attorney that he collected money as agent); Bogle v. Gordon, 39 Kan. 31, 17 Pac. 857 (denial by partner, after dissolution of partnership and money collected, that other party had right in any part of it, and concealing from him that money was collected); Howard v. France, 43 N. Y. 593; Walradt v. Maynard, 3 Barb. 584 (denial by attorney of liability to pay, and setting up claim exceeding amount collected); Waddell v. Swann, 91 N. C. 108; King v. Foscue, 91 N. C. 116; Wiley v. Logan, 95 N. C. 358; Tillotson v. McCrillis, 11 Vt. 477.

In Taylor v. Armstead, 3 Call (Va.) 200, relative to a demand and refusal necessary to maintain a suit for the recovery of money received by an attorney, the court said that defendant, by appearing and contesting the claim, rendered it unnecessary that further proof with regard thereto should be stated in the record.

In Judith Inland Transp. Co. v. Williams, 36 Mont. 25, 91 Pac. 1061, it was held that no formal demand was necessary where the agent claimed that he had fully paid the be maintained without a special demand. Hunt v. Nevers, 15 Pick. 500, 26 Am. Dec. 616. In that case the court also said: "Upon the subject of interest, we can perceive nothing to take this case out of the ordinary rule that where money is payable on demand, and there is no contract or usage requiring it, and the defendant is not a wrongdoer in acquiring or detaining it, interest is to be computed from the service of the writ only." In Hawley v. Sage, 15 Conn. 52, it appears that Hawley, the plaintiff, had in his hands a draft of the bank of Charleston, South Carolina, on the Union Bank of New York, in his favor, for $1,000, two thirds of which was his and the other belonged to the defendant. Defendant took this draft to collect, and, when collected, principal all money collected, and, instead of being indebted to the principal, the principal was indebted to him.

A case holding to the same effect is Bogle v. Gordon, 39 Kan. 31, 17 Pac. 857, where the agent concealed the fact of collection, and claimed the money as his own.

In Love v. Hoss, 62 Ind. 255, it was held that a real estate broker who agrees with the owner of land to sell such land for a certain price, but who, in making the sale, sells for a larger price, which he conceals from his principal, is liable to the principal for the excess recovered by him, without previous demand.

To the same effect is Heimbach v. Weinberg, 18 Mich. 48 (concealment by agent from principal that he had collected more than a certain amount covered by a note); Wooster v. Nevills, 73 Cal. 58, 14 Pac. 390 (dividends collected on stock fraudulently retained by agent for their sale).

And where so long a time has elapsed since the collection of the money by an agent as will rebut the presumption that payment has been delayed by reason of the want of safe and convenient means of transmission, or because of some other good and sufficient cause, and that the collector still considers himself as entitled to no more than enough reasonably to compensate him for his services, and will pay it over on demand, then neither law nor reason requires that before the agent can be sued for his nonfeasance, he should be requested to do what his conduct sufficiently indicates his determination not to do. Bedell v. Janney, 9 Ill. 193.

To the same effect are Chapman v. Burt, 77 Ill. 337 (money collected by attorney); Dodge v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 368; Eaton v. Welton, 32 N. H. 352 (failure of factors in distant part of country to account for proceeds within a reasonable time).

In Langley v. Sturtevant, 7 Pick. 214, it was also held that if a foreign factor neglects for an unreasonable time to render an account, a demand on the part of the principal to pay over the proceeds is not necessary.

So, in Drexel v. Raimond, 23 Pa. 21, it was to divide the avails, as above stated; and, though he did collect it, and did not deny that a reasonable time in which to pay the plaintiff his share had elapsed, yet he claimed that he was not bound to pay without a special request. The court said: "As a general rule, a party is bound to perform his contract without being first requested so to do; and, unless there be an express stipulation in the contract that a request or demand of performance shall be made, or it be requisite from the peculiar nature of the bargain, none is essential to complete the cause of action. And where there is a precedent debt or duty, no request is in general necessary." "Ordinarily a demand is necessary before bringing a suit against an attorney for money collected by him; but, where it has been collected a long time, and its retention is unexplained, or where the party collecting it has converted it to his own use, no previous demand is necessary." Chapman v. Burt, 77 Ill. 337.

was held that an agent who fails to give due notice to his principal that money collected is subject to the latter's disposal cannot protect himself against an action by alleging that no demand was made for the money before the suit was brought.

See, in connection with these cases, Lillie v. Hoyt, 5 Hill. 395, 40 Am. Dec. 360.

In Nisbet v. Lawson, 1 Ga. 275, it was said: "When an attorney receives the money of his client, it is his duty to remit it to him forthwith, or give him notice of its collection. But if he neglects to give this information, and has converted the money to his own use, or otherwise applied it illegally, I should be inclined to hold that he would subject himself to suit, without demand previously made. In Taylor v. Bates, 5 Cow. 376, infra, and other reported cases to be found in the books, it has been decided that an attorney was not liable for money collected, till demand made, or directions to remit. But in all such cases it will be found that no laches are shown on the part of the attorney; that he has manifested a willingness to pay, by giving notice to his principal of the receipt of the money, and only waited for orders to pay over or account."

Also there is no necessity of demand when the agent agrees in advance that, upon collection of the money, he will pay it over to the principal or his representative. Mardis v. Shackelford, 4 Ala. 493; Kane v. Cook, 8 Cal. 449 (money received in sale of goods by factor, who, at the time of shipment, received instruction to remit proceeds to the principal); Stacy v. Graham, 14 N. Y. 492 (agent agreeing to remit after retaining part in payment of his own debt); Haebler v. Luttgen, 2 App. Div. 390, 37 N. Y. Supp. 794, affirmed without opinion in 158 N. Y. 693, 53 N. E. 1125 (unconditional promise 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Field v. Brown, 146 Ind. 293, 45 N. E. 464, it was said: "In assumpsit for money had and received, where the complaint alleges the receipt of money by defendant for the use and benefit of plaintiff, it need not allege a demand,"—citing cases decided in Indiana and Wisconsin, Bates v. Cobb, 5 Bosw. 29, Adams v. Holley, 12 How. Pr. 326, and other New York cases. "In an action for money had and received to the use of the plaintiff, it is not necessary to allege a request or demand for the payment of the money. Such an allegation is usual, but not essential to the sufficiency of the complaint." Quimby v. Lyon, 33 Cal. 394. In this case the case of Reina v. Cross, 6 Cal. 30, is distinguished; and the assertion therein made, that a party receiving money to the use of another is rightfully in possession until the same is demanded, is pronounced dicta.

The next question presented is as to whether or not the court erred in instructing the jury to find a verdict for the inof factor in foreign state to turn over all remittances as soon as received).

To the same effect is Castleman v. Southern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 14 Bush, 197, where the agent agreed to remit on or before the last day of each month the balance due, by draft or otherwise, as directed. The court said this implied an absolute undertaking to remit at that time by draft unless otherwise directed.

In Hawley v. Sage, 15 Conn. 52, where plaintiff put a draft into the hands of defendant, to receive the money thereon, and to "divide the avails" in a certain proposition, it was held that demand was not necessary on the part of the plaintiff to recover from the defendant his share of the money collected. The court, however, took occasion to say: "But again; as soon as the defendant had collected the draft, he had in his hands nearly $700 of the plaintiff's money, which he had received to the plaintiff's use. It was then a debt due the plaintiff; and it was the defendant's duty to pay it. No special request was, therefore, necessary. But if there was anything to take the case out of the general rule, it was for the defendant to show it. When money is received by one man, which belongs to another, the law raises a promise on the part of the receiver that he will pay it, and that, to, without any previous requests. If, therefore, from the situation of the parties, or the relation in which they stood to each other, this implied promise could have been rebutted, the defendant should have shown it. But, as he has shown nothing but a desire to keep the plaintiff's money, his case must be governed by the general rule applicable to a precedent debt or duty."

In Middleton v. Twombly, 125 N. Y. 520, 26 N. E. 621, where the question arose whether the statute of limitations had run interest as well as the principal. It is the rule that interest can only be recovered in this state in the cases enumerated in the statute. Pettit v. Thalheimer, 3 Colo. App. 355, 33 Pac. 277; Greeley, S. L. & P. R. Co. v. Yount, 7 Colo. App. 189, 42 Pac. 1023. Our statute for the payment of interest is as follows: "Creditors shall be allowed to receive interest when there is no agreement as to the rate thereof, at the rate of 8 per centum per annum, for all moneys after they become due, on any bond, bill, promissory note, or other instrument of writing, or on any judgment recovered before any court or magistrate authorized to enter up the same within this state, from the day of entering up said judgment until satisfaction thereof be made; also, on money due on mutual settlement of accounts, from the date of such settlement; on money due on account, from the date when the same became due; and on money received to the use of another, and detained without the owner's knowledge." Mills's Anno. Stat. § 2252. The only clause in the foregoing section which allows interest for money had and received is one that provides for interest where the money is detained without the owner's knowledge. There is no allegation in the complaint that such was the fact in this case. The argument of counsel seems to be that interest should be allowed because the money was vexatiously withheld. At one time the law in this state authorized the allowance of interest in such cases, but that statute was repealed by the one now before us. We think the court erred in allowing interest, and the judgment will be reversed for that reason, and remanded, with instructions to render another judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $1,295.

Reversed and remanded.

Steele, Ch. J., and Goddard, J., concur.

Petition for rehearing denied January 11, 1909.

against an action by a principal against his foreign factor for money which he, unknown to the principal, had collected on insurance policies, it was said: "It is claimed that the defendants' testator received these dividends as a foreign factor, and could not be made liable for them until after demand. This is, undoubtedly, the general rule; but when, from the usual course of business or special contract and instructions, a different practice has been pursued, it is the duty of the consignee to remit without waiting for demand. . . . In this case, the consignee had remitted the proceeds of the several consignments previously received by him, and it was supposed by the plaintiff that the transaction was closed; but, by an unexpected chance, the consignee recovered back some of the expenses which he had been obliged to pay out for the plaintiff, and these sums having been allowed by the plaintiff, it was the defendants' testator's manifest duty to rectify the mistake, which then appeared to have been made in his account, by remitting, as he had theretofore done, the sums thus received to the plaintiff. We do not think the circumstances of this case required a demand before suit brought, as the cause of action accrued upon the receipt of the money by the consignee, and his failure to remit." Although it will be noticed that the reasoning of the case, so far as the application of the statute of limitations is concerned, leads to a conclusion clearly unjust, the law, so far as the question of demand is concerned, may not be subjected to criticism. And it must be remembered that with the former question this note does not concern itself.

Of course, where an agent has fled the country, no demand is necessary. Wilson 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

v. Monticello, 85 Ind. 10 (agent to sell municipal bonds).

In Metz v. Abney, 64 S. C. 254, 42 S. E. 103, it was held that an agreement whereby attorneys became trustees for the principal relaxed the severity of the rule as to demand before suit.

In Jordan v. Westerman, 62 Mich. 170, 4 Am. St. Rep. 836, 28 N. W. 826, it was held that since an agreement between attorneys and their client, whereby, in a suit for divorce prosecuted by them, they should retain in payment for their services one half of the alimony collected, is null and void, a demand on the part of the client to recover the money so retained is not necessary.

In Trimble v. Pollock, 77 Ind. 576, where it appeared that a person as agent had collected the rent on certain property, the court, after refusing to decide whether demand would have been necessary if suit had been brought against the agent himself, during his lifetime, held that demand was not necessary to recover the rents from his administrator.

(The question, however, as to the necessity of a demand upon the agent's estate in the event of his death, apart from the necessity of a demand upon the agent himself, when living, is not within the scope of this note.)

Of course, when there is a special agreement between the principal and agent that the latter need not pay until request or the money is demanded, the money is not payable until after demand has been actually made. Boughton v. Flint, 74 N. Y. 476 (husband holding proceeds of sale of land for wife).

In Dana v. Barrett, 3 J. J. Marsh. 6, it was held that demand was necessary when an agent received bank notes for a principal who was a nonresident.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

JAMES E. STEWART et al.

v.

BARNET FINKELSTONE, Impleaded, etc.,
Appt.

(206 Mass. 28, 92 N. E. 37.)

Vendor and purchaser — restrictive covenant — right to enforce.

1. A mortgagee of real estate may maintain a suit to enjoin violation of a building restriction which has been imposed upon neighboring property for the benefit of that which is subject to his mortgage.

Parties — joinder — enforcement of restrictive covenant.

2. A mortgagor and mortgagee of property for the benefit of which a building restriction has been imposed upon neighboring property may join in a suit to enjoin violation of the covenant.

Appeal — facts — interference.

3. The law court will not interfere with a finding of fact by a single justice on conflicting testimony, where the inferences from other facts proved in the case are not inconsistent with the finding.

Injunction — violation of covenant — standing by.

4. That no steps were taken to prevent the erection of a building in violation of a restrictive covenant upon the use of the land until it was all up will not defeat an injunction against its maintenance, if the complaining parties did not know of the violation of the covenant until the building was completed.

Same — laches.

5. A delay of ten weeks in bringing suit to enjoin the maintenance of a building erected in violation of a restrictive covenant in the use of the land, after the building was erected, and knowledge was brought home to the complaining party, is not such laches as will bar relief, if no prejudice to the rights of the owner of the building through the delay is shown.

Same — interference with attorneys.

6. One cannot be prejudiced by delay in instituting a suit to protect his rights if it is due to the influence of one having a record interest in the property to be affected by the suit, in preventing the attorneys of complainant from proceeding with the litigation.

Note. — STEWART v. FINKELSTONE appears to have been the first case in which was raised the right of a mortgagee to enforce a building restriction imposed on neighboring property for the benefit of the property mortgaged. The decision, however, is in line with the general policy of the law to allow a mortgagee to maintain a suit to restrain any threatened injury of a permanent character which may endanger his security.

Same — infringement by complainant — effect.

7. The restraint of substantial infraction of wholesome building covenants will not be denied because of possible slight infractions on the part of complainant, with respect to his own property, where his building has stood for more than forty years, and has been considered by all parties as a compliance with the restrictions.

Building covenant — changed conditions — right to ignore.

8. If changes from the building restrictions imposed upon lots in a subdivision, which affect only the buildings at corners of streets, are not of sufficient moment to interfere with the scheme as a whole, the owner of a particular lot cannot ignore the restrictions, under the rule of changed conditions.

Injunction — comparative loss — deliberate act.

9. One who deliberately violates building restrictions placed upon his lot for the benefit of a district in a city cannot avoid a mandatory injunction to compel the modification of his building so as to comply with the restrictions, on the theory that the loss caused by it will be disproportionate to the good accomplished.

(May 18, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant Finkelstone from a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to enforce compliance with certain restrictive building covenants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel C. Bennett, for appellant:

Since a mortgage, as between all except the mortgagor and mortgagee, is only a lien to secure the debt, the taking back of the mortgage upon sale did not give the mortgagee, who had no right to possession, a right to maintain the bill.

Ewer v. Hobbs, 5 Met. 1; Norcross v. Norcross, 105 Mass. 265.

There was laches on the part of the plaintiffs.

Hodgkins v. Farrington, 150 Mass. 24, 5 L.R.A. 209, 15 Am. St. Rep. 168, 22 N. E. 73.

The court will rarely interfere to pull down a building which has been erected without complaint.

Gaskin v. Balls, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 324, 28 Week. Rep. 552; Rochdale Canal Co. v. King, 16 Beav. 634.

The plaintiffs cannot maintain the bill because they themselves are violating at the present time the very restrictions which they say the defendant is violating.

Sheard v. Webb, 2 Week. Rep. 343; Bacon v. Sandberg, 179 Mass. 396, 60 N. E. 936.

A mandatory injunction will not be issued when it appears that it will operate inequitably and oppressively, nor when it appears that there has been unreasonable delay by the party seeking it in the enforcement of his rights, nor when the injury complained of is not serious or substantial, and may be readily compensated in damages, while to restore things as they were before the acts complained of would subject the other party to great inconvenience and loss.

Levi v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. 193 Mass. 116, 78 N. E. 853; Starkie v. Richmond, 155 Mass. 188, 29 N. E. 770; Cobb v. Massachusetts Chemical Co. 179 Mass. 423, 60 N. E. 790; Downey v. Hood, 203 Mass. 4, 89 N. E. 24; Jackson v. Stevenson, 156 Mass. 496, 32 Am. St. Rep. 476, 31 N. E. 691; Ware v. Regent's Canal Co. 3 DeG. & J. 212, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 153, 5 Jur. N. S. 25, 7 Week. Rep. 67.

Where there has been delay in the assertion of a legal right, and the damage sustained is slight, the court will not grant an injunction.

Wintle v. Bristol & S. W. Union R. Co. 6 L. T. N. S. 20, 10 Week. Rep. 210.

It is a sufficient reason for refusing an injunction that the granting of it would inflict serious damage upon the defendant without doing any practical good to the plaintiff.

Wood v. Sutcliffe, 2 Sim. N. S. 169; Ware v. Regent's Canal Co. 3 DeG. & J. 231; Senior v. Pawson, L. R. 3 Eq. 330; Wason v. Sanborn, 45 N. H. 169; Scanlan v. Howe, 24 N. J. Eq. 273.

The inference that owners have waived a strict compliance with the restrictions may be drawn from their failure to object.

Leathe v. Bullard, 8 Gray, 545; Schwoerer v. Boylston Market Asso. 99 Mass. 299.

Messrs. Samuel M. Child and Malachi L. Jennings, for appellees:

The plaintiffs cannot be barred by laches.

Codman v. Bradley, 201 Mass. 361, 87 N. E. 501; Linzee v. Mixer, 101 Mass. 512; Atty. Gen. v. Algonquin Club, 153 Mass. 447, 11 L.R.A. 500, 27 N. E. 2.

The plaintiffs have not waived their right to enforce the restrictions by their failure to prosecute other owners who have violated similar covenants.

Bacon v. Sandberg, 179 Mass. 396, 60 N. E. 936; Payson v. Burnham, 141 Mass. 547, 6 N. E. 708; Codman v. Bradley, supra.

That the use of the buildings on the street has changed in recent years does not affect the plaintiffs' right to have the restrictions enforced.

Evans v. Foss, 194 Mass. 513, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1039, 80 N. E. 587, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 171; Codman v. Bradley, supra. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Rugg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity brought to enforce compliance with certain restrictions as to buildings, imposed in 1859 in deeds of the several lots, comprising a considerable tract in the south end of Boston, as part of a general plan for their common benefit. The restrictions as to the character and extent of building were in perpetuity, and among other matters prohibited the erection of a building nearer than 10 feet to the street line and over the rear of the lot. No question is made that the defendant violated these two restrictions by the construction of a building commenced in March, 1906. There was evidence that the building was practically all up in the May following.

It is first contended that the bill cannot be maintained in this form by the present plaintiffs. The plaintiff Buttrick, in his capacity as trustee, was the owner of an estate within the protected area prior to July 28, 1906, when he conveyed it to the plaintiff Stewart, who was a cestui que trust, taking back a mortgage to himself as trustee. There was evidence to the effect that this transfer of title had been agreed upon a year before, but was delayed on account of the appointment of a guardian ad litem. A mortgagee of real estate, even though out of possession, has such an interest as enables him to maintain an action for any part of the mortgaged estate wrongfully severed and converted into personalty. To this extent he is owner of the fee. Searle v. Sawyer, 127 Mass. 491, 34 Am. Rep. 425. The reason for this is that the value of his security may be damaged. This reason extends to any act, whether done on the mortgaged premises or off, which may adversely affect the property described in his mortgage. He may maintain an action in the nature of waste, or may go into equity to prevent the commission of waste. Restrictions like these create a right in the nature of an easement in favor of, as well as impose a liability upon, the grantee of every lot, growing out of the common character of the deeds. The interest is in a contractual stipulation for the common benefit. Evans v. Foss, 194 Mass. 513, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1039, 80 N. E. 587, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 171. The nature of the right and obligation created by restrictions upon the use of real estate is such as to render their breach an injury to the fee of other land included within the scheme of improvement. A mortgagee is allowed to go into equity to prevent injuries threatened to the land covered by his mortgage, because any act in its nature capable of harming the value of his security may be such an injury as to entitle him to equitable relief and protection. Mortgagees are commonly permitted to bring suits in equity to nullify the orders of public boards or test the constitutionality of statutes which in operation would impair their security. See, for example, Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 382-400, 38 L. ed. 1014-1024, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1047; Reagan v. Mercantile Trust Co. 154 U. S. 418, 38 L. ed. 1030, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 577, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1062, Id. 154 U. S. 413, 38 L. ed. 1028, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 575, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1060. This principle includes the present case. There is no distinction in reason between sustaining a suit by a mortgagee to restrain waste threatened upon the mortgaged premises, and one to prevent acts on other estates in derogation of legal rights established for the benefit of the property covered by the mortgage. See James v. Worcester, 141 Mass. 361, 5 N. E. 826; Everett v. Edwards, 149 Mass. 588, 5 L.R.A. 110, 14 Am. St. Rep. 462, 22 N. E. 52; Rockwood v. Robinson, 159 Mass. 406-408, 34 N. E. 521; Wilkinson v. Dunkley-Williams Co. 139 Mich. 621, 103 N. W. 170. The act of the defendant in violating the restrictions was a continuing wrong, and not one ended with the completion of his building. No controversy arises between the two plaintiffs as mortgagor and mortgagee respectively. They both have an interest in the subject-matter of the restrictions, which, as to the defendant, constitutes a unity, and they may properly join in one suit against him.

The single justice found that the plaintiffs had not been guilty of laches. This finding was based upon the hearing of oral evidence, and will not be disturbed unless plainly wrong. His memorandum states that neither plaintiff was aware of the defendant's intention to violate the restrictions until his building was up. The finding is in accordance with the testimony of the plaintiffs, to which the single justice gave credence. It has been ingeniously argued that the circumstances of ownership of other property in the neighborhood, and visits there, supplemented by the direct testimony of two witnesses to the contrary, shows that this finding is unsupported, at least, as to the plaintiff Buttrick. But the testimony introduced by the defendant was not believed, and the inferences from other facts were not inconsistent with ignorance by the plaintiffs of what the defendant was doing. In all this there was no error. The building was up about the middle of May. The suit was brought in the following March. This deferment of suit is found to have been "largely due to the interference of the mortgagee" of the defendant's lot, who was originally joined as a respondent in this suit, and "who finally dissuaded the counsel selected by them [the plaintiffs] acting for them." There is no hard and fast rule as to what constitutes laches. If there has been unreasonable delay in asserting claims, or if, knowing his rights, a party does not seasonably avail himself of means at hand for their enforcement, but suffers his adversary to incur expense, or enter into obligations, or otherwise change his position, or in any way by inaction lulls suspicion of his demands, to the harm of the other, or if there has been actual or passive acquiescence in the performance of the act complained of, then equity will ordinarily refuse her aid for the establishment of an admitted right, especially if an injunction is asked. It would be contrary to equity and good conscience to enforce such rights when a defendant has been led to suppose by the word or silence, or conduct of the plaintiff that there was no objection to his operations. Diligence is an essential prerequisite to equitable relief of this nature. Quiescence will be a bar when good faith requires vigilance. But so long as there is no knowledge of the wrong committed, and no refusal to embrace opportunity to ascertain facts, there can be no laches. Upon the discovery of infringement of rights, such reasonable expedition is required in their prompt assertion as is consistent with due deliberation as to the proper means for relief. On the other hand, one who openly defies known rights, in the absence of anything to mislead him, or to indicate assent or abandonment of intent to oppose on the part of others, is not in a position to urge as a bar failure to take the most instant conceivable resort to the courts. After the right has been invaded under circumstances which would not defeat a plaintiff in seeking relief, and no substantial harm is shown to have accrued to the wrongdoer from delay, there is not the same imminent necessity for early enforcement of demands as exists before conditions have become fixed. Mere lapse of time, although an important, is not necessarily a decisive, consideration. Within the somewhat flexible limitations of these general rules, what may be laches in any case depends upon its peculiar facts. Linzee v. Mixer, 101 Mass. 512-526; Cooke v. Barrett, 155 Mass. 413, 29 N. E. 625; Nudd v. Powers, 136 Mass. 273; Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 367, 71 Am. Dec. 715; Haven v. Haven, 181 Mass. 573-579, 64 N. E. 410; Tucker v. Fisk, 154 Mass. 574-579, 28 N. E. 1051; Hill v. Boston, 193 Mass. 569-574, 79 N. E. 825; Parker v. American Woolen Co. 195 Mass. 591-603, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 584, 81 N. E. 468; Stewart v. Joyce, 201 Mass. 301, 87 N. E. 613; Daly v. Foss, 199 Mass. 104, 85 N. E. 94. An interval of perhaps ten weeks between the first knowledge by Buttrick and the consultation with an attorney, during which he communicated with Stewart, who was out of the state, when there is nothing to indicate that it operated to the prejudice of the defendant, cannot be accounted laches respecting so important an infraction of rights as the present case reveals. The subsequent delay in instituting the suit is excused because it arose solely from the influence of one having a record interest in the defendant's estate.

The defendant contends that the plaintiffs cannot prevail, because they are themselves violating the same restriction which they seek to enforce against the defendant. The original deed from the city of Boston, through which the defendant gained title, contained the clause that "a dwelling house has been erected and completed on said lot in conformity with the conditions and restrictions." The record shows that the single justice found that the constructions now upon the plaintiffs' lot were those originally placed there, and that they were substantially the same on the two lots. It follows that they were regarded on all sides more than fifty years ago as a substantial compliance with the restrictions. The photographs and chalks of the buildings in the neighborhood furnish some indication of like buildings upon similar lots. Whether these constitute in small particulars technical deviations from a strict compliance with the letter of the restrictions is of no consequence after the lapse of half a century of general concurrence in a practically uniform construction of their meaning by acts done. Frost v. Jacobs, 204 Mass. 1, 90 N. E. 357; Jackson v. Stevenson, 156 Mass. 496, 32 Am. St. Rep. 476, 31 N. E. 691. Moreover, the minor respects in which it is claimed that the plaintiffs have violated the restrictions are of a character wholly different from the infractions committed by the defendant, and therefore are not to be regarded as a barrier to the enforcement of their rights. Bacon v. Sandberg, 179 Mass. 396, 60 N. E. 936.

The single justice, after taking a view of the neighborhood affected by the restrictions, determined that there had been no change whatever in the character of the buildings contemplated by the scheme contained in the restrictions, with the exception of those at the corners of streets, and this was not of sufficient moment to interfere with it as a whole. This finding, supported by oral evidence as well as a view, was clearly warranted. It leaves no room for the application of the rule of changed conditions, laid down in Jackson v. Stevenson, supra. In this respect the case is like

It is strongly urged that a mandatory injunction ought not to issue, for the reason that it would operate oppressively and inequitably, and impose on the defendant a loss disproportionate to the good it can accomplish, and that the plaintiffs ought to be relegated to financial compensation by way of damages. This remedy is a drastic one, and ought to be applied with caution, but in cases proper for its exercise, it ought not to be withheld merely for the reason that it will cause pecuniary loss. It has been found that the defendant, with full knowledge of the restrictions, "deliberately attempted" to override them, and thus deprive the district of the character given it by the restrictions. He took his chances as to the effect of his conduct with eyes open to the results which might ensue. It has been the practice of courts to issue mandatory injunctions upon similar facts. Codman v. Bradley, 201 Mass. 361, 369, 87 N. E. 501, and case cited; Curtis Mfg. Co. v. Spencer Wire Co. 203 Mass. 448, 89 N. E. 534; Downey v. Hood, 203 Mass. 4-12, 89 N. E. 24. Intrenchment behind considerable expenditures of money cannot shield premeditated efforts to evade or circumvent legal obligations from the salutary remedies of equity.

The costs allowed in the decree, including the expense of the surveyor's plans, were within the discretion of the court, which does not appear to have been wrongly exercised, Rev. Laws, chap. 203, § 14; Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Cone Iron Works, 102 Mass. 80-89.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

THOMAS GORMAN.

(79 Kan. 643, 100 Pac. 647.)

Future contract — agreement for — effect.

1. An agreement to make a contract in the future is not binding unless all the terms

Headnotes by BURCH, J.

Note. — Effect of shipping contract limiting carrier's common-law liability, signed under compulsion.

This note does not include cases involving contracts of carriage procured through fraud, nor those turning merely upon the fact that the shipper did not know the proand conditions are agreed upon, and nothing is left to future negotiations.

Carrier — limiting liability — negotiations — jury.

2. Under the facts of this case, it cannot be said as a matter of law that a shipper of cattle bound himself, by preliminary negotiations relating to the shipment, to sign a special written contract limiting the carrier's common-law liability.

Contract — refusal to sign.

3. If preliminary negotiations relating to a shipment of cattle have not resulted in a valid agreement that it shall be made under a special written contract, the shipper may rightfully refuse to sign such a contract, although he knows the custom of the carrier to require written contracts in the course of a long experience as a shipper, has always signed written contracts, and, visions of the contract, where such ignorance was not due to any wrongful act on the part of the carrier.

As to effect of limitation of liability in receipt prepared by shipper, see note to Perrin v. United States Exp. Co. post, 645.

As is said in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Carter, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 677, 29 S. W. 565, the great volume of case law holding that contracts of carriers limiting their liability, in order to be binding upon the shipper, must be just and reasonable, relates in the main to certain provisions or stipulations of such contracts which are considered illegal, although voluntarily entered into, and permits other portions of the contract, that are reasonable and just, to remain intact and binding upon the shipper; but in the foregoing case a different question is presented; viz., whether the contract, as a whole, is invalid, in that the shipper was not given an opportunity of shipping his freight under the conditions which the law insists that the carrier must afford him, but was in some way forced to accept the contract tendered by the carrier.

It is not a question whether the provisions of the contract were such as the law would not enforce because of reasons of public policy or otherwise, but rather, whether the conditions surrounding the execution of the contract were such as the courts would uphold, regardless of the nature of the provisions thereof.

The law charges the common carrier with the duty of carrying all goods of the kind he professes to carry, under the common-law liability which makes him a practical insurer thereof while in his custody; and he is liable to an action in case of a refusal so to accept such goods. Consequently, the proposition that a contract of carriage limiting the carrier's common-law liability will not be enforced if secured under compulsion needs but to be stated; the practical question is rather, what constitutes compulsion under this rule.

One of the most common forms of compulsion is where the carrier does not afford the shipper a fair option or opportunity to following the negotiations, intended to sign a contract of the kind he had been using for the shipment in question.

Same — duress — validity.

4. A special written contract limiting a carrier's common-law liability, which has been extorted from a shipper who rightfully declined to sign it, by means of a refusal to transport cattle already in the carrier's possession, unless such a contract was signed, is voidable at the shipper's election.

Same — ratification.

5. A party may not voluntarily act upon a contract which he has been wrongfully constrained to sign, and voluntarily take the benefit of it, and then avoid it for duress. But conduct exhibited in apparent recognition of the contract, while the pressure of the hardship which overcomes the mind continues, will not amount to an af-choose between a full-liability contract and a limited-liability contract.

It is not essential, in order to validate a contract limiting the carrier's liability, that the option or opportunity to ship the goods under the common-law liability be actually presented to the shipper. Cau v. Texas & P. R. Co. 194 U. S. 427, 48 L. ed. 1053, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663; Pacific Exp. Co. v. Wallace, 60 Ark. 100, 29 S. W. 32; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hollowell, 172 Ind. 466, 88 N. E. 680; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Sowell, 90 Tenn. 24, 15 S. W. 837; Deming v. Merchants' Cotton-press & Storage Co. 90 Tenn. 306, 13 L.R.A. 518, 17 S. W. 89; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Stone, 112 Tenn. 348, 105 Am. St. Rep. 955, 79 S. W. 1031.

It is sufficient that it would have been given if the shipper had demanded it. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hollowell, supra; Duvenick v. Missouri P. R. Co. 57 Mo. App. 550; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Manchester Mills, 88 Tenn. 655, 14 S. W. 315; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Sowell and Deming v. Merchants' Cotton-press & Storage Co. supra.

But a contract limiting the carrier's liability is invalid if its agent has no authority to receive the goods, and would not have received them except under such contract. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cravens, 57 Ark. 112, 18 L.R.A. 527, 38 Am. St. Rep. 230, 20 S. W. 803; St. Louis, I. M. & S. W. Co. v. Spann, 57 Ark. 127, 20 S. W. 914; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hollowell, supra; Ficklin v. Wabash R. Co. 117 Mo. App. 221, 93 S. W. 847; Parker v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 133 N. C. 335, 63 L.R.A. 827, 45 S. E. 658; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 88 Tenn. 430, 7 L.R.A. 162, 12 S. W. 1018; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Craig, 102 Tenn. 298, 52 S. W. 164; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. McIntyre, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 399, 82 S. W. 346.

If the local agent with whom the shipper deals denies him the opportunity to take advantage of a more favorable contract on a higher freight rate, or, what amounts to the same thing, informs him that there are firmance; and, to constitute an affirmance, the conduct of the injured party must be such as to indicate an intention to condone the wrong, and a purpose to abide by its consequences.

Carrier — voidable contract — ratification — jury.

6. Under the facts of this case, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the acceptance and use of a return pass by a shipper of stock, after the stock had been transported and delivered, confirmed a voidable contract with the carrier, under which the shipment was made, and which provided for such pass.

(March 6, 1909.)

ERROR to the District Court for Bourbon County to review a judgment in plain-no other terms or conditions upon which he can have his property transported, then there is in fact no opportunity afforded to contract for shipment on unrestricted terms, and the restriction is void. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Wells, 81 Ark. 409, 99 S. W. 534. To the same effect was the decision in Southern Exp. Co. v. R. H. Meyer Co. (Ark.) 125 S. W. 642.

A carrier cannot, by special contract, limit its common-law liability for losses not occasioned by negligence, where it does not afford the shipper an opportunity to contract for the service required without such restriction, even if he makes the special contract without objection or demand for a different one. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cravens, 57 Ark. 112, 18 L.R.A. 527, 38 Am. St. Rep. 230, 20 S. W. 803.

A contract limiting the liability of a carrier must be fairly made, upon a sufficient consideration, after the shipper has been given an opportunity to choose between his common-law right and rate of transportation and the special-contract rate and limited liability. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Mitchell (Ind.) 91 N. E. 735.

If there be but one contract and one rate open and offered to the shipper, and no option or choice be given him, then a special provision limiting the carrier's liability is without consideration, and void. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 79 Miss. 114, 30 So. 43.

And in Ficklin v. Wabash R. Co. 117 Mo. App. 221, 93 S. W. 847, the court said that the contract in question must be condemned for two reasons: "First, because no rate is provided for shipment under a nonrelease contract, and therefore no option is available to the shipper; and second, the established rate is not, in any sense, a reduced rate, but is the regular and only rate, and consequently there is an entire failure of the expressed consideration."

Various other forms of compulsion are shown in the cases set out below.

A carrier cannot absolve itself from its duty to furnish safe cars by exacting a contract requiring the shipper to inspect and select his car, where the shipper is induced tiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages caused by an alleged negligent delay in the shipment of certain live stock. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. F. Evans and R. R. Vermilion, for plaintiff in error:

The written contract superseded all verbal arrangements, and was binding on the shipper.

to take the risk by safe, but false, appearances, while the carrier knows that the car selected is unsafe. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Holland, 162 Ind. 406, 63 L.R.A. 948, 69 N. E. 138.

A carrier cannot coerce the shipper to yield assent to a limitation of responsibility by making exorbitant charges when such assent is refused. York Mfg. Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 3 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 170.

So, if the shipper's only option is to sign a special contract for a rate less than the legal rate, or a contract for more than the legal rate, then the action of the company is contrary to law, and the shipper is not bound by the contract. Paddock v. Missouri P. R. Co. 155 Mo. 524, 56 S. W. 453.

And an agreement to carry for a price which the company was accustomed to charge is no consideration for the insertion of a clause diminishing the liability of the company in case of a loss by fire. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilbert, supra.

If a carrier is liable to a shipper for failure to furnish cars, then it has no right to require a release of this liability before according to the shipper the privilege of shipping property upon terms the same as those given to other shippers, who assert no claim for damages. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Pearce, 82 Ark. 353, 118 Am. St. Rep. 75, 101 S. W. 760, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 125.

A contract presented to a shipper after his cattle are loaded, with the alternative of signing it or unloading his cattle, was held void in Kansas P. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 17 Kan. 251, so far as it attempted to restrict the liability of the carrier, or to impose additional burdens upon the shipper, as conditions precedent to a recovery for damages resulting from the negligence of the railroad company.

So, where the shipper's horses were in the car, and the agent demanded "that he sign a special contract, or his horses would not go on that train," the special contract was held void in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dill, 48 Kan. 210, 29 Pac. 149.

And a shipper is not bound by a contract presented to him after his stock was loaded, and which was signed by him only after he had been told that, unless he signed the agreement, the company would not ship the cattle. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Mason, 4 Kan. App. 391, 46 Pac. 31.

Where a party, of his own free will and from choice, agrees to execute a written contract covering a certain transaction, and afterwards, in pursuance of that agreement, signs a written contract, just as he had agreed to sign, he cannot claim that the contract was signed under duress.

So, where the inference is fair that if the shipper had not signed the limited-liability contract, the carrier would have refused to ship his cattle, which were already loaded upon the cars, the contract is not binding. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Carter, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 677, 29 S. W. 565.

Proof by the shipper that the cattle were received by the carrier under an oral contract to carry them at a certain rate, and be subject to all the common-law and statutory liabilities, was held in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Avery, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 235, 46 S. W. 897, to establish want of consideration for a written contract which demanded the same or a higher rate, and besides placed all risks of the shipment, and all the labor and burden of loading and unloading and caring for the cattle, upon the shipper, to be performed at his expense.

A stipulation in a contract to carry perishable freight, that it must be at the owner's risk, is void, where those are the only terms upon which the carrier would undertake the service. Parker v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 133 N. C. 335, 63 L.R.A. 827, 45 S. E. 658.

In Adams Exp. Co. v. Nock, 2 Duv. (Ky.) 562, 87 Am. Dec. 510, it is said, obiter, that, in a case of importunate necessity for immediate transportation, a refusal to carry without a special contract cannot be sanctioned.

Messrs. A. M. Keene and E. C. Gates, for defendant in error:

The shipper was given no choice of contracts, and is not bound by one limiting liability, and which was obtained by coercion.

Kansas P. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 17 Kan. 251; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dill, 48 Kan. 210, 29 Pac. 148; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cravens, 57 Ark. 112, 18 L.R.A. 527, 38 Am. St. Rep. 230, 20 S. W. 803; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Holland, 162 Ind. 406, 63 L.R.A. 948, 69 N. E. 138; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Mason, 4 Kan. App. 391, 46 Pac. 31.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is a common carrier, operating a line of railroad running northward through Godfrey, Ft. Scott, and Fulton to Kansas City, Missouri. The plaintiff is a stockman who resides at Fulton, north of Ft. Scott, and who keeps cattle at Godfrey, south of Ft. Scott. The defendant has no office or agent at Godfrey. Desiring to ship several car loads of cattle from Godfrey to Kansas City, the plaintiff made a verbal arrangement to do so with the defendant's agent at Fulton. The arrange-transportation any live stock except under certain conditions modifying their common-law liability would be contrary to law and public policy. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fagan, 72 Tex. 127, 2 L.R.A. 75, 13 Am. St. Rep. 776, 9 S. W. 749.

The mere fact that the plaintiff did not ask time to read the contract before signing it would not necessarily make the contract binding, if it was procured under duress or without consideration. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Batte (Tex. Civ. App.) 107 S. W. 632.

Where the shipper is refused any other contract than one limiting the carrier's liability, and is compelled to sign it, in order to ship his cattle, the contract is not properly evidence in the case, and no defense can be based upon it. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Cotton, 87 Ark. 339, 112 S. W. 742.

So, in Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. McKinney, 34 Ind. App. 402, 73 N. E. 148, it was held that an action by a shipper for loss or injury to goods during transportation is one in tort, where the evidence shows that, as a condition precedent to such carriage, the shipper was compelled to sign a contract limiting the carrier's liability.

And in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hollowell, 172 Ind. 466, 88 N. E. 680, the court said: "The owner may rightfully demand that such property shall be received and carried under the carrier's common-law liability, and a contract limiting such liability, to which he is obliged to assent, in order to secure transportation, cannot be considered as having been freely and fairly entered into."

ment was that cars would be placed at Godfrey, which the plaintiff would load in time to be taken by a certain train, the plaintiff would go with the cattle to Ft. Scott, the defendant would have a shipping contract prepared and ready for signature when the train arrived there, and the plaintiff and his cattle would go through to Kansas City on the train taking them from Godfrey. The plaintiff had been a regular shipper of cattle for years, knew it was the custom to require shippers to sign written contracts, and had always signed written contracts, but he had never scrutinized, and was not familiar with, their provisions. He did not discuss rates or terms with the agent at Fulton, or the conditions of the contract which would be in waiting for him. He did not know what the terms would be, but he expected, when he reached Ft. Scott, to be presented with, and intended to sign, just such a written contract as he had been in the habit of shipping under. The cattle were loaded and transported to Ft. Scott, as contemplated. At Ft. Scott the defendant had no contract in readiness for signature, no agent at the station, and, after diligent effort, the plaintiff could find nobody with authority to bill his cattle. The train conductor could not take the cattle without proper papers, and the cars containing them were cut out of the train, over the plaintiff's objection and protest, were placed on a side track, and the train proceeded to Kansas City without them. The day was hot and sultry, and for several hours the cattle were switched and bumped about the yards, frequently with much violence, or were left standing between lines of other cars, so that they suffered greatly from heat, with the result that they were seriously injured. The plaintiff followed them about, getting up those which were knocked down, and otherwise doing what he could to protect them. The plaintiff finally found an agent who made out a contract, and presented it for signature. The plaintiff was not apprised of its terms, was offered no choice of rates, and was given no option as to conditions of liability on the part of the defendant. He might have read the instrument, but did not. He recognized it as a railroad live-stock contract like the kind he had been using, but he was not familiar with what it contained. He told the agent the condition the cattle were then in, and refused to sign. The agent refused to allow the cattle to be shipped un-

In Kirby v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 4 S. D. 105, 439, 30 L.R.A. 612, 46 Am. St. Rep. 765, 55 N. W. 759, the same doctrine was held applicable to a telegraph company, and it was held that a modification of the common carrier's liability depended upon the agreement of the parties, and the carrier could not legally exact such an agreement as a condition precedent to receiving or carrying the offered freight or message.

In Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Fox, 113 Ill. App. 180, it was held that the burden of showing the assent of a shipper to a limitation of the carrier's common-law liability is upon the carrier. And to the same effect was the decision in Elgin, J. & E. R. Co. v. Bates Mach. Co. 98 Ill. App. 311, affirmed in 200 Ill. 636, 93 Am. St. Rep. 218, 66 N. E. 326.

The lack of an independent consideration for an exemption of a carrier from liability for damages caused by fire, expressed in the bill of lading, cannot successfully be urged to avoid such provision, although the carrier may have had but one rate, where the consideration expressed was sufficient to support the entire contract made. Cau v. Texas & P. R. Co. 194 U. S. 427, 48 L. ed. 1053, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663. And to the same effect was the decision in Arthur v. Texas & P. R. Co. 204 U. S. 505, 51 L. ed. 590, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 338.

Of course, if the goods presented or offered for transportation are of such a character that the carrier is not obliged, as a common carrier, to transport the same, he may insist upon carrying them only under such terms as he may wish to impose; as, for instance, the paraphernalia of a circus, including wild animals (as in Wilson v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. 66 C. C. A. 486, 133 Fed. 1022, affirming 129 Fed. 774; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Wallace, 30 L.R.A. 161, 14 C. C. A. 257, 24 U. S. App. 589, 66 Fed. 506); or the cars of a sleeping car company (as in Russell v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 157 Ind. 305, 55 L.R.A. 253, 87 Am. St. Rep. 214, 61 N. E. 678).

So, carriers making a through contract for the shipment of merchandise, whether through an initial line agreeing to ship beyond its own road, or through a transportation company having no line of its own, but simply authorized to ship over connecting lines, may insert therein a fire-exemption clause, although no offer is made to assume the risk for additional compensation, since there is no common-law liability to make the through shipment. Deming v. Merchants' Cotton press and Storage Co. 90 Tenn. 306, 13 L.R.A. 518, 17 S. W. 89.

Although this note is intended to be confined to cases of the shipment of goods or cattle, attention is called to the fact that in some cases it has been held that before a carrier can limit its liability as a carrier of passengers, the intending passenger must have had the opportunity of an option between a limited-liability contract and a full-liability contract. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Turner, 100 Tenn. 222, 43 L.R.A. 142, 47 S. W. 223; Robert v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (Mo. App.) 127 S. W. 925. Doubtless other cases of the same character might be found.

W. M. G.

less the plaintiff signed the paper tendered. Having no alternative, the plaintiff affixed his signature, so that he could get his cattle to market. A few hours afterward the cattle were placed in a train which took them to Kansas City. When placed on the market, one animal could not be sold, and five others were weighed back after sale because of broken ribs and bruises. The contract which the plaintiff signed required him to attend and unload his cattle at his own risk and expense. It contained provisions with which he did not comply, which were conditions precedent to the recovery of damages for the injuries sustained. It also provided for his transportation. He went to Kansas City on the train with the cattle, and at Kansas City surrendered the contract to the defendant, and received a pass to his home, which he used. The plaintiff sued the defendant for damages, counting upon the common-law liability which attached to the delivery of the cattle to the defendant under the verbal arrangement with the agent at Fulton. The defendant answered, setting up the written contract, and pleading noncompliance with its conditions. The plaintiff replied that the writing was signed under duress. The case was submitted on testimony showing the foregoing, among other facts. The court instructed the jury respecting the common-law liability of the defendant in the absence of special contract, and respecting its limited liability under the written contract, and submitted to the jury the question whether the written contract was signed with such freedom from constraint that it governed the rights of the parties. The defendant excepted, but made no request for other instructions. The jury found for the plaintiff, and the defendant prosecutes error.

The defendant argues that when the written contract was signed, it superseded all oral negotiations, and fixed the rights of the parties. It is said that when the plaintiff signed the contract, he did only what he intended to do from the beginning, and what he agreed to do at the beginning, and hence that the coercion of the agent at Ft. Scott can be given no legal effect. It is not necessary to cite authorities upon the proposition that if the plaintiff freely and voluntarily signed the contract,—assuming it to be one which the law will permit,—it measures the rights of the parties. The oral arrangement would be at an end, and the plaintiff would be in no position to avoid the force of the limitations placed upon the carrier's liability by the writing. It may be assumed that, if the plaintiff legally bound himself at Fulton to execute the precise contract which was presented to him at Ft. Scott, the claimed coercion was without legal influence. But, if the plaintiff rested under no legal obligation to sign that contract, he could abandon his original intention and refuse to do so; and if the original intention to sign was rightfully abandoned, any subsequent assent to the terms of the contract would have to be obtained without coercion or it would not bind. In calling upon this court to declare that the plaintiff irrevocably bound himself to sign the very instrument he did sign, the defendant raises a question of fact which he should have asked to have submitted to the jury under proper instructions. There is no evidence that the defendant had a standard form of contract which it invariably used, and which therefore was in the plaintiff's mind. The contract upon which the defendant relies has the following heading: "St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. Read this contract carefully, as numerous changes have been made." How long this form had been in use does not appear, and it cannot be said the plaintiff had any of its provisions in mind. True, the plaintiff recognized the contract as a railroad livestock contract like the ones he had been using, and such as he expected to sign; but, taking all of his evidence into consideration, a jury would have the right to find that his identification extended no further than to the genus. A man may recognize a trust deed or coupon bond as such, and know nothing of its contents, and he may agree to execute such a bond and to secure it by such a deed without agreeing upon any single condition to be inserted in either. All the plaintiff said must be weighed to ascertain its true purport. Statement qualifies statement, and reconciliation is a jury function.

Except that the plaintiff identified this contract as like those he had previously used, which to the jury might have meant nothing, there is no evidence of usual stipulations or customary conditions with which the plaintiff should have been familiar from his previous experience, and which should have been in mind; and, except as indicated, there is no evidence that this contract was of a regular, usual, or customary kind. The court is not inclined to declare as a matter of law that a shipper who delivers stock to a carrier for transportation, with the understanding that a written contract will be signed, intends or binds himself to submit to every condition the carrier may see fit to impose. Under these circumstances, the jury would have been justified in finding that the plaintiff simply agreed to agree upon a contract when he reached Ft. Scott: and it is elementary law that, unless an agreement to make a future contract be definite and certain upon all the subjects to be embraced, it is nugatory. "A contract between two persons, upon a valid consideration, that they will, at some specified time in the future, at the election of one of them, enter into a particular contract, specifying its terms, is undoubtedly binding, and, upon a breach thereof, the party having the election or option may recover as damages what such particular contract to be entered into would have been worth to him, if made. But an agreement that they will in the future make such contract as they may then agree upon amounts to nothing. An agreement to enter into negotiations, and agree upon the terms of a contract, if they can, cannot be made the basis of a cause of action. There would be no way by which the court could determine what sort of a contract the negotiations would result in, no rule by which the court could ascertain whether any, or, if so, what, damages might follow a refusal to enter into such future contract. So, to be enforceable, a contract to enter into a future contract must specify all its material and essential terms, and leave none to be agreed upon as the result of future negotiations. . . . Where a final contract fails to express some matter, as, for instance, a time of payment, the law may imply the intention of the parties; but where a preliminary contract leaves certain terms to be agreed upon for the purpose of a final contract, there can be no implication of what the parties will agree upon." Shepard v. Carpenter, 54 Minn. 153, 55 N. W. 906. Such being the law and the state of the case, it cannot be said that the plaintiff rested under a legal duty to sign the writing in controversy. He was free to refuse to commit himself to any specific agreement. He did refuse, and the Fulton arrangement was then at an end so far as the execution of a shipping contract was concerned. The law required the defendant to accept the plaintiff's stock for transportation without obliging him to agree to sign a special contract, and without coercing him into signing a special contract. A special contract limiting the carrier's common-law liability must be freely and fairly made, or the shipper may repudiate it; and a refusal to transport stock unless the shipper signs a special contract destroys freedom of consent. "Such a contract, however, must be freely and fairly made with the railroad company,—not exacted as a condition precedent of shipment. Railroad companies cannot arbitrarily fix any valuation on the property of the shipper, or arbitrarily demand or exact the execution of a contract limiting the common-law liability. Kansas P. R. Co. v. Nichols, 9 Kan. 236, 12 Am. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Rep. 494. If a railroad company has two rates for the transportation of goods or stock,—one if the goods or stock are carried under the common-law liability, and the other if carried under a limited or special contract,—the shipper must have real freedom of choice. He cannot be denied the right to have his goods carried by the carrier under its common-law liability; but if he desires, and if the statute permits and public policy does not forbid, he may enter into a special contract with the carrier, limiting the common-law liability. . . . But a common carrier cannot exact of a shipper his signature to a special contract limiting the common-law liability as a condition precedent of shipping or transporting stock, because, in such a case, the carrier resorts to unfair means. A contract thus exacted is not freely and fairly entered into." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dill, 48 Kan. 210, 29 Pac. 148. This being true, the contract pleaded in the answer was voidable at the plaintiff's election.

The defendant claims that the plaintiff affirmed the contract by surrendering it at Kansas City and procuring free transportation to his home. It is undisputed law that a party may not voluntarily act upon a contract which he has been constrained to sign, and voluntarily take the benefit of it, and then avoid it for duress. The rules applicable to the rescission of contracts on the ground of fraud apply. But things done in apparent recognition of the contract while the pressure of the hardship which overcomes the mind continues will not amount to an affirmance. The influence of the duress must be removed before conduct becomes voluntary, and after that, acts charged as constituting a confirmation must be such as to indicate an intention to condone the wrong, and a purpose to abide the consequences. Numerous decisions illustrate these principles.

In the case of Montgomery v. Pickering, 116 Mass. 227, a vendee fraudulently obtained a bond for a deed and a sum of condemnation money for a part of the property. With full knowledge of the fraud and of her rights, the vendor executed a deed pursuant to the bond. Afterwards she brought suit to set aside the conveyance. The opinion reads: "The deed in question does not expressly confirm the validity of the previous contract. It was not founded on any new consideration, or given in settlement of a disputed claim. It was required by the terms of the original contract, and there is nothing to show an intention to forgive the fraud. To have effect as a confirmation, such deed must appear to have been given with that intention by one who was not under the influence of the previous transaction. When relied on as a defense in a case where fraud is clearly established, it is said that it must stand upon the clearest evidence, because the act is so inconsistent with justice, and so likely to be connected with the fraud. Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. Jr. 355, 373. The deed must be so disconnected with the previous dealings as to leave the grantor the complete power of determining, as upon an original act, whether he will do it or not (Crowe v. Ballard, 1 Ves. Jr. 215); or, as it is said in the more recent case of Moxon v. Payne, L. R. 8 Ch. 881, the parties must be at arms' length and stand on equal terms." (P. 230.) In the case of Rau v. Von Zedlitz, 132 Mass. 164, the syllabus reads: "If a woman on the eve of her marriage is induced by threats of the imprisonment of her intended husband, and by undue influence and fear that her marriage will otherwise be prevented, to sign an agreement to pay the debts of her intended husband, the agreement cannot be enforced in equity; and a part payment by her, after signing the agreement, on legal proceedings being threatened, and in ignorance of her rights, is not in equity a ratification of the agreement. If a woman, induced by undue influence, signs an agreement to pay a debt of her intended husband, the fact that the creditor forbore to sue the original debt and to arrest the debtor, and that the woman thereby obtained a husband and a title, will not prevent the woman from setting up the defense of undue influence when the creditor seeks to enforce the contract in equity." In the opinion it was said: "But, to constitute a confirmation, the acts must have been done with that intention by one who was not under the influence of the previous transaction (Montgomery v. Pickering, supra, and cases cited), and with a knowledge of its invalidity." (P. 168.) In the case of Leflore County v. Allen, 80 Miss. 298, 31 So. 815, the syllabus reads: "The fact that a wife lived two years after making a deed, void because made under threats of the prosecution of her husband, and expressed satisfaction at the acceptance of the deed and the prevention of disgrace, is not a sufficient ratification to validate the deed, the husband being still alive and subject to prosecution." In the case of Bell v. Anderson, 74 Wis. 638, 43 N. W. 666, a defrauded vendee of a piano made an offer to return the instrument, which was not accepted, and then brought an action for the price paid. After the offer to return, she used the piano on occasions until the time of trial. In the opinion it was said: "The plaintiff testified that she had used the piano a little, as she had occasion, down to the time of trial. It is claimed that such use thereof is inconsistent with a rescission of the contract of purchase, and hence that her offer to return the instrument is nugatory. Such use may or may not be inconsistent with a rescission of the contract. Were we deciding the question of fact, inasmuch as the defendant, by refusing to take the piano from plaintiff's home, compelled her and her family to remain involuntary bailees of it, and, inasmuch as it is not suggested that it was injured by such use, we should hold the use not inconsistent with the rescission of the contract. But the most that can be successfully claimed by the defendant is that it was for the jury, under proper instructions, to say whether the use was such an assertion of ownership by the plaintiff as would render nugatory the offer to return the instrument." (P. 640.) In the case of Tarkington v. Purvis, 128 Ind. 182, 9 L.R.A. 607, 25 Am. St. Rep. 429, 25 N. E. 879, a fraudulent vendee sold some of the property after a right to rescind had been established by a tender and offer to place the vendor in statu quo. In the opinion it was said: "The doctrine is fully established that a contract induced by fraud is only voidable; and if one who has been defrauded, after discovering the deceit, acquiesces in the sale, either by express words or by an unequivocal act, such as treating the property as his own, with an intent to condone the fraud, he will be deemed to have elected to affirm the contract, and he cannot afterwards rescind. One who, uninfluenced by the fraud, deals with the property as his own after having fully discovered that fraud has been practised upon him in the contract or transaction by or through which he acquired the property, thereby waives his right to rescind. . . . Equivocal acts, however, which do not clearly evince a purpose, with complete knowledge of the fraud, to retain the property as his own, will not defeat the right of the person defrauded to rescind. The act must be unequivocal, and must show an election to retain the property after discovering the deceit before the right to rescind is gone." (P. 185.)

The return of the plaintiff to his home was an incident to the shipment of the cattle, and was bound up with it as the concluding feature of an entire transaction. The contract which he was forced to accept in order to get his cattle out of Ft. Scott compelled him to go with them, or they would have been without care and attention on the road, and without supervision at the unloading. These were responsibilities which he was obliged to assume in order to get the cattle moved. After they were marketed, the return home was not a separate and independent matter of personal advantage, but was a final step of the transaction, necessitated by what had gone before. It would be idle to contend that the plaintiff indisputably intended to condone the fraud and affirm the contract because he was relieved from payment of freight in advance, secured a night ride to Kansas City in the caboose of a freight train at the defendant's expense, and had a lower freight charge deducted from the proceeds of sale,—assuming the defendant carried at a lower rate under special contract. All these things were immediate products of the vitiated agreement forced upon him by the conduct of the defendant's agent, and it cannot be said as a matter of law that he willingly acceded to them. The turning in of the contract, and the acceptance and use of the pass, bear the same relation to the original coercion. They were integral parts of the defendant's scheme which the plaintiff was driven to accept to save his cattle. A jury might be able to say that, as soon as the plaintiff was ready to go home, he commenced to deal with the defendant at arms' length, free from the constraint under which he had been acting, made up his mind to stand by the contract, and determined to get what he could out of it; but the law will not arbitrarily impose such an interpretation upon his conduct. The defendant might have had this question of fact, as well as the one first discussed above, submitted to the jury, but it made no request for instructions to that end.

The instruction given stated the law, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

VALERIAN LOUIS PERRIN et al.

v.

UNITED STATES EXPRESS COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.

(— N. J. —, 74 Atl. 462.)

Evidence — presumption — writing — contents — knowledge.

1. In the absence of evidence or circumstances tending to show the contrary, a person who personally, or by his duly authorized agent, prepares a writing, will be deemed to know the contents of such writing.

Carrier — receipt prepared by shipper — binding effect.

2. Where a shipper tenders to a common carrier a form of receipt for goods to be carried, which contains a limitation of the carrier's liability, and the carrier assents to its terms, the shipper is bound thereby, notwithstanding the receipt may be in a blank form, furnished by the carrier.

(November 15, 1909.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for the loss of certain goods while in defendant's possession for transportation. Reversed.

Statement by Voorhees, J.:

This suit was brought to recover damages for the loss of a case containing gloves, delivered by the plaintiffs at their factory in the city of Plainfield, in this state, to the defendant for shipment by express to their store in the city of New York.

On April 6, 1906, the driver of the express company, in making his rounds, called at the factory of the plaintiffs, and there received a case containing some 80 or more dozen pairs of gloves, which had been nailed up and addressed, and was ready for de-

Note. — Effect of limitation of liability in receipt prepared by shipper.

As to effect of shipping contract signed under compulsion, see note to St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gorman, ante, 637.

The authorities are apparently unanimous in holding with PERRIN v. UNITED STATES EXP. CO. that if the shipper himself prepares the bill of lading or receipt which contains limitations upon the carrier's liability, he will be bound thereby, and be estopped from claiming that he was unaware of its contents. Central R. Co. v. City Mills Co. 128 Ga. 841, 58 S. E. 197 (contract limiting liability to own line); Durgin v. American Exp. Co. 66 N. H. 277, 9 L.R.A. 453, 20 Atl. 328 (contract fixing agreed valuation); Greenwald v. Barrett, 199 N. Y. 170, 92 N. E. 218 (contract fixing agreed valuation); Bernstein v. Weir, 40 Misc. 635, 83 N. Y. Supp. 48 (contract fixing agreed valuation); Wilson v. Platt, 84 N. Y. Supp. 143 (contract fixing agreed valuation); Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Berdan & Co. 22 Ohio C. C. 326 (stipulation releasing carrier for loss by fire not due to its negligence).

So, in Greenwald v. Barrett, supra, the court said: "There was a book of blank receipts in their custody, and they made the entries in the blanks themselves, and completely prepared the receipts for signature by the express company's driver when he called for and took the goods. The contract of agreed valuation being one which the parties could lawfully make, the proof livery to him. The servant of the plaintiffs, who acted principally in the capacity of janitor, packed the goods in question, nailed it up, and marked the address upon it, and took the box downstairs to the place where the express company received it. This witness testified: That plaintiffs had a book of forms of receipts that were bound together; that it was customary, as soon as a case was ready for shipment, for him to write the address and date on the receipt and the articles consigned, and place the book usually on top of the case, and leave it there for the driver; that on this particular occasion, as it was a large case, the driver needed assistance, and therefore he remained until the driver called and filled out the receipt; and that, in addition to his duties as janitor, he was the person who actually made the shipments from the factory to the express company. The receipt was contained in a book of receipts, some of which had been used, leaving the remainder in blank for future use. The driver, having taken the case to the company's bill clerk at the railroad station, where it was weighed and the express charge ascertained, the next morning collected the charge from the plaintiffs. Each page of this book was in itself a receipt, with spaces below for the entries connected with each shipment; that is, for the date, description of the articles, its value, the name of the consignee, destination, and the charges and signature of the company's agent or driver. The book was put in evidence by the defendant. The first entry in it was made more than a year previous to the shipment in question. It was kept in the office of the plaintiffs and was always there, except when it was left with a package intended for shipment, so that the driver could sign it when he received it. These receipts were usually filled out before the driver came, by the shipping clerk of the plaintiff or bookkeeper, or by another who helped the bookkeeper. In the record of the many shipments shown by the book, in no case was the value of the articles shipped before this suit was brought given. In nearly every instance on the used pages of the book at the top line, under the word "value," here required a finding that it had been made."

And in Durgin v. American Exp. Co. supra, it was held that a shipper of goods who fills out one of the blank receipts contained in a book previously furnished by an express company for his use, and obtains the signature of the company's agent thereto upon delivering to him a package for transportation, will be presumed to know the contents of the receipt, and if he receives such receipt without objection, his assent to its conditions will, in the absence of fraud, be conclusively presumed.

And in Central R. Co. v. City Mills Co. supra, a charge was held erroneous which might have led the jury to believe that, if the plaintiff's agent did not understand a contract which he had previously prepared in blank and then filled out, and thus prepared for the other party to sign, the plaintiff would not be bound by it.

So, too, in Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Berdan & Co. supra, the shipper, in accordance with the well-established custom, prepared a receipt containing a statement that the freight should be transported subject to the conditions on the railroad company's bill of lading. One of these conditions was that the company should not be liable for loss by fire not due to its negligence, and it was held that the consignee was bound by the stipulation made by the shipper.

Where the shipper made out a bill of lading limiting the carrier's liability, it was held in Mouton v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 128 Ala. 537, 29 So. 602, that it was binding upon the consignee, although the shipper did not sign it nor notify the carrier that he accepted it. A judgment for the defendant was reversed, however, upon the ground, apparently, that the defendant had failed to prove that the loss was not due to its negligence.

And in Wallace v. Matthews, 39 Ga. 617, 99 Am. Dec. 473, it was held that when the shipper made out such a written contract as was satisfactory to him, which limited the carrier's liability, and carried it to the latter's agent, who signed it, the shipper was bound by it. In this case the carrier's road was much dilapidated from the effects of the Civil War, and it had but little rolling stock, and refused to receive any goods for transportation except under limited-liability contracts.

In Texas Midland R. Co. v. H. L. Edwards & Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 121 S. W. 570, the bill of lading, releasing the carrier from liability for losses due to fire, had been prepared by the shipper, but had not been signed when the goods, which had been delivered to the carrier, were destroyed by fire. The carrier claimed that he was released from liability by the stipulations, but the court held that the liability of the railroad did not arise on the bill of lading, but upon a delivery of the goods to the railroad for transportation.

Attention is called to the fact that in each of the foregoing cases the limitation of the carrier's liability was a valid limitation, and would have been enforceable had it been prepared by the carrier, and the contract otherwise fairly entered into; and it can hardly be claimed that a carrier might, by procuring the shipper to prepare a bill of lading, limit his liability by stipulations which would be void if prepared by the carrier. And in the quotation from the Greenwald Case, cited above, it is to be noted that the court expressly says that the contract in question was one which the parties could lawfully make.

was written the words, "value asked and not given," or the words, "not given," and on the several lines below under these words were "ditto marks," indicating as to each successive shipment that the value had not been given.

The receipt in question provided that, in case of any loss or damage, no demand should be made upon the company "beyond the sum of fifty dollars, at which sum said property is hereby valued, unless the just and true value thereof is stated herein." The words "fifty dollars" are italicized. At the end of this provision, also italicized, is contained: "The party accepting this receipt hereby agrees to the conditions herein contained." In a heavier and large type at the end of the receipt it is stated: "The liability of this company is limited to $50, unless a greater value is stated in this receipt." The defendant, prior to the bringing of this suit, tendered to the plaintiffs $51.33, being the amount of express charges, $1.05, and $50, the amount of its limited liability under the contract, and 28 cents interest, and in its plea set up this tender in defense of the action. The fact and the amount of the tender are undisputed. It appeared that the rate charged the plaintiffs for the shipments was less than would have been charged if the true value had been given. The defendant acknowledged its limited liability under the contract for the amount tendered, and requested that the trial court direct a verdict against it for that amount, which was refused. The trial judge submitted the case to the jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiffs for $1,068.09. The defendant has assigned error on this ruling.

Messrs. Edward A. Day and William T. Day, for plaintiff in error:

The express receipt in evidence constituted a special contract by which the liability of the plaintiff in error for the loss of the goods delivered to it by the plaintiffs was limited to $50.

Mr. Samuel Koestler for defendants in error.

Voorhees, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The stress of attack upon the judgment brought here by this writ of error is against the refusal of the trial court to direct the jury to render a verdict against the defendant for $51.33, the amount tendered to the plaintiff, representing the express charges paid by the plaintiff and $50, the amount to which the defendant's liability was limited by the terms of the written express receipt. The plaintiffs resist this attack by saying that the receipt is not a contract, that it did not become such by its mere reception by them without their assent, citing Hayes v. Adams Exp. Co. 73 N. J. L. 105, 62 Atl. 284, affirmed in 74 N. J. L. 537, 65 Atl. 1044, and further, that the burden lies upon the defendant to prove such assent. In Russell v. Erie R. Co. 70 N. J. L. 808, 67 L.R.A. 433, 59 Atl. 150, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 672, we held that a carrier might lawfully contract specially to limit its common-law liability for any loss except such as might arise by its negligence or misfeasance, and in Atkinson v. New York Transfer Co. 76 N. J. L. 608, 71 Atl. 278, we also held, in the language of the learned chief justice delivering the opinion of this court: "The carrier is entitled to be compensated for his services in proportion to the value of the article consigned and the consequent risk assumed by him. The shipper is entitled to take the benefit of a lower rate, if he desires to do so, by placing a value upon his goods for the purpose of their shipment, below their actual worth. Such a stipulation stands as if the carrier had asked the value of the goods shipped, and had been told by the consignor that it was the sum named in the contract. . . . It exacts from the carrier the measure of care due to the value agreed on, and is, we think, a proper and lawful mode of securing a due proportion between the amount for which the carrier can be held responsible and the charges received by it as a consideration for the safe transportation of the goods shipped." This case did not go to the length that the courts of many of our sister states have gone in holding that the shipper receiving a bill of lading is conclusively presumed to have read it and acquiesced in its terms, in the absence of fraud, imposition, and mistake. See 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 417, where the cases are collected. The case under review does not call for a decision on that point. The Atkinson Case, supra, however, did declare that if a shipper has knowledge that the express charges are based upon a value placed on the goods by him which is less than their real value, and is specified in the receipt, coupled with a clause limiting the carrier's liability to the specified amount, he may not, having accepted such receipt in silence, afterwards repudiate that he assented to the valuation, and recover the full amount of his loss.

The case in hand, however, is one where the plaintiffs must be held to have drawn the contract, and by their own language to have limited the liability of the carrier, to which it has assented. The plaintiffs had knowledge of the entire contents of the receipt, for they had, by their agents in charge of shipping the goods, prepared it and tendered it to the defendant, contrary to the general course of such transactions, where customarily the receipt is filled out by the carrier and tendered to the shipper. Although it was written upon blanks furnished by the carrier, yet these blanks had been in the possession of the shippers, and had been uniformly used and filled out by them in their usual course of shipping goods for more than a year previous to the transaction in question, and were tendered by them to the defendant, and so had been adopted by the plaintiffs as embodying their own contract.

In the absence of evidence or circumstances tending to show the contrary, a person who personally or by his duly authorized agent prepares a writing will be deemed to know the contents of such writing; and so here, the contents of the receipt prepared and furnished by the plaintiffs by their agent accustomed to prepare such receipts, and tendered by the plaintiffs to the defendant for signature, will be presumed to have been known by the plaintiffs. They have not attempted to rebut this presumption. Here, then, we have essentially a case of the shipper limiting the liability of the carrier,—not the usual one, where the carrier has sought to do so. The plaintiffs themselves incorporated in it a provision that the goods covered by it would be valued at $50 unless the true value was stated therein, that the liability of the company was limited to $50 unless a greater value was stated in the receipt, and that the party accepting the receipt agreed to the conditions therein; and having thereafter er, at the time of making the shipment, received the receipt from the carrier, and retained it without objection, with such knowledge, the plaintiffs must be held to be bound by its terms, as a contract put forward by themselves. The court should therefore have directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the sum tendered.

The judgment of the Supreme Court is reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

WICHITA ICE & COLD STORAGE COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

L. H. SHEPPARD.

Appeal — verdict — natural law — effect.

1. Where there is some evidence tending to support a verdict, to justify an appellate court in overturning it on the ground that it is contradicted by the settled and unquestioned laws of nature, or by some established principle of mathematics, mechanics, physics, or the like, the undisputed physical facts must demonstrate beyond any reasonable doubt that the evidence is false, and that the verdict is without support in fact or law.

Trial — verdict — evidence — sufficiency.

2. The evidence in this case examined, and held, that the physical facts are not shown to be such as to authorize the court to say that the story told by the plaintiff's witnesses is false or untrue.

Headnotes by PORTER, J.

Note. — The right of a court to set aside a verdict supported by the testimony of eyewitnesses with respect to matters of fact is treated in notes in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 357, and 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 701. The suggestion in those notes of the possibility of the existence of facts not disclosed in the record, or perhaps not even brought out on the trial, which, if shown, might have served to reconcile the testimony of the eyewitnesses with the scientific principles applicable to the situation, as the court apprehends them, although, upon the facts actually disclosed by the record, that testimony and the verdict resting thereon seem opposed to those principles, is in a measure justified by the position of the court in WICHITA ICE & COLD STORAGE CO. v. SHEPPARD.

From the nature of the question, individual cases are of but limited value as precedents, since there is little probability that substantially similar situations will be presented in two cases.

In Smith v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 82

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Sedgwick County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stanley, Vermillion, & Evans for appellant.

Mr. C. T. Ferguson for appellee.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued to recover damages for injuries caused by his falling into an open tank of hot water while in defendant's employ. The jury awarded him damages in the sum of $2,000. The defendant appeals.

The defense was contributory negligence. The plaintiff had been in the employ of the defendant five and one half days. He had only been at work in and about the room where the accident occurred a half day. The room was undergoing repairs, and the floor was being taken up, and the plaintiff was engaged in carrying out the lumber. The defendant sought to show that the room was so light that the plaintiff should have seen the tank before he stepped into it. The evidence shows that there were two skylights in the roof over the room, each 6 feet long and 3 feet wide; that there were several doors and windows, including two windows in the north, about 18 or 20 feet away, and an opening in the north wall 7 feet by 4 feet, distant about 12 feet from the tank. In addition, the floor between the opening and the tank had been taken up. The plaintiff testified that at the time of the accident he was looking on the floor for a pinch bar, and was feeling along with one hand, trying to find it; that it was so dark where he was that he did not see the tank, and walked into it. He also testified that a pile of lumber on the floor obstructed to some extent the light from a door back of him, and that the skylights were obscured by dirt and smoke. He was corroborated by a witness who was present, and testified that it was dark near the tank, and that there was a weak vapor of steam escaping from it at the time. There was also testimony that another tank, called the brine tank, had been raised about 4 feet from the floor, on account of the repairs which were being made, and that this tended to shut off a part, at least, of the light from the windows and openings.

There is only one proposition argued in the brief, which is that the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses is not to be credited or given any weight whatever because of the physical facts; that, the size of the room and the number of doors and openings from which light was admitted being conceded, it is physically impossible that the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses can be true. It is said in the defendant's brief that, "before this verdict can be sustained, this court must feel satisfied that, notwithstanding all the windows and openings, it was so dark about the vat that the plaintiff could not see his danger." We do not so understand the law or the functions and authority of the court. We may have grave doubts whether it was so dark about the vat as to prevent the plaintiff from seeing his danger. The jury have said that it was. The question for us to determine is whether there is legal evidence in the record to support this finding. The defendant urges that, in order to sustain the verdict, the court would be required to ignore the evidence of its own senses and its own experience in like matters. The question is squarely presented, therefore, whether the physical facts in this case are such that we can say there is no legal evidence to support the verdict. A similar contention was raised in the "wool case" (Sun Ins. Office v. Western Woolen-Mill Co. 72 Kan. 41, 82 Pac. 513), where the court declined to disturb the verdict of a jury far more at variance with the undisputed facts and

Kan. 136, 107 Pac. 635, referred to in the foregoing opinion, the conclusion on this point was merely that while the derailment and overturning of an engine, and the fact that twenty freight cars were piled in confusion on the right of way, tended strongly to discredit the engineer's testimony, which was apparently to the effect that the train was running at the rate of 15 miles an hour, yet it could not say, as a matter of law, that it was physically impossible for this condition to have been brought about with the train running at that rate of speed.

The case of Sun Ins. Office v. Western Woolen-Mill Co. 72 Kan. 41, 82 Pac. 513, also referred to in the foregoing opinion, differs from the cases considered in the notes referred to and also from WICHITA ICE & 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

COAL STORAGE CO. v. SHEPPARD, in that the verdict in that case appears to have rested on expert testimony tending to show that spontaneous combustion can occur in unwashed wool by the application of water. The court was of the opinion that books of scientific character being at variance on the point, it could not be said that one view or the other must be taken by the courts. There is an obvious distinction between such a case and one where the verdict rests, not upon the opinions of witnesses as to matters of science, but on the testimony of eye-witnesses as to what they actually saw, or upon the opinions of witnesses as to matters of nonscientific character, as, for example, the speed of a train.

well-known laws of nature than is the verdict here. It was urged again, but unsuccessfully, upon another state of facts and circumstances in the recent case of Smith v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 82 Kan. 136, 107 Pac. 635.

Appellate courts do not hesitate to reverse a judgment where a principle of law judicially known to the court requires it, notwithstanding the trial court may not have taken judicial notice thereof. It is equally clear that appellate courts will take judicial notice of the unquestioned laws of nature, of the laws of mathematics, and of physics; and, where the trial court has refused to recognize them, and has approved a verdict supported by some evidence, but so far at variance with the undisputed physical facts as to demonstrate that the evidence is false and the verdict unjust, it becomes the duty of the appellate court to reverse the judgment. Speaking of the duty of an appellate court in this respect, Mr. Elliott, in his work on Evidence (§ 39) says: "Even though it may not be authorized to weigh evidence and pass upon the facts, it may, and should, so use its judicial knowledge as to bring about justice. Thus, there are often undisputed physical facts clearly shown in evidence, and, by applying to them a well-known law of nature, of mathematics, or the like, it is demonstrated beyond controversy that the verdict or finding is based upon what is untrue and cannot be true. In such cases it is very generally held that the appellate court should take judicial notice of the law of nature or mathematics or quality of matter, or whatever it may be that rules the case, and apply it as the trial court should have done." This principle was recognized by the court in Young v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 57 Kan. 144, 45 Pac. 583, where the plaintiff, who was injured at a railroad crossing, testified that, when within a distance of 100 feet from the crossing, she looked and listened for the train, and then stopped again, and looked and listened, but did not see the train until she was struck. It was held that her testimony was self-contradictory, because, if she had looked she must have seen the train, for it was in plain view. Again, upon the same principle, in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holland, 60 Kan. 209, 56 Pac. 6, a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant. That was a crossing case, and the plaintiff testified that she looked and listened, but did not see the train. The jury made a finding that she was not negligent. The finding was held to be "little less than absurd." (p. 212), because her evidence was in plain contradiction of the physical facts. The same doctrine has frequently been recognized and followed by other courts. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Stick, 143 Ind. 449, 41 N. E. 365; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Berry, 152 Ind. 607, 46 L.R.A. 33, 53 N. E. 415; Bornscheuer v. Consolidated Traction Co. 198 Pa. 332, 47 Atl. 872; Payne v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 136 Mo. 562, 38 S. W. 308; Hudson v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 145 N. Y. 408, 40 N. E. 8; Medcalf v. St. Paul City R. Co. 82 Minn. 18, 84 N. W. 633; Hunter v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 116 N. Y. 615, 6 L.R.A. 246, 23 N. E. 9. In the case last cited, the plaintiff, who was a brakeman, was injured by striking his head against an arch of a tunnel. The car upon which he was riding was identified, and its height above the rails and the height of the arch in the tunnel established by the plaintiff's evidence, so that it was undisputed that the space between the top of the car and the arch of the tunnel was 4 feet and 7 inches. He testified that at the time he received the injury, he was sitting down on the top of the box car. There was a cut or gash on his forehead, and it was undisputed that, in order to have received the blow at that point, his head must have been at least 4 feet 8 inches above the top of the car. The trial judge submitted to the jury the question of the possibility of the accident happening in this way, saying: "If the plaintiff was sitting down, it is for you to say whether his head would reach to that height." p. 621. In the opinion it is said: "Courts are not bound to take judicial notice of matters of fact. Whether they will do so or not depends on the nature of the subject, the issue involved, and the apparent justice of the case. The rule that permits a court to do so is of practical value in the law of appeal, where the evidence is clearly insufficient to support the judgment. In such case, judicial notice may be taken of facts which are a part of the general knowledge of the country, and which are generally known and have been duly authenticated in repositories of facts open to all, and especially so of facts of official, scientific, or historical character." p. 621. There was no evidence showing the height of the plaintiff, but the court took judicial notice that the average height of man is less than 6 feet, that the average length of the body from the lower end of the spine to the top of the head is less than 36 inches, and came to the conclusion that a man whose forehead would be 4 feet 7 inches above the seat upon which he was sitting must be at least 9 feet high; and since history affords no instance of man attaining such height, the court took judicial notice of the fact that a man could not strike his head under those circumstances, and reversed the judgment.

In the case at bar, the undisputed physical conditions surrounding the plaintiff at the time he received his injuries furnished a strong argument against the credibility of his testimony, but this is as far as the record authorizes us to go. Where there is some evidence tending to support a verdict, to justify an appellate court in overturning it on the ground that it is contradicted by the settled and unquestioned laws of nature, or by some established principle of mathematics, mechanics, physics, or the like, the undisputed physical facts must demonstrate beyond any reasonable doubt that the evidence is false, and that the verdict is without support in fact or law. To justify such a conclusion in this case would require information on a number of matters of more or less importance, concerning which the record is silent. For instance, we have information as to the number of windows, doors, and openings, and their size, but the dimensions of the room are not stated, although the abstract contains a blue print, from which, if it be drawn to a scale, we may assume that the building was 32 feet square. There are no directions marked on the plat, but, assuming that the top of the map is north, the ice room, which is 16 feet square, is in the northeast corner of the building. The room in which the accident occurred is 16 feet east and west by 32 feet north and south, with an "L" extension on the south and east, 16 feet square. There are no windows in the south, one window and one door on the west, and two doors on the east side of the "L" extension. In that part of the room where the dip tank appears to be located, the openings are in the north, and consist of two windows and an opening in the wall, 7 feet by 4 feet. The plat shows four tanks in addition to the one in which the plaintiff was injured, or two tanks extending across the room. It is impossible to tell which. Nor is it possible to tell from the plat either the location or dimensions of the brine tank, which was raised up about 4 feet, and which the plaintiff claimed obstructed the light. It is stated in the brief that this tank is east of the ice room, with a passage between them; but if we are correct in our assumption as to the directions on the map, it would be a physical impossibility for it to be located east of the ice room. Again, we know from the record that the accident occurred just after the noon hour, January 17th, but whether it was a bright, clear day, or a dark, gloomy one, we are not advised. In answer to special questions, the jury found that the doors, windows, skylights, and other openings in the room where the hot water vat was located did not admit sufficient light to enable the plaintiff to see it. The vat itself appears to have been in the main room immediately north of the angle formed by the southwest corner of the ice room. The vat was level with the floor. It was 3 feet long and 20 inches wide, and there was a slight mist or vapor of steam rising from it. It is reasonable to suppose that the brine tank, which was raised up about 4 feet, cast some shadow on the floor, just as a table, desk, or any solid article of furniture will do in an ordinary room. With no information as to the size or dimensions of this tank, or its location with respect to any particular door or window, we are unable to say that the story told by the plaintiff's witnesses is either improbable or untrue.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

ST. PAUL FIRE & MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

F. A. MITTENDORF et al.

(— Okla. —, 104 Pac. 354.)

Pleading — condition precedent — waiver.

1. In an action on an insurance policy, the plaintiff must allege and prove a compliance with the conditions precedent in the policy, or a waiver thereof.

Insurance — proof of loss — sufficiency.

2. In an action on an insurance policy, a substantial compliance with the requirement of proof of loss is sufficient.

Same — oath of insured.

3. Where, in an action on an insurance policy requiring "the insured shall, within sixty days after the loss, make proof thereof under oath," the evidence disclosed that, in due time, the insured made such proof, but Note. — Furnishing proofs of loss not under oath as substantial compliance with policy requiring proofs under oath.

The conclusion reached in the above case, that, under a policy of insurance requiring the insured to furnish sworn proofs of loss, the furnishing of unverified statements of loss is not a sufficient compliance with the policy, was also reached in Spooner v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 53 Vt. 156; McFaul v. Montreal Inland Ins. Co. 2 U. C. Q. B. 59; and in Shaw v. St. Lawrence County Mut. Ins. Co. 11 U. C. Q. B. 73. Whether this requirement has been waived presents another question.

J. A. C.

the same was not sworn to by the insured, held, that it was error for the court to charge the same to be a sufficient compliance with the requirement of the policy.

Pleading — petition — amendment by implication.

4. Where, in an action on an insurance policy, the petition alleged certain specific acts as a waiver of proof of loss, and in proof thereof uncontradicted evidence was introduced, without objection, sufficient to prove a waiver thereof upon other grounds, held, that the petition will be considered amended so as to conform to the facts proved, and a waiver so proven fairly in issue.

Appeal — harmless error — insurance — proof of loss — waiver.

5. While, in an action on an insurance policy, it was error for the court to charge the jury that certain proof of loss introduced in evidence was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the policy, the same is harmless error, where it appears from unconflicting evidence that proof of loss had been waived.

ERROR to the District Court for Kiowa County to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy insuring certain crops against loss or damage by hail. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. D. Houston and C. H. Brooks, for plaintiff in error:

Proof of loss, except in exceptional cases, must be made by the insured.

Where the facts shown plainly establish a waiver of all defects in the proof on the part of the insurer, and especially where there is no conflict or dispute in the evidence showing the waiver, it is properly a question of law for the court to determine.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit brought by defendants in error, plaintiffs below, in the district court of Kiowa county, to recover for total loss on an insurance policy issued by plaintiff in error, defendant below, insuring them against loss or damage by hail, between May 16, and September 15, 1905, at noon, a certain 25 acres of wheat, 15 acres of oats, and 10 acres of smeltz, growing in said county. The petition substantially states, among other things, that plaintiffs had performed all conditions precedent in said policy, and had in due time furnished defendant proof of loss, but not upon blanks furnished by defendant, for the reason that the blanks furnished by defendant were each time first filled out by defendant, showing only a partial loss of $100, based upon information furnished by defendant's adjuster, sent to adjust the loss soon after it occurred, and which plaintiffs refused to sign, and for that reason, and that said adjuster had offered $100 in settlement, and had left without asking further information, defendant had waived formal proof of loss under said policy. For answer defendant filed a general denial, and, among other things, alleged that the policy provided: "The insured shall, within sixty days after the loss, make proof of loss under oath, stating the date and number of his policy, a description of the land upon which the grain was damaged by hail, the date of the loss or damage, the percentage of damage done to grain on each piece of land. A failure by the assured to give the notice or make proof of loss within the time herein specified shall cause a forfeiture of any claim under this policy." And plaintiffs, if loss had been by them sustained, had failed to make proof thereof, as thus required, which said failure worked a forfeiture of said claim. After reply in which plaintiff denied each and every allegation contained in the answer, "so far as the same controverts the allegations stated in the petition," there was trial to a jury, which resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiffs for $391.50, and defendant brings the case here.

The only error assigned is that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "You are further instructed, gentlemen of the jury, that if you find from the evidence 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

that, within sixty days from the date of the loss complained of, the plaintiffs made out and forwarded to the defendant the proof of loss contained in exhibit D, that has been offered in evidence before you, such proof of loss is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the policy of insurance, which provides that proof of loss shall be made by the plaintiffs to the defendant within sixty days from the date of such loss."

Said exhibit D, produced by defendant on the trial, is as follows:

Mt. View, Oklahoma, June 19, 1905.

Van Arsdale & Osborne,
Wichita, Oklahoma.

Dear Sir:—

I went this day to the justice of the peace, I. W. Gray, and had him select two other appraisers, which was Mr. C. H. Fisher and Mr. W. H. Garden. We did not make selection of the appraisers. Inclosed you will find a statement from the three men above mentioned. Settle this claim on policy No. H. 29,908, within five days, or we will have to sue on this. Your adjuster, Mr. Payne, acknowledged that we had been damaged, and according to your letter of June 15th could not get me in the fields for settlement. Will say that I was ready to go into the fields at any time, but he was afraid he would miss the train. I would not have done this, but could get no encouragement for settlement, and so I will now have to collect the full amount according to the appraisers. I will also send you notice that was made in fields, showing you how they divided and struck a balance. Please return the same. Yours truly,

H. R. Davis, T. Z. T.
T. A. Mittendorf.

Territory of Oklahoma, County of Oklahoma.

This is to certify that we, the undersigned, have this day of June 19, 1905, made a personal inspection of the crops of wheat, oats, and smeltz on the ——— quarter of section ——— in township 8th, No. of range 15 W. I. M. in Kiowa county, Oklahoma, and find to the best of our knowledge the loss to be as follows, viz: Wheat, 01 per cent loss, oats, 56 per cent loss; smeltz, 80 per cent loss. In witness whereof we hereunto set our hands this 19th day of June, 1905.

I. W. Gray.
C. H. Fisher.
W. H. Gordon.

Subscribed to and sworn before me this 19th day of June, 1905.

In support of this contention it is urged that, as said proof of loss was not made by the "insured" "under oath," it is fatally defective. To so instruct was error. To our minds it is clear that "under oath" meant the oaths of the insured, and not the oaths of others, for the reason, among others, that the policy further provides: "That any . . . false swearing by the assured relative . . . to the amount or cause of any loss or damage to any insured property shall be a full satisfaction and discharge of this company from all liability by virtue of this policy, and shall be a complete bar to all remedies thereon." And that proof of loss under oath of the insured constituted a condition precedent to their right of recovery on the policy, upon a performance of which the insurer had a right to insist. And this, too, we believe, although said provision in the policy should be liberally construed in favor of the insured, as to which, in Porter v. Traders' Ins. Co. 164 N. Y. 504, 52 L.R.A. 424, 58 N. E. 641, the court says: "Finally, it should be noted that the condition alleged to have been violated in this case applied only after the capital fact of a loss. The object of the provision was to prescribe the manner in which an accrued loss was to be adjusted and ascertained. The liability of the defendant having become fixed by the happening of the event upon which the contract was to mature, conditions which prescribe methods and formalities for ascertaining the extent of it, or for adjusting it, are not to be subjected to any narrow or technical construction, but construed liberally in favor of the insured. Solomon v. Continental F. Ins. Co. 160 N. Y. 505, 46 L.R.A. 682, 73 Am. St. Rep. 707, 55 N. E. 279; McNally v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 137 N. Y. 389, 33 N. E. 475; Paltrovitch v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 143 N. Y. 73, 25 L.R.A. 198, 37 N. E. 639; Sergeant v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 155 N. Y. 349, 49 N. E. 935; Matthews v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 154 N. Y. 449, 39 L.R.A. 433, 61 Am. St. Rep. 627, 48 N. E. 751."

Nor in so holding are we unmindful of the rule that, as to proof of loss, all that can be required of the insured is a reasonable and substantial compliance with the conditions of the policy. In Northwestern Ins. Co. v. Atkins, 3 Bush, 328, 96 Am. Dec. 239, the court said: "The stipulation referred to, providing for the production of preliminary evidence of loss as a condition precedent to the payment of such loss by the insurer, is not unusual in insurance policies; and it may be regarded as authoritatively settled that a substantial compliance with such a condition must be made by the claimant before a right of action will accrue to him for losses, unless the right to insist on such preliminary condition be waived. Angell, Fire Ins. §§ 223-248; Phillips, Ins. p. 497; Columbia Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 10 Pet. 509, 9 L. ed. 512; Smith v. Haverhill Mut. F. Ins. Co. 1 Allen, 297, 79 Am. Dec. 733." 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 336; Home Ins. Co. v. Cohen, 20 Gratt. 312; Rochester Loan & Bkg. Co. v. Liberty Ins. Co. 44 Neb. 537, 48 Am. St. Rep. 745, 62 N. W. 877; Boyle v. Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. 169 Pa. 349, 32 Atl. 553; Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Goode, 95 Va. 751, 30 S. E. 366; Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co. v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 76 Mo. App. 27; Bartlett v. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 46 Me. 500; Norton v. Rensselaer & S. Ins. Co. 7 Cow. 645; Erwin v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. 24 Mo. App. 145. The proof contained in exhibit D did not substantially comply with said requirement of the policy, in that it was not made under oath of the insured, and for that reason was fatally defective.

Spooner v. Vermont Mut. Ins. Co. 53 Vt. 156, was a suit on a fire insurance policy covering a dwelling house, barn, and produce, etc. It was issued to Spaulding and Chloe D. Spooner, his wife, the latter of whom was the sole owner of the property. The plaintiffs alleged partial loss, and notice thereof duly given to the company. Defendant pleaded, among other things, that plaintiff did not make out and deliver a detailed statement thereof, as required by the by-laws and act of incorporation of defendant. Said by-laws required that all persons insured by the company, and sustaining loss or damage by fire, "are forthwith to give notice thereof to the company, and within thirty days after said loss to deliver in a particular account in detail of such loss or damage, signed with their own hands, and verified by their oath or affirmation; . . . they shall also declare on oath whether . . . they were the owners of the property at the time of the loss. If there be any fraud or false swearing, the claimant shall forfeit all claim by virtue of this policy." Plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to prove that within thirty days after the loss they prepared a detailed statement of the same, and deposited it in the postoffice, duly directed to the defendant company; that said statement was sworn to by Spaulding Spooner, but not by Chloe D. Spooner, the wife, and was signed by both husband and wife. The defendant requested the court to charge, in effect, that the notice was not such a compliance with the by-laws as would entitle plaintiff to recover, which the court declined to do, but charged "that said detailed statement was a compliance with said by-laws," to which defendant excepted. There was verdict for plaintiff. On appeal, the court held that there was no waiver of proof of loss in the cases, and in passing said: "The by-law requires a statement of the loss—that is, of the property destroyed or damaged—to be signed by the owner, and verified by the oath of the owner, with the additional oath that the party making such statement was, at the time of the loss, the owner of said property. It turns out that, of the property lost, Chloe, the wife, was the sole owner. The statement was not sworn to by her. It does not appear that any oath was made by either as to the ownership of the property. . . . The court told the jury explicitly that that statement was a substantial compliance with the by-law. This we think erroneous. The failure of the owner of the property to make oath to the statement rendered the statement defective in a material respect. It may be true that such defect might be waived by the company, but there was no evidence in the case tending to show that the company did waive it,"—and reversed and remanded the cause.

McManus v. Western Assur. Co. 22 Misc. 269, 48 N. Y. Supp. 820, was a suit to recover on a fire insurance policy. The plaintiff, among other things, alleged that she duly served proofs of loss on the defendant, and that she had complied with all the other conditions of said policy on her part. The answer was a general denial. The policy, among other things, provided that in case of loss the insured, within sixty days after the fire, "shall render a statement to this company, signed and sworn to by the insured," stating, among the other things, "the interest of the insured in the property." Proof of loss was duly furnished. It was signed by the insured, and under her signature was the following certificate of oath, not signed by her, and without venue:

"Personally appeared Mrs. Ann McManus, signer of the foregoing statement, who made solemn oath of the truth of the same.

"Witness my hand and official seal this 8th day of April, 1896.

"Michael A. Burdett,

"(134) Notary Public, N. Y. Co."

In reply thereto the insurer notified the insured "that the papers offered as proof of loss are defective," and "to serve new papers in proper form;" and urged as objections thereto, among other things, that "the statement prefixed to the schedule is not properly verified." "There seems to be no venue and no affidavits signed by the insured, but merely a certificate of the notary that the insured 'made oath to the truth of the same.'" The defects thus pointed out were never corrected by the insured, who claimed the same to be sufficient. Both parties stood on their rights on this point, and plaintiff brought suit on the policy, urging, among other things, a waiver of proof of loss as to the oath. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. The supreme court, in affirming the judgment of the trial court, said: "The requirement of the policy that the proofs of loss shall be 'signed and sworn to' by the insured means, by general understanding and practice in matters requiring such verification, that the oath, or a certificate thereof, shall be in writing. This present certificate does not state that the affiant made oath before the notary. This defect seems to be fatal to its sufficiency. Proffatt, Notaries, § 68; Smart v. Howe, 3 Mich. 590. But the company did not include it among its grounds of objections, and thus excluded and waived it. The only objections specified on the head of the oath were that there was 'no venue and no affidavit signed by the insured.' There being no requirement in the policy that the insured shall sign the affidavit, the latter is untenable. Proffatt, Notaries, § 67; Millius v. Shaffer, 3 Denio, 60. But the former was good; absence of a venue making an affidavit a nullity. Thompson v. Burhans, 61 N. Y. 52; Proffatt, Notaries, § 66. The affidavit of the notary, subsequently made and served upon the company, did not supply the lack of a validly certified oath by the insured. It was her oath in writing, or a valid certificate thereof, which the company was entitled to. The proofs of loss were thus fatally defective, and the plaintiff may not prevail unless such defect were waived by the company. It now seems to me as matter of law that it was." But since forfeitures are not favored, we hold that the giving of this instruction is not reversible error, for the reason that, as the condition insisted on was one inserted in the policy for the benefit of the insurer, the same was one which the insurer might, and in this instance did, waive. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 934, says: "Since the conditions of a policy, a breach of which by the assured will give rise to a forfeiture, are inserted for the benefit of the insurance company, they may be waived either pending the negotiation for the insurance, or after such negotiation has been completed, and during the currency of the policy, and this either before or after the forfeiture is incurred; and, since forfeitures are not favored in the law, the courts are always prompt to seize hold of any circumstances that indicate an election to waive." There is no conflict in the evidence.

On this point the record disclosed that the loss sued for accrued May 26, 1905; that soon thereafter plaintiffs notified defendant thereof, who, in a short time, sent its adjuster to the scene; that he, with one of the insured, examined the injury sustained to the crops, and on a blank furnished by the company prepared proof thereof, showing a loss of 40 per cent to the wheat, 30 per cent to the oats, and 30 per cent to the smeltz,—a damage in all of $100,—and presented the same to said insured to sign, but who refused, and then and there claimed a total loss; that after plaintiffs and said adjuster were unable to agree as to the extent of the loss, the former asked for appraisers to appraise the same, which said adjuster declined to appoint on behalf of the company; that plaintiffs afterwards demanded of defendant in writing an appraisal of said loss; that defendant refused to appoint or select appraisers for that purpose; that soon thereafter plaintiffs furnished to defendant proof of loss, as set forth in exhibit D, whereupon, on June 15, 1906, defendant wrote, inclosing proof of loss on one of its blanks, filled out as theretofore presented to plaintiffs by said adjuster, with the request that they sign and return the same, promising when received that a draft for $100 would issue in payment thereof, which was not done; and that since furnishing said proof of loss, plaintiffs have received no objections thereto, and no communication of any kind from defendant concerning their claim. Receiving and retaining said proof of loss, now in the answer for the first time complained of, without objecting to any defects therein, was a waiver of any objections thereto, and that, too, as a matter of law, under the undisputed evidence herein. 4 Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, 3544, and cases cited. But it is in effect contended that no question of waiver is before us, for the reason that the court did not charge thereon, and confined plaintiffs to proof of loss as required by the terms of the policy as a condition precedent to his right of recovery. The point is not well taken.

Examination of the record discloses that a waiver of said condition was pleaded by plaintiffs; that while they did not specifically predicate such waiver upon the fact that defendant received and retained the proofs furnished without objection, yet, as such evidence was introduced by them without objection, in proof of waiver, we hold that their petition was, in effect, amended so as to conform to said facts proved (Capitol Ins. Co. v. Bank of Pleasanton, 48 Kan. 397, 29 Pac. 578; Missouri Valley R. Co. v. Caldwell, 8 Kan. 244; Mitchell v. Milhoan, 11 Kan. 617, and thereby put a waiver, based upon that ground, fairly in issue. Had defendant objected to the introduction of said evidence for the reason that no waiver based upon that ground had been pleaded, plaintiffs would doubtless have amended so as to set it up. As it did not do so, but permitted the evidence to be introduced without objection, thereby treating waiver upon that ground as a proper issue, it is now too late to complain. Wilson v. Northwestern Mut. Acci. Asso. 53 Minn. 470, 55 N. W. 626, was a suit by plaintiff's administrator on an accident policy. After the death of the insured, and before the appointment of the said administrator, proof of the claim was made by one Jones on a blank form of claim received from defendant association. After sending same to defendant, no further proof was demanded, and prior to the bringing of the suit several attempts were made by defendant to settle the claim. Defendant pleaded in defense insufficiency of the proof of loss. On appeal, the supreme court held that defendant could not be allowed to defeat a recovery on the ground that it was incumbent on plaintiff himself to file the proof, or that he could not, with its implied consent, adopt the act of Jones, saying: "It is analogous to the reception and retention of defective proof of a claim. In such cases good faith would require that the association give notice indicating the defect; and the failure to object to defective proofs, or a refusal to pay on other grounds, is regarded as an acceptance of the defective proofs, and a waiver of defects. American L. Ins. Co. v. Mahone, 56 Miss. 180; Miller v. Eagle Life & Health Ins. Co. 2 E. D. Smith, 268; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Rogers, 119 Ill. 474, 59 Am. Rep. 810, 10 N. E. 242." And the court added: "But appellant calls attention to the fact that in the complaint plaintiff alleged the making and filing of proper proof of the claim by him, which was put in issue by the answer, and that no waiver of full performance of the condition precedent to recovery was pleaded in the reply. Not having pleaded a waiver, plaintiff was limited to proof of performance as alleged in the complaint, is the position of appellant's counsel, who cites Guerin v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 44 Minn. 20, 46 N. W. 138, and Mosness v. German-American Ins. Co. 50 Minn. 341, 52 N. W. 932, in support of the position. We need not consider the condition of the pleadings on this subject, because no objection was made on that ground to the reception of the testimony relative to the filing of proof of the claim by Jones, plaintiff's subsequent reliance upon and adoption thereof, with the implied consent of defendant's officers, the statement of the secretary that this proof was satisfactory, so far as he knew, and other statements and acts which estopped defendant association from asserting that satisfactory proof of the claim had not been made. Nor was the point made when defendant moved for a verdict in its favor at the close of the evidence. All questions of ratification, adoption, and waiver of proof, other than that furnished by Jones, were evidently regarded as proper issues under the pleadings, and it is now too late for counsel to insist that they were not. He is concluded by his course upon the trial," —and affirmed the judgment of the trial court. It follows that, as there was no conflict in the evidence, the question of waiver was one of law, for the court (Helvetia Swiss F. Ins. Co. v. Edward P. Allis Co. 11 Colo. App. 264, 53 Pac. 242; Dwelling House Ins. Co. v. Dowdall, 159 Ill. 179, 42 N. E. 606; Spring Garden Mut. Ins. Co. v. Evans, 9 Md. 1, 66 Am. Dec. 308; Pretzfelder v. Merchants' Ins. Co. 123 N. C. 164, 44 L.R.A. 424 (31 S. E. 470); that, upon the undisputed facts, plaintiffs were entitled to have the law declared to be that defendant, by retaining, without objection, the proof of loss furnished by them, waived all objections thereto, including the objections that the same was not sworn to by the insured, and a verdict directed for plaintiffs. Under this view of the case, the error complained of was harmless. Helvetia Swiss F. Ins. Co. v. Edward P. Allis Co. supra.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

A. A. McDONALD, Guardian of Ella Hare, Appt.,
v.

TILL SHAW et al.

(92 Ark. 15, 121 S. W. 935.)

Will — devise of beneficiary's property — election.

1. The intent to devise property of a beneficiary in a will must appear upon its face to compel him to elect between asserting his title to such property and claiming the benefit of the provision in the will.

Same — parol evidence — enlarging devise.

2. Where one devises a portion of his estate and there is property upon which the will can operate, evidence is not admissible for the purpose of enlarging the devise so as to include property belonging to another.

Party — will — election.

3. No election can be compelled between a devise and property covered by the will which is alleged to belong to the devisee, in a suit to which the person to whom the devise was made is not a party.

On Rehearing.

Equity — jurisdiction — retaining suit.

4. A chancery court having assumed jurisdiction of a suit involving the right to compel a beneficiary under a will to elect between the provision in his favor and a claim to property covered by the will which he alleges belonged to him may retain the case to settle the amount of mesne profits to which he is entitled and the amount to be allowed those who had been in possession for betterments.

Action — settlement of estate — extraneous claims.

5. In a suit to recover possession of real estate in which a cross complaint is filed to compel the claimant to elect between claiming it and accepting a benefit under a will which is alleged to have covered it, claims cannot be presented by persons who claim to have purchased property from testator's administrator, to subrogation against that estate for the amount of the purchase price paid, or by persons who claim compensation for support furnished to the beneficiary.

(July 12, 1909.)

Note. — May beneficiary be put to his election by extrinsic evidence of testator's intention.

In Blake v. Bunbury (1792) 1 Ves. Jr. 514, Lord Eyre said: "This putting a devisee to his election, however reasonable and just it may be, was certainly a strong operation of a court of equity; and I agree, the intention of the testator to dispose of that which is not his ought to appear upon the will, with such explanation, however, of the prima facie appearance, as the law admits; . . . and no man ought, under pretense of this rule, to be spelt or conjectured out of his property. But as, on one hand, we are not to do it by conjecture, so, on the other, we are not to refuse our assent to that moral certainty and demonstration which, in such cases as the present, the general object of both instruments, the nature of the subject, the scope and purpose of the will, the observations upon the particular clauses, and the force of the expressions, construed according to their natural import, may produce." The two instruments referred to were a settlement and a will which were considered together in determining the intention of the testator.

The case of Darlington v. Pulteney, (1795) 2 Ves. Jr. 544, 7 Eng. Rul. Cas. 45, has been frequently referred to as one in which steward's accounts and a settlement of the state of the property were admitted in evidence to show the testator's intention to include in the will property of which he thought he was the owner, but of which a beneficiary in the will was the owner. Lord Loughborough, who decided the foregoing case, said in Rutter v. Maclean (1799) 4 Ves. Jr. 531 that in the Pulteney Case he had persuaded himself that where a man disposed of his estate it was not a fair inference that he intended to dispose of what was not his estate, and that the fact that he had a large estate of his own was suf-

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Sebastian Chancery Court in defendants' favor in consolidated actions brought to recover possession of certain real estate to which plaintiff alleged title as heir at law of John Hare, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Winchester & Martin, for appellant:

In order to create a condition requiring an election it must clearly appear that the testator undertook to dispose of some property belonging to the person called upon to elect.

2 Jarman, Wills, 15-17; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1075, 1086; Fitzhugh v. Hubbard, 41 Ark. 69; Blake v. Bunbury, 1 Ves. Jr. 523; sufficient to satisfy the provision in the will. But he pointed out that the decision was directly to the contrary, that is, to the effect that since the testator thought property of the beneficiary belonged to him, he must have intended to include it, and there should be an election.

In Hinchcliffe v. Hinchcliffe (1796) 3 Ves. Jr. 521 where accounts in the testator's handwriting were admitted to show the surrounding circumstances, and were expressly limited to the question of election and stated to be inadmissible to explain the will, the decision actually turned upon the rule there announced, that provisions for children by the will of the parent are presumed to be in satisfaction of a prior provision by settlement, unless clearly not so intended.

In Druce v. Denison (1801) 6 Ves. Jr. 385, Lord Eldon, doubting their correctness, nevertheless bowed to what he considered the controlling authority of the Pulteney and Hinchcliffe Cases, and admitted a statement of property written by the testator to show that he intended to dispose of property not strictly, but in some sense, his, for the purpose of compelling an election.

Without discussing the propriety of such a course, the court in Dillon v. Parker (1833) 1 Clark & F. 303, admitted evidence of an agreement between the testator and his son, for the purpose of showing the former's intention to impose an obligation to elect, but it was held that no such intention was established.

In a dictum in Pickersgill v. Rodger (1876) L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 163, it was said that the presumption that a testator intends to dispose only of property which belongs to him was a presumption only, rebuttable even by parol evidence.

The foregoing cases can scarcely be called authoritative. About the only one of them not in the nature of a dictum is Darlington v. Pulteney, which loses much of its force through the subsequent remarks by the judge who decided it, and through the statements made in Druce v. Denison.

It may fairly be said that the English 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Doe ex dem. Oxenden v. Chichester, 4 Dow, P. C. 89; Clementson v. Gandy, 1 Keen, 309; Havens v. Sackett, 15 N. Y. 365; Adsit v. Adsit, 2 Johns. Ch. 448, 7 Am. Dec. 539; Miller v. Springer, 70 Pa. 269; Dummer v. Pitcher, 2 Myl. & K. 262, s. c. 5 Sim. 35; Pickersgill v. Rodger, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 163.

A general devise of the testator's real estate shows an intention to give what strictly and properly belonged to him, and nothing more, even if the testator had no real estate of his own upon which the devise could operate.

1 Jarman, Wills, pp. 391, 393; 2 Jarman. Wills, pp. 17, 18; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1087.

Parol evidence was not admissible to enlarge the devise.

cases deny that extrinsic evidence may be admitted to show that the testator intended to bequeath property not belonging to him, and thus raise a case of election, and it is declared that such intention must appear by the will alone. Clementson v. Gandy (1836) 1 Keen, 309; Gibson v. Gibson (1852) 1 Drew. 42.

In Dixon v. Samson (1837) 2 Younge & C. Exch. 566, where testatrix gave a legacy upon condition that the legatee forego all claims upon her estate, parol evidence that the only claim that the legatee ever had upon such estate was for a legacy under the will of another, was held inadmissible for the purpose of compelling an election with respect to such claim.

In Stratton v. Best (1791) 1 Ves. Jr. 285, the court said, in holding evidence dehors the will inadmissible for the purpose of compelling an election, that to hold it admissible would be to introduce a very desperate rule of property into the court. These words were quoted with approval in Dummer v. Pitcher (1833) 2 Myl. & K. 262.

It was held in an early case that parol evidence was inadmissible to show that a testator's provision for his wife was intended to be in lieu of dower, for the purpose of compelling an election by her. Tinney v. Tinney (1743) 3 Atk. 8. (The same result has been reached by the Canadian court. Fairweather v. Archibald, 15 Grant. Ch. [U. C.] 255.)

And subsequent cases have declared that such intention must appear from the will, either expressly or by necessary implication. French v. Davies (1795) 2 Ves. Jr. 580; Birmingham v. Kirwan (1805): 2 Sch. & Lef. 452; Warbuton v. Warbuton (1854) 2 Smale & G. 163.

And it seems to be settled in this country that extrinsic evidence is admissible to show the condition of the subject-matter and the surrounding circumstances, so as to place the court in the position of the testator, but his purpose to put the beneficiary to his election must appear from the will itself. Fitzhugh v. Hubbard, 41 Ark. 64; Waters v. Howard, 1 Md. Ch. 112; Sher- man v. Lewis, 44 Minn. 107, 46 N. W. 318; Casey v. McGowan, 50 Misc. 426, 100 N. Y. Supp. 538.

The intention to raise an election must be manifest from the will itself. Jones v. Jones, 8 Gill, 198; McLaughlin v. Barnum, 31 Md. 425; Havens v. Sackett, 15 N. Y. 365; Huston v. Cone, 24 Ohio St. 11; Pennsylvania Ins. Co. v. Stokes, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 597; Re Hayden, 1 Connoly, 454, 5 N. Y. Supp. 845; Pennsylvania Co. v. Stokes, 61 Pa. 136.

It must be disclosed by such instrument that the testator assumed to dispose of property belonging to the beneficiary. Cameron v. Parish, 155 Ind. 329, 57 N. E. 547.

So, for the purpose of forcing the election, extrinsic evidence is inadmissible to establish the intention of the testator to dispose of property belonging to the beneficiary. Young v. McKinnie, 5 Fla. 543; Gray v. Williams, 130 N. C. 53, 40 S. E. 843; Charch v. Charch, 57 Ohio St. 561, 49 N. E. 408; McLean v. Miller, 17 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 637.

And the American cases, like those of England, hold parol evidence inadmissible to show that a testamentary provision for the wife was intended to be in lieu of dower. Cowdrey v. Cowdrey, 72 N. J. Eq. 951, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1176, 67 Atl. 111; Hall v. Hall, 8 Rich. L. 407, 64 Am. Dec. 758. An early Virginia statute authorized the admission of parol evidence to show that a provision in favor of the wife was intended to be in lieu of dower. Ambler v. Norton, 4 Hen. & M. 23. And the same seems to have been true in West Virginia. Tracey v. Shumate, 22 W. Va. 474; Atkinson v. Sutton, 23 W. Va. 197.

And the cases are numerous in which it has been declared that, in the absence of statute, the widow cannot be put to her election unless it appears from the will that testator so intended, either expressly or by necessary implication. It should be noted that it does not appear in these cases that extrinsic evidence was sought to be introduced, and it may not necessarily follow that the courts would hold extrinsic evidence inadmissible. In preparing this list 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Mr. Ira D. Oglesby also for appellant.

Messrs. Read & McDonough, Brizolara & Fitzhugh, Youmans & Youmans, and Joseph M. Hill, for appellees:

If the testator give what is not his property, but which he supposes to be his, and gives to the person whose property it is, an interest by his will, that person will not be permitted to defeat the disposition when it is in his power, and yet take under the will; and the same rule applies though the testator knew he had no right to dispose of the lands, and yet knowingly he takes it upon himself to dispose of them.

of cases, however, care has been exercised to exclude those which state merely that it is presumed that the testator, by making a general provision for his widow, did not intend to affect her right to dower; that is, only those cases are included in which the dicta (they appear clearly to be dicta) are to the effect that no case for election arises except where the will itself discloses that it was intended to impose an election. It may be that the fact that this judicial statement has been so frequently made accounts for the small number of decisions on the admissibility of extrinsic evidence, upon the theory that it is regarded as establishing the determination of the courts to hold such evidence inadmissible. Following are the cases holding that, in the absence of statute, the intention to bar dower must appear by the will itself: Green v. Green, 7 Port. (Ala.) 19; Hilliard v. Binford, 10 Ala. 977 (rule changed by statute); Stokes v. Pillow, 64 Ark. 1, 40 S. W. 580 (homestead); Thompson v. Betts, 74 Conn. 576, 92 Am. St. Rep. 235, 51 Atl. 504; Tooke v. McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ella Hare, who is, and has been since she was an infant of tender years, an imbecile, instituted separate actions by her guardian against certain defendants to recover possession of real estate in the city of Ft. Smith, title to which is asserted for her by inheritance from her father, John Hare, who is shown to have owned it at the time of his death. The defendants filed separate answers and cross complaints, praying that the actions be transferred to the chancery court. They each alleged, in substance, that they held the property in controversy, and claimed title thereto, by purchase and conveyance, one from the devisee under the last will of Mary A. Hare, mother of Ella Hare, and the others from the administrator of the estate of said Mary Hare; that said Mary Hare by will devised property of her own to Ella Hare, and also devised property of Ella Hare to others, and that said Ella Hare should therefore be put to an election whether she would take her own property and repudiate her mother's will, or conform to said will and permit the defendants to keep the property conveyed to them. The statutory change referred to in the foregoing list of cases is uniformly a reversal of the common-law rule. The statutes generally provide that a general provision shall be taken to be in lieu of dower, unless the contrary intention appears. Where such a statute is in force, of course the question considered herein cannot arise. It has been found that statutes of this kind have been in force in Alabama, Florida, Indiana, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri (change made only as to lands of which husband should die seised), New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Tennessee, and Wisconsin. In Virginia and West Virginia, as has been seen, a legislative enactment has authorized the admission of extrinsic evidence in such cases.

were that the court should make such election for Ella Hare on account of her incapacity to elect for herself. The cases were transferred to the chancery court and consolidated, and on final hearing the court made an election for Ella Hare that she should conform to the will of her mother, thus permitting the defendants to keep the property devised to their grantor. The guardian of Ella Hare appealed to this court.

The facts of the case are practically undisputed. John Hare and his wife, Mary A., came to Ft. Smith in 1852. They were members of the Roman Catholic Church, belonging to the parish of the church of the Immaculate Conception, one of the two Catholic churches of Ft. Smith. They had one child, Ella, who was in infancy rendered an imbecile by a stroke of paralysis. She is now about thirty-five years of age, and is unable to walk without assistance, or to care for herself, and has but a small degree of intelligence. She is in the care of the Catholic sisters in a convent at Ft. Smith. When she was a small child, her father died,—in 1883,—leaving an estate consisting of $2,028.05 personal property and a large amount of real estate, which was then valued at $26,000, including the property now in controversy. He left a will, devising all his property to his wife, Mary A. Hare, the will being in due form in all other respects, but omitting to mention the name of his child, or to make any provision for her. Mrs. Hare then owned no real estate. Among other tracts of land owned by John Hare was one of 470 acres in sections 1 and 2, township 7 N., range 31 W., worth about $6 or $7 per acre. It is admitted that the title to this property was in John Hare; but after his death the record shows that for some reason or other his wife, Mary Hare, accepted a quitclaim deed from one Carnall, describing and conveying the property. It is not shown that Carnall had any title to convey. The will of John Hare was probated, and Mrs. Hare administered on his estate and closed the same up with an order of the probate court vesting all the above estate of John Hare in her. She exercised acts of ownership over the same after her husband's death. She built houses on some of it and sold some of it.

The evidence tends to show that Mrs. Hare was never advised that the last will of her husband was ineffectual to devise his property to her, on account of omitting the name of their child. After her husband's death Mrs. Hare accumulated personal property, which, at the time of her death, was valued at $1,347.87, and real estate valued at $9,800, exclusive of improvements which she had placed on the property owned by her husband. She died in 1893, leaving a will in due form, which, in addition to making certain minor bequests, contains the following clauses:

"After all my just debts and funeral expenses are paid, I give and bequeath to the boy, Paul, whom I have raised, 80 acres of land described as follows, said 80 to be taken out of my lands I own in township 7 north, range 31 west, the 80 to be in one body, Paul to have choice and also the sum of one hundred dollars. . . .

"I give, devise, and bequeath to the convent of the Sisters of Mercy, at Fort Smith, known as Saint Ann's Convent, one half of all of my estate, real and personal, after deducting the legacies and bequests mentioned in this my last will and testament, for the support and maintenance of my daughter, Ella Hare, during her life, and after the death of my said daughter, Ella Hare, I give, devise, and bequeath to the said sisters of Mercy the said half of my estate, real and personal, for the purpose to educate poor Catholic children.

"I give, devise, and bequeath to the pastor of the parish of the church of the Immaculate Conception of Fort Smith, in the state of Arkansas, half of all my estate, real and personal, to be used by the said pastor for the said purposes of helping to establish a school in said parish for the education of Catholic boys and for helping to educate young men of the parish for the priesthood."

This will was construed, and its provisions sustained, in McDonald v. Shaw, 81 Ark. 235, 98 S. W. 952. "The boy Paul" referred to in the will was Paul Herring, who was an orphan reared by Mrs. Hare. After the death of Mrs. Hare the Catholic sisters took charge of Ella, and have given her all the care that loving solicitude could suggest. There is no doubt that they are attempting to carry out the provisions of Mrs. Hare's will, in spirit as well as in letter.

Under the statutes of this state (Kirby's Dig. § 8020) the will of John Hare was void as to the child, Ella, whose name was omitted therefrom. As to the child, he is deemed to have died intestate, and the title to his property passed to her as the sole heir. There is no disagreement between learned counsel in this case as to the general principles requiring election in cases of this kind. A concise statement of such principles may be found quoted from Bispham's Principles of Equity, § 295, in the opinion of this court, delivered by Mr. Justice Smith in the case of Fitzhugh v. Hubbard, 41 Ark. 64, as follows: "An election in equity is a choice which a party is compelled to make between the acceptance of a benefit under an instrument and the retention of some property, already his own, which is attempted to be disposed of in favor of a third party, by virtue of the same instrument. The doctrine rests upon the principle that a person claiming under an instrument shall not interfere, by title paramount, to prevent another part of the same instrument from having effect according to its construction. He cannot accept and reject the same instrument." The Virginia court of appeals, in Gregory v. Gates, 30 Gratt. 83, states the same doctrine in somewhat different language, as follows: "The doctrine of election may be thus stated: That he who accepts a benefit under a deed or will must adopt the whole contents of the instrument, conforming to all its provisions, and renouncing every right inconsistent with it. If, therefore, a testator has affected to dispose of property which is not his own, and has given a benefit to the person to whom that property belongs, the devisee or legatee accepting the benefit so given to him must make good the testator's attempted disposition; but if, on the contrary, he choose to enforce his proprietary rights against the testator's disposition, equity will sequester the property given to him, for the purpose of making satisfaction out of it to the person whom he has disappointed by the assertion of those rights." It is further conceded to be settled that "it is not material, in determining whether a party is put to an election, that the testator, in disposing of that person's property, was in error as to its ownership, or that the testator in fact knew that he had no title to it. In either case, if the party whose property is given away decides to take against the will, he must relinquish his legacy under the will." 2 Underhill, Wills, § 736.

The real controversy arises concerning the application of the rules of evidence,—whether parol evidence is admissible to show that Mary A. Hare by her will attempted to dispose of property which belonged to Ella Hare as sole heir of her father, John Hare. The defendants claim the right to show, by evidence dehors the will of Mary Hare, that she intended by the words in her will, "all of my estate, real and personal," to describe the property of Ella Hare; and to do so they adduced parol evidence tending to show that Mrs. Hare claimed to own the property, believed herself to be the owner, and exercised acts of ownership over it. On the other hand, learned counsel for the plaintiff insist on adherence to what they assert to be the settled rule of evidence, that "the intent of the testator to dispose of that which is not his ought to appear on the face of the will itself," and that when it appears that the testator was seised and possessed of property which in fact answered the descriptive words, "all of my estate," parol evidence should not be admitted for the purpose of showing, in order to require an election on the part of the devisee, that the testatrix believed she owned other property which in fact belonged to such devisee, and intended to devise it by her will. In other words, they insist that where the testator in the will uses merely the general descriptive terms "all of my property," it may be shown what property she owned, but that the inquiry must there stop. We think that the authorities fully sustain this contention.

This court in Fitzhugh v. Hubbard, supra, which is clearly in line with all the authorities on the subject, said: "You may show the condition of the subject-matter and the surrounding circumstances, so as to place the court in the position of the testator. But his purpose to put the devisee to his election must appear from the will itself."

In Blake v. Bunbury, 1 Ves. Jr. 523, which was a case of election under a will, it was said that "the intent of the testator to dispose of that which is not his ought to appear upon the will, with such explanation, however, of the prima facie appearance as the law admits," meaning, of course, the rule permitting evidence identifying the property called for by the descriptive terms used. In Clementson v. Gandy, 1 Keen, 309, the substance of the opinion by Lord Langdale Master of the Rolls, appears in the syllabus as follows: "Where the intention to dispose was clearly expressed on the face of the will, and parol evidence was tendered for the purpose of showing that the testatrix had mistaken the amount of the property which she was capable of bequeathing, supposing certain property in which she had only a life interest to be her own, and that a legatee under the will, who also took an interest in such supposed absolute property under a settlement made by the testatrix, ought, in order to enlarge the residuary bequest, to be put to his election, such evidence was held to be inadmissible." Lord Eldon in Doe ex dem. Oxendem v. Chichester, 4 Dow. P. C. 76, which is cited with approval in 1 Jarman on Wills, 6th ed. p. 469, said: "It must appear on the face of the will that the testator proposes that there should be an election, and as to what subjects." In Weber v. Stanley, 16 C. B. N. S. 698, the court of common pleas announced the general rule that under a general devise of "my manor house," and "all of my manor farms, lands," etc., in a certain county where there was property which fitted every particular of the description, and on which every word of the devise could have full effect, the meaning of the words could not be enlarged by extrinsic proof. The English cases are discussed at length in Jarman on Wills, at the page indicated above, and the prevailing rule shown there as contended for by counsel for plaintiff. An interesting discussion of the subject may also be found in the notes of Hare & Wallace to the case of Noys v. Mordaunt, beginning on page 510 of White & Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity (vol. 1). They state the prevailing rule, and cite numerous English cases to sustain it, as follows: "In order to raise a case of election there must appear in the will or instrument itself a clear intention, on the part of the author of it, to dispose of that which is not his own." The only English case declaring a different doctrine is Darlington v. Pulteney, 2 Ves. Jr. 544, which has been expressly disapproved by many of the greatest judges of that country.

The American cases are equally harmonious, and of the same purport. In Havens v. Sackett, 15 N. Y. 305, Chief Justice Denio gives the following statement of the law (quoting from the syllabus): "In order however, to raise a case for election under a will, a clear and decisive intention of the testator must be manifested by the will itself, to dispose unconditionally of that which did not belong to him. If his expressions will admit of being restricted to some interest in property belonging to, or disposable by, the testator, they will not be held to apply to that over which he had no disposing power." In Miller v. Springer, 70 Pa. 269, Judge Sharswood, speaking for the court, said: "A general devise of the testator's real estate has always been held to show an intention to give what strictly belongs to him, and nothing more, even if the testator had no real estate of his own upon which the devise could otherwise operate. 1 Jarman, Wills, 393. Nor can evidence dehors the will be admitted to show that the testator considered the land in question to belong to him, and intended it to pass under the will." Judge Mitchell, delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Minnesota, in Sherman v. Lewis, 44 Minn. 107, 46 N. W. 318, laid down the law on the subject as follows: "The rule is that a general bequest and devise of the testator's property will be construed as intended to extend only to such property as he could dispose of by will; also that, even where specific property is disposed of by will, in which the testator had only a partial interest, the courts will, if possible under any reasonable rule of construction, construe the language of the will as intended to apply only to the interest which the testator was able to dispose of, the presumption being that he did not intend it to apply to that over which he had no disposing power; also that, in order to raise a case for an election, the intention as manifested by the will itself must be clear and decisive. It must be clear, beyond reasonable doubt, that the testator has intentionally assumed to dispose of the property of the beneficiary, who is required on that account to give up his own gift [citing cases]. And while parol evidence is admissible, to the same extent as in other cases, in aid of the construction of written instruments,—that is, to show the condition of the subject-matter and the surrounding circumstances, so far as to place the court in the position of the testator,—yet the intent of the testator to dispose of that which was not his must appear from the words of the will itself, and cannot be proved by evidence dehors the instrument." The Virginia court of appeals in Wootton v. Redd, 12 Gratt. 196 (quoting the syllabus), said: "Though it may be possible the testator intended to give more, yet if there be a subject found to satisfy the description in the will, the court can neither enlarge nor extend it." The same court, in the case of Gregory v. Gates, 30 Gratt. 83, said: "In order to raise a case of election, there must appear in the will itself a clear intention on the part of the testator to dispose of that which is not his own." And again that court, in Penn v. Guggenheimer, 76 Va. 839, held that "generally, when the testator has an undivided interest in certain property, and he employs general words in disposing of it, as 'all my lands,' or 'all my estate,' no case of election arises from it; for it does not plainly appear that he meant to dispose of anything but what was strictly his own." Judge Story clearly announced the same doctrine as follows: "A case of election cannot ordinarily arise where property is devised in general terms, as a devise of 'all my real estate in A.,' which estate is subject to the claims of a devisee or legatee; for it is not apparent that he meant to dispose of any property but what was strictly his own, subject to that charge." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 1087. Prof. Pomeroy also reached the same conclusion. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 473, 474.

The diligence of learned counsel has not brought to light a single case directly holding the contrary view. We assume that there are none. They rely mainly upon certain general observations of Mr. Wigmore in his work on Evidence, expressing views as to the general growth of the law of evidence on this subject. But that learned author does not undertake to show that the rule announced by the various authorities hereinbefore cited is erroneous. Counsel also rely to some extent on the decision of this court in Fitzhugh v. Hubbard, 41 Ark. 64; but the doctrine announced in that case by no means reaches to the point raised in this. There the testator in general terms released the debt of a certain party to him, and it appeared that the only debt which the party had ever owed him was a note which he had previously assigned to the testator's wife, who was also a beneficiary under the will. It was held competent in that case to show these facts in order to give some effect to the language of the will; otherwise the entire bequest would have been void. In the present case the devise was for the benefit of Ella Hare, and was in the language "one half of all my estate," and the testator owned property which fitted the language. We find it nowhere announced that evidence is inadmissible to show the circumstances with which the testator was surrounded, in order to explain the language which he used, or to identify property which he intended to devise. But the description of the property cannot be entirely supplied by evidence dehors the will, where there is nothing in the language of the will itself to point out what property is meant; nor, where the language does point out the property, and some is found which answers the description, can the description be enlarged by parol testimony. We are therefore of the opinion that the parol testimony was inadmissible for the purpose of showing that Mrs. Hare intended to convey the property which Ella Hare held by inheritance from her father, and that no case was made out for an election.

It is further insisted by counsel for plaintiff that the devise of 80 acres of land to Paul Herring was a specific devise of property owned by Ella Hare, and that that called for an election. We do not deem it necessary, for the purposes of this case, to determine whether the devise to Paul Herring was sufficiently specific to indicate an intention, on the part of the testator, to devise property which belonged to Ella Hare, and which called for an election. If it be conceded that such was the case, the defendants are in no position to demand an election, because the position of Ella Hare, the claimant by inheritance from her father, is inconsistent with the rights of Paul Herring. Paul Herring is not a party to this suit, and no controversy has arisen with him. It is the duty of the court to make an election for an infant or other incompetent person only when it becomes necessary. 2 Underhill, Wills, 737. Now, if hereafter the guardian of Ella Hare should, under orders of the court, seek to recover from Paul Herring the property devised to him, then a case for election may arise as to that individual. These defendants can never inject themselves into that controversy and claim the right to require an election, because Paul Herring may have the right to demand it. If, in a controversy with Paul Herring, the necessity for an election should arise, the court could either elect for Ella Hare to conform to her mother's will so far as to leave Paul Herring undisturbed in his rights thereunder, or could elect for her to take from him the property so devised, and render compensation to him out of the property devised to Ella Hare under her mother's will. In no event can the other devisee under the will of Mrs. Hare, or the grantees of such devisee or the purchaser from Mrs. Hare's administrator, be interested in that controversy. If Mary Hare had attempted by her last will to devise to them property which was owned by Ella Hare, then they would be in position to require of Ella Hare an election whether she would abide by the will or repudiate it, but such is not the case. Since we hold that none of the property claimed by them was described in the will, what interest have they in any election made by her or for Ella Hare, or in requiring her to make an election at all? If an election should be made by or for Ella Hare, that would not involve the property in controversy which is owned by her, and is not affected by the will of her mother; for if the court in a proper proceeding should elect for her to abide by the will of her mother, she would only have to relinquish her claim to that portion of her property which is given to others under the will. That portion of her property which is not covered by the terms of the will, regardless of the source of her title, would not be affected by an election, for her claim to it is not inconsistent with the terms of the will; and she can conform to every provision of the will without relinquishing any of the property in controversy, because the testatrix did not by the terms of the will purport to devise it. The basis of the doctrine of election is that a person cannot assume two inconsistent positions,—he cannot accept and reject under the same instrument. Fitzhugh v. Hubbard, supra. It follows, therefore, that in case of an election a person can be required to give up that which is his own only to the extent that it is necessary to relieve his position of inconsistency.

The chancellor erred in declaring an election. The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to remand the case to the Circuit Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response was handed down on October 25, 1909.

Learned counsel for appellees have again argued the questions pressed upon us on the original consideration of the case, but after careful re-examination of those questions, we are convinced that we reached the correct conclusion, and the decision is adhered to. In addition to this, they ask that, instead of giving directions to remand the case to the circuit court, the chancery court be directed to retain the case for further proceedings. Appellees in their answer claim reimbursement for improvements, made on the property in controversy, and for taxes paid thereon. After the case was transferred to the chancery court, the several parties entered into the following stipulation, viz.: "It was further stipulated and agreed by the respective parties in open court that, if the court should find against the said defendants and cross plaintiffs on the issues made by their answers and cross complaints, the said respective causes should then be referred to a master to take testimony as to the mesne profits due plaintiffs, if any, from said defendants, respectively, and as to the amounts due defendants, respectively, for improvements made and taxes paid, if any, by them, or either or any of them, upon the property in controversy in said several cases." Now, aside from this stipulation, we are of the opinion that the chancery court having properly assumed jurisdiction for the purpose of considering the defense interposed by appellees, it should retain it for the purpose of completely adjudicating the rights of the parties, concerning the subject-matter of the controversy. It is proper, therefore, that the controversy as to the amount of mesne profits, if any, to be recovered by appellant, and the amount of reimbursement, if any, to be recovered by appellees, should be determined in the chancery court. We do not mean to decide, however, at this time, whether or not appellees are entitled to any reimbursement, for that question has not been presented, and was not decided below. We merely leave that matter open for further consideration in the court below.

Other matters are set up in the cross complaints of some of the appellees, viz.: the claim by some of them who purchased from the administrator of the estate of Mary A. Hare, to subrogation against the property of that estate for the amount of purchase price paid, and also the claim of the Sisters of Mercy against Ella Hare for an accounting of the amounts paid out for her benefit. But these matters we do not think are germane to this controversy, and find no proper place in this litigation. If causes of action exist, they should be made the subject of separate suits.

The judgment of this court is therefore modified so as to change the directions; and the decree of the chancery court is reversed, with directions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion, and for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith. It is so ordered.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CHARLEY TIBBS, Appt.,

v.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(— Ky. —, 128 S. W. 871.)

Evidence — dying declarations — statements as to death.

1. That at the time of making a declaration declarant stated that he did not expect to live does not render the declaration admissible in evidence as a dying declaration, if all his other conversations and acts tend to show that he did not expect to die.

Homicide — slight wound — improper treatment — liability for death.

2. Inflicting upon another a wound not calculated to endanger or destroy life, but which, because of improper treatment, does have that effect, does not render one guilty of murder.

Same — effect of somnambulism.

3. That one accused of murder is a somnambulist, and while in this state is without self-control, and commits acts of which he has no recollection, and that his offense was committed while he was in that state, constitutes no defense other than that embraced in a plea of insanity.

(June 1, 1910.)

Note. — Criminal responsibility of one who inflicts a wound on another, resulting in the latter's death, as affected by negligence or lack of skill in treatment or care of the wound.

This question is considered in a note appended to Noble v. State, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 841, attention being called to a few later decisions.

In State v. Morahan (Del.) 77 Atl. 488, a nisi prius case, the jury was instructed that if it be proved that an assault upon a person was lawful, and his death resulted from maltreatment or misconduct solely, and not from the wound, the one inflicting it should be acquitted of the charge of manslaughter.

And in McMillan v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 126 S. W. 875, where it was claimed that death was due not to a wound inflicted by the defendant, but to improper medical treatment, it was held that the court should have instructed the jury to the effect that if the death of the deceased was brought about by improper treatment or gross neg-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bell County, convicting him of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. B. Jones and J. B. Burnett for appellant.

Messrs. James Breathitt, Attorney General, and Thomas B. McGregor, for the Commonwealth:

Statements by witnesses of statements made by the deceased which were in effect dying declarations were properly admitted in evidence.

Kelly v. Com. (Ky.) 119 S. W. 810.

Deceased died from the effect of the wound inflicted by appellant, which was fatal, and which was murder.

1 Bishop, Crim. Law, 7th ed. § 639; Roberson, Ky. Crim. Law, §§ 148, 149; Bush v. Com. 78 Ky. 271; Coffman v. Com. 10 Bush, 500, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 293.

Clay C., delivered the opinion of the court:

Charley Tibbs was indicted and tried for murder. The jury found him guilty, and fixed his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for life. From the judgment of conviction, he prosecutes this appeal.

The facts in brief are as follows: Appellant was a blacksmith in the employ of the Ralston Coal Company, a corporation engaged in business near the Tennessee line. He started from that company's place of business for Tazwell, Tennessee. In going there it was necessary for him to pass through the city of Middlesborough and remain over night. Early in the evening preceding the morning when the deceased, Charlie Haynes, was wounded, appellant met deceased. Some time later they were joined by Ernest Withrow. These parties first visited one saloon, then another. They drank a quantity of beer and whisky. About 9 o'clock they proceeded to a house of ill fame kept by Julia Elliott. There they met a man by the name of T. C. Anderson. The occupants of the Elliott house were Julia Elliott and her daughters, Clody Sounders, and Fannie Bates. After remaining at this house a while, appellant and his companions went uptown. They again visited several saloons. About midnight they returned to Julia Elliott's. While in the house, Anderson let the deceased have $2. The deceased shook the money in his hands for the purpose of teasing one of the inmates. Appellant said to deceased, "Charlie, let me have that money. I will spend it with them." This the deceased declined to do, and at the same time handed the $2 back to Anderson. According to two of the witnesses present, the appellant said, addressing the deceased, "God damn you, I will settle with you before daylight," or "God damn you, I will get even with you before to-morrow." Other witnesses present claim no such remark was made by appellant. Very soon appellant and his companions were ordered to leave the Elliott house. This they did. As they were leaving, one or two of the witnesses claim that appellant drew his pistol and made the statement that he was going to shoot back into the house through the window. This is denied by other witnesses. After going out of the house, appellant lay on the ground and went to sleep. The deceased, with Anderson and Withrow, went to the next house, some 50 or 60 feet away, kept by Nellie Carroll. There they remained for quite a while. Upon leaving the Carroll house, they went to appellant for the purpose of waking him. Anderson says their object was to take appellant to the train, which left early that morning. Other witnesses claim that it was for the purpose of taking appellant into the Carroll house to be cared for. When the deceased attempted to wake appellant, and they started in the direction of the Carroll house, appellant, according to Anderson's testimony, arose from the ground and struck deceased with his fist, but immediately apologized for so doing, at the same time shaking hands with the deceased. After some further conversation and after they had walked a few steps in the direction of the Carroll house, lect of physicians, defendant would not be guilty of homicide.

In connection with this case, attention is called to the fact that in Texas this subject is controlled by a statute which is referred to in the note to Noble v. State, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 847.

But it was held in State v. Pell, 140 Iowa, 655, 119 N. W. 154, that the defendant in a homicide case could not show lack of proper attention to the deceased after his injury, and before death, in order to prove that death might have resulted from some other cause than the injury inflicted by the former, as the well-settled rule is that where death follows an injury without other independent intervening cause calculated to produce death had he not been injured by the wrongful act of the accused, proof of lack of proper treatment, which might have saved or prolonged his life, cannot be shown.

And it was held in Dumas v. State, 159 Ala. 42, 133 Am. St. Rep. 17, 49 So. 224, that where the evidence clearly disclosed that death was the result of a wound inflicted by the defendant, and that blood poisoning developed, the defendant could not justify by proving that the wound was trifling, and that the decedent was so diseased as to become readily infected with blood poisoning.

the deceased said: "It is all over, now; but you have hurt me, and hurt me bad." Appellant replied that he would hurt him still worse. At the same time he drew his knife from his pocket, and struck deceased over the eye. He struck at the deceased a second time, but missed him. Anderson, who testifies to the foregoing facts, claims that he then struck appellant with his fist and kicked him three or four times on the face and jaw, finally knocking him down and away from deceased. Appellant then arose, and Anderson chased him about 125 yards. Upon returning to the deceased, Anderson found a stranger near him. He asked deceased if that was the man who struck him. The deceased replied that it was not; that Charley Tibbs was the man who cut him. The next morning appellant was found out behind a blacksmith shop by one Andrew Jackson. The latter persuaded appellant to go into the shop and lie down on a buggy cushion. Appellant remained there until Monday morning. This witness claims that, when he aroused appellant, the latter said: "O Lordy, Andy, I expect I done something last night that will get me in trouble." The testimony for appellant is to the effect that he had absolutely no recollection of any difficulty with the deceased. He remembered taking several drinks, and that he left the Elliott house. Following that he remembered nothing until awakened by Jackson.

Shortly after the deceased was cut, which occurred about 4 o'clock on Sunday morning, he went into the house kept by Nellie Carroll. There the wound was washed and tied up with an old rag. Dr. Evans, who passed the Carroll house about 7 o'clock, was called in. He examined the wound, and did not consider it fatal. Deceased remained at the Carroll house all day and until the next morning. He then went to the station, about a half mile distant, unattended. From there he took the train to Tazwell, Tennessee. During all this time there was no one with him. After reaching his home at Tazwell, a local physician was called in, and the wound again dressed. A member of the faculty of Tennessee Medical College, of Knoxville, was sent for, and he came and operated upon deceased. According to his testimony, the skull was fractured. The deceased gradually grew worse, and died a few days later from blood poison. According to one of the physicians, who testified for appellant, the skull was not fractured.

In view of the fact that we have concluded that the judgment must be reversed for other reasons, we deem it unnecessary to determine whether or not the court erred in refusing to grant appellant a continuance. The other two errors relied upon are the admission of the dying declarations of the deceased, and the failure of the court to permit appellant to introduce evidence to the effect that the wound was not of itself dangerous,—that is, calculated to endanger or destroy life,—and that the deceased died from the effect of improper treatment. Nellie Carroll stated that deceased, after making the statement that he did not think he would get well, but expected to die, detailed the circumstances of the tragedy, and claimed that appellant was the man who cut him. Another witness corroborates this statement of Nellie Carroll. It appears, however, that the deceased kept his clothes on and wandered about the Carroll house, and also went over to the adjoining premises owned by Julia Elliott. There he said, in the presence of two witnesses: "Look what that damned son of a bitch has done. It will only be a black eye for a few days." After this conversation, he walked about for some time, and was up and down during the day, with his clothes on. The next morning he went, unassisted, to the station in Middlesborough for the purpose of taking the train to his home. After landing at old Tazwell, Tennessee, he himself called a doctor. Were the declarations of the deceased, made under these circumstances, admissible as dying declarations? It is well settled that, in prosecutions for homicide, the declarations of the deceased, voluntarily made, while sane, when in articulo mortis, and under the solemn conviction of approaching dissolution, concerning the facts and circumstances constituting the res gestæ of his destruction, are always admissible in evidence, provided the deceased would be a competent witness if living. The general principle on which this species of evidence is admitted is that they are declarations made in extremity, when the party is at the point of death, and when every hope of this world is gone, when every motive of falsehood is silenced, and the mind is induced by the most powerful considerations to speak the truth; a situation so solemn and so awful being considered by the law as creating an obligation equal to that which is imposed by a positive oath administered in a court of justice. 21 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 974-976; Walston v. Com. 16 B. Mon. 15; Kelly v. Com. (Ky.) 119 S. W. 810. Considered in the light of these principles, we conclude that the alleged dying declarations of the deceased were not made with a sense of impending dissolution. We do not attach so much importance to the fact that it was several days before he actually died, but to the fact that, aside from his statement that he did not expect to live, all his other conversations and acts go to show the contrary. The very fact that he was dressed and visited first one house and then another, that he used the expression attributed to him in the Elliott house, that he arose the next morning, and without assistance went to the train, knowing that he would have to travel several miles on the train, and then ride in a hack for a mile and a half without anyone to look after him, precludes the idea that his alleged dying declarations were made with a solemn conviction of approaching death. That being the case, we are of opinion that the court erred in permitting such declarations to go to the jury.

We also conclude that the court erred in refusing to permit appellant to show, if he could, that the wound was not calculated to endanger or destroy life, and that deceased died solely from improper treatment. The rule in this state is contained in the following language from the case of Bush v. Com. 78 Ky. 268: "As said in Com. v. Hackett, 2 Allen, 141, the rule of the common law would seem to be that if the wound was a dangerous wound,—that is, calculated to endanger or destroy life,—and death ensued therefrom, it is sufficient proof of murder or manslaughter; and that the person who inflicted it is responsible, though it may appear that the deceased might have recovered if he had taken proper care of himself, or submitted to a surgical operation, or that unskilful or improper treatment aggravated the wound and contributed to the death, or that death was immediately caused by a surgical operation rendered necessary by the condition of the wound. The principle on which this rule is founded is that everyone is held to contemplate and to be responsible for the natural consequences of his own acts. But, if the wound is not dangerous in itself, and death results from improper treatment, or from disease subsequently contracted, not superinduced by or resulting from the wound, the accused is not guilty. 1 Hale, P. C. 428; Parsons v. State, 21 Ala. 301. When the disease is a consequence of the wound, although the proximate cause of the death, the person inflicting the wound is guilty, because the death can be traced as a result naturally flowing from the wound, and coming in the natural order of things; but when there is a supervening cause, not naturally intervening by reason of the wound, and not produced by any necessity created by the wound, the death is by the visitation of Providence, and not from the act of the party inflicting the wound. In the case under consideration, the fever was not the natural consequence of the wound, nor was it produced by any necessity created by the infliction of the wound. It did not render it necessary to have the wound treated by a physician just recovering from the scarlet fever, even if it be conceded that medical treatment was necessary at all. If the death was not connected with the wound in the regular chain of causes and consequences, there ought not to be any responsibility. If a new and wholly independent instrumentality interposed and produced death, it cannot be said that the wound was the natural or proximate cause of the death. Livingston v. Com. 14 Gratt. 601." Upon the next trial of the case, the court will permit appellant to introduce evidence, if he can do so, tending to show that the wound was not calculated to endanger or destroy life, and that the death of the deceased was caused solely by improper treatment. If appellant succeeds in introducing such evidence, the court will, in addition to the instructions given on the former trial, instruct the jury that, if they believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, not in his necessary, or to him apparently necessary, self-defense, cut and wounded the deceased, but further believe from the evidence that the wound inflicted by defendant, if he did inflict it, was not calculated to endanger or destroy the life of the deceased, and that the death of the deceased resulted solely from the improper treatment of the wound, then they should find the defendant guilty of wilful and malicious cutting and wounding, if they believe that the cutting and wounding was wilfully and maliciously done, with the intent to kill the deceased, as provided by § 1166 of the Kentucky statutes (Russell's Stat. § 3184); but, if they believe that the cutting and wounding was inflicted in sudden heat and passion, without previous malice, they should find the defendant guilty of cutting and stabbing in sudden affray, as provided by § 1242, Ky. Stat. (Russell's Stat. § 3185).

The court will designate the above instruction No. 3. In lieu of instruction No. 3, as given, it will further instruct the jury that manslaughter is a lesser offense than murder, malicious wounding is a lesser offense than manslaughter, and cutting in sudden affray is a lesser offense than malicious wounding; and if the jury believe beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty as defined in No. 1, No. 2, or No. 3, but have a reasonable doubt as to the degree of the offense, they will find him guilty of the lesser offense as to which they have no reasonable doubt.

Complaint is made of the fact that the court submitted to the jury the question of appellant's insanity. Some evidence was admitted on the trial, tending to show that appellant was a somnambulist, and while in this state was without self-control, and committed acts of which he had no recollection. We fail to see how these facts would constitute any defense other than that embraced in a plea of insanity. Certainly the appellant cannot complain that he was given the benefit of such defense.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

KANSAS CITY, Respt.,
v.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAIL-ROAD COMPANY et al., Appts.

(— Mo. —, 130 S. W. 273.)

Special assessment — part of entire improvement.

Benefits to accrue from an improvement consisting as a whole of the cutting down of the grade of a street, the construction of a viaduct, and the acquisition of private prop-

Note. — May an assessment of benefits rest upon prospective action in completing improvement.

The theory upon which special assessments for public improvements are based and justified is that the property against which they are assessed derives some special benefit from the improvement. It follows, therefore, that the property can be assessed only to the extent that it is benefited by the improvement. The benefits must be substantial, certain, and capable of being realized within a reasonable time. Benefits arising from improvements which depend upon contingencies and future action of public authorities cannot be considered in estimating the assessment, though they may form part of a general plan for public improvement. The cases generally hold in accord with KANSAS CITY v. ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. Co. that only such benefits can be considered as arise from improvements which have been expressly authorized and provided for.

Thus, it is improper to assess property along a proposed street which is to be extended to a river, for benefits it may derive from the street with a bridge over the river, where the ordinance for the extension of the street made no provision for a bridge, and ordered none to be built. Hutt v. Chicago, 132 Ill. 352, 23 N. E. 1010. The court said that all the natural and probable results to flow from the improvement ordered may properly be considered, but that the future action of the city in ordering additional improvements cannot be regarded as a natural or probable consequence to flow from the improvement which is ordered. But see Dickson v. Racine, 65 Wis. 306, 27 N. W. 58, which is set out in the opinion of KANSAS CITY v. ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. Co.

And so there is no sufficient basis in em-

erty to widen a street, cannot be assessed to pay for the cutting down of the street and the acquisition of the property, where that would be of no benefit to the public without the viaduct, and no definite plan as to it has been adopted, but it is merely talked about as desirable, without any present means on the part of the municipality to build it.

(June 21, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to assess the damages and benefits incident to the proposed changing of the grade of a certain street. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dana, Cowherd, & Ingraham, Johnson & Lucas, and Samuel W. Sawyer, for appellants:

Speculation as to the assessment of benefits, and speculation as to assessment of damages, are both condemned by law.

inent domain proceedings for the introduction of evidence of benefits to accrue to the part of the land not taken, where the ordinance providing for the opening of the street across a low, wet, and marshy tract of land fails to state the nature and character of the improvement further than the mere opening of the street, and establishes no grade nor adopts any plan for further improvement, and there is nothing to bind the city to do more than to open the street. Washington Ice Co. v. Chicago, 147 Ill. 327, 37 Am. St. Rep. 222, 35 N. E. 378.

Nor was there a sufficient basis for an instruction based upon the estimate of benefits to be derived from the street by giving the landowner access to all parts of his land. Ibid. And see Swenton v. Supervisors, 95 Minn. 161, 103 N. W. 895.

These cases have been referred to with approval and followed in Waukegan v. Burnett, 234 Ill. 460, 84 N. E. 1061, where it was held that the city was without power specially to assess property to pay for land condemned for the purpose of laying sewers across private property, where it had not provided by ordinance for the construction of sewers over the land sought to be condemned. The court said that where the property cannot be benefited by the proposed improvement except subsequent work be done, for which no provision is made, such property cannot be specially assessed.

And so, property cannot be specially assessed for benefits arising from the opening of a street, where the ordinance provides only for the condemnation of the strip of land required, and makes no provision for the removal of the buildings which occupy such strip, nor for putting the surface of the land in condition to be used for a street. Chicago v. Kemp, 240 Ill. 56, 88 N. E. 284.

Valliant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding instituted by Kansas City to assess the damages and benefits incident to the changing of the grade of Twelfth street, from Broadway west to a point 270 feet west of Summit street. The proceeding arose out of the following state of facts, as we gather them from the statement of the case in the brief for the respondent:

In the western part of the city, south of the Missouri, lies a considerable tract which is called the "West Bottoms." In the Bottoms are the tracks of many railroads, freight houses, and a union station, besides many business houses of various kinds. The general lay of the land is north and south. Twelfth street runs east and west, crossing the Bottoms at or about right angles. It is one of the principal thoroughfares of the city. On the east side of the street by paving and extending the construction of certain culverts in the street cannot be confirmed, where no provision has been made by ordinance for the extension of the culverts, it appearing that the only action taken was a resolution by the town council to have the town engineer prepare plans for their extension. Lindblad v. Normal, 224 Ill. 362, 79 N. E. 675.

So it was error to refuse to instruct that the only special benefits to the property the jury may consider are those that will inure to the property assessed from the making of the improvement provided for in the ordinance, and that it is not proper for them to assume that any other improvements will be put into the street before the building of the pavement provided for by the ordinance, where the witnesses for the city who testified to the amount the property would be benefited by the proposed improvement testified on cross-examination that their estimates of the benefits were based upon the assumption that the city would make other improvements in the street in question before the paving provided for was done,—such as putting in water stubs, house drains, and sewers,—and where the court refused on motion to strike out their testimony for that reason. Holdom v. Chicago, 169 Ill. 109, 48 N. E. 164. See also Albertson v. Philadelphia, 185 Pa. 223, 39 Atl. 887.

Land which can be drained into a trunk sewer only after connecting laterals are built cannot be assessed for the cost of the trunk sewer until the laterals which will furnish connection have been determined upon, and the plan providing for such laterals has been adopted. State, Kellogg, Prosecutor, v. Elizabeth, 40 N. J. L. 274.

And no assessment based upon the prospect of a future connection of a sewer can be valid unless some provision is made which will eventually effect such connection. Title Guarantee & T. Co. v. Chicago, 162 Ill. 505, 44 N. E. 832; Re Park Ave. Sewers, 169 Pa. 433, 32 Atl. 574; Edwards v. Chicago, 140 Ill. 440, 30 N. E. 350.

In Chamberlain v. Cleveland, 34 Ohio St. 551, it appeared that the opening of a new street rendered it practicable to open another desirable and needed street for which the city had previously appropriated land, but which could not have been opened before, and which, if opened, would render the property adjacent to the new street more accessible and available for use, and it was held that the extent to which the opening of the new street contributed to creating the new condition of things, including the prospective opening of the contemplated street, was a proper subject for consideration in estimating the benefits conferred by the opening of the new street. The court said: "It was not the special benefit that might be conferred by the opening of the contemplated street that could be considered, but the fact that the opening of the new street rendered it practicable to open the contemplated street; and if this, in itself, specially benefited the adjacent property, which was a question of fact, and not of law, then, to the extent of such benefit, the boards should have been controlled by it in estimating the special benefits conferred by the opening of the new street."

Bottoms a steep bluff rises. Coming from the east on Twelfth street, the traffic ends when it comes to the bluff, except traffic by street railway, which is carried on a viaduct from that point across or over the Bottoms. The viaduct was constructed by the street railway company, and is not available or suitable for any other than street railway travel. Twelfth street, from Broadway to the point mentioned, 270 feet west of Summit street, crosses four streets, —Washington, Pennsylvania, Jefferson, and Summit. From the brow of the bluff going east the grade of Twelfth street rises, varying from 6 to 9 per cent, until Washington street is reached; then it falls to Broadway. The change in the grade of Twelfth street, required by the city ordinance, will cause a cut from 16 to 18 feet deep at Washington street, and the depth thence to the objective point will vary according to the natural grade, to bring the street on a level with Broadway. When the street is cut down to that grade, there will still be an abrupt bluff about 8 feet high. On the other side of the Bottoms, from Santa Fé street to Liberty street, a distance of three blocks, Twelfth street is only 30 feet wide, having three shallow blocks abutting it on the north. These blocks are only 30 feet deep. They separate Twelfth street from Eleventh street, which latter street is 70 feet wide. These three shallow blocks, condemned and out of the way, would, by uniting Eleventh and Twelfth streets, make a street 130 feet wide. This topographical condition has created an impediment in the way of travel to and from and across the Bottoms, which the city officials have for a long time desired to remove, and to accomplish that purpose they have (we are still drawing from the statement in respondent's brief) decided on this plan, viz.: The grade of Twelfth street is to be altered as above indicated, the three shallow blocks lying between Santa Fé and Liberty streets and Eleventh and Twelfth streets are to be condemned and taken out of the way, and a viaduct is to be constructed at the city's expense—perhaps two viaducts, one to carry the heavy, the other the lighter, traffic—across the Bottoms, from the brow of the bluff on the east to Liberty street on the west, on the grade of Twelfth street, as it will be established in this proceeding.

At the trial it was shown in evidence by the city that an ordinance had been duly passed to condemn the three blocks above mentioned, and proceedings were then pending to assess the damages and benefits incident to the condemning of the same, and that suit was pending in the same division of the circuit court as that in which this suit was being tried; and the record in 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

this case shows that this judgment was held in the breast of the court until the other case was prosecuted to judgment, the court holding that one should not go into judgment for the city until the other also so resulted. Judgment was rendered in favor of the city in both cases, appeals taken in both, and both are now before this court and submitted together. It appears from the record in both these cases that the benefit district in one is the same as in the other. But, in so far as the general plan involved the construction of the viaduct, the only evidence offered to prove it was the oral evidence of witnesses, who stated that the plan had been thoroughly discussed by the city officials, and they had decided that it should be done. There had been no plans of the viaduct drawn, no details as to its width or capacity, no specifications of material, and no determination as to when it should be built. The gap to be filled by the viaduct is over 3,000 feet in width. The evidence showed, and it was practically admitted, that unless this gap was spanned by a viaduct, neither the grading of Twelfth street, as proposed, nor the condemning of the three blocks on the west side, would reflect the least benefit on the property included in the benefit district, nor anything but damage to the property abutting Twelfth street. The evidence in behalf of the city as to the proposed viaduct was to the effect that the reason no ordinance was adopted providing for the construction of the viaduct was that it would be contrary to the city charter to pass such an ordinance until the money was in the city treasury to pay for the structure, and there was no money then available for that purpose. In the oral argument before this court it was said that a proposition to issue bonds for this purpose had been submitted to a vote of the people, and by such vote authorized; but, some question as to the validity of the vote having arisen, the issuance of the bonds was delayed, and would await the judicial settlement of that question.

The main question is: Is the city entitled to judgment in either case until there is some assurance, beyond what was shown by the oral testimony, that this viaduct, without which neither the grading of Twelfth street, as proposed in this, nor the condemning of the three blocks in the other, suit, would reflect any possible benefit on the property in the benefit district, or be of any use to the public would be constructed? So far as the grading of Twelfth street is concerned, it would result in leaving the abutting property on both sides, from Washington to Summit street, fronting on a deep cut, thus depriving the owners of the use they formerly had of that street, and leaving them dependent on such future action as the city government might see fit to take to give the necessary relief; and so far as the condemnation suit is concerned, it would take the private property without any benefit to the public of the character proposed. The learned trial judge fully appreciated the difficulty of the question, and, in colloquy between court and counsel, on objection to the introduction of evidence, stated that it devolved on the city to prove its general scheme before it could be entitled to a judgment in either case; and for that reason the court, over the objection of counsel for defendants, allowed the city to introduce in evidence in this case the ordinance on which the condemnation suit was founded, and the proceedings in that case, and also oral testimony as to the design or purpose of the officials to build the viaduct. In overruling the objection to the evidence of the ordinance and proceedings in the other suit, the court said: "I cannot see any way to try this case, except for the court to retain control of it and of the other case, but withhold a judgment in both cases until both are ready for judgment, and then let the court determine at that time whether the judgments, taken together, are reasonable or not, and protect the property owner in that way by a final judgment, having both in view, and having the question of the reasonableness of both verdicts in view at the same time." Again the court said: "I don't see how any witness can come on the stand here and give an intelligent opinion as to the benefit or damage to this property, unless he has the entire plan in his mind." And the counsel for the city said: "I don't understand the city will insist on pressing the case, and insist on the grade being made, unless the whole scheme goes through." And when counsel for defendants, cross-examining a witness on the question of benefits, asked what benefit it would be to the property in the district if the gap was left from the brow of the bluff to a point over or across the Bottoms, the court said: "I don't think you need take up time on that, Mr. Ingraham, because I have said that if this case shows that that condition is going to be there, and the information does not come to the court in some proper way that this plan is going to be carried out, I am going to dismiss this case as unreasonable."

Thus we see that the learned trial judge had a just appreciation of the merits of the case and a correct idea of the law, but on the point of obtaining information "in some proper way that this plan is going to be carried out," he admitted incompetent testimony in respect of the design to construct the viaduct, and in admitting that evidence he was probably misled by some of the language used in the opinion in the case of Kansas City v. Hyde, 196 Mo. 498, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 639, 113 Am. St. Rep. 766, 96 S. W. 201. In that case it appeared that the extension of the street as proposed in the ordinance would, if there was nothing more in the design, create a cul-de-sac, which would result in no public use or benefit, and that was one of the objections urged against the condemnation; but to meet that objection it was shown in evidence that there was another ordinance, under which there was a proceeding pending in the same court, to extend another street, to meet the proposed extension, and obviate that physical defect. It was held that the city had a right to introduce the ordinance and the court proceedings in the other case, to show the design of the ordinance and proceedings in that case, as each depended on the other, and the purpose of either could be seen only when both were considered together. The court in that case: "If the opening or extending of a particular proposed street is but a part of a general scheme, the court should know what the scheme is, in order to appreciate the value of the particular street in question. That scheme may be shown by contemporaneous ordinances, if it has been put into that record form, or it may be shown by the best evidence of which the fact is susceptible, if it has not been made a matter of record." The court would have said all that it was necessary to say in the deciding of that case if it had omitted the last clause of the last sentence. The court had before it a case in which the proof offered was an ordinance contemporaneous with the ordinance on which that proceeding was founded, and it would have been quite sufficient if he had said that that contemporaneous ordinance was competent evidence. As to what might be competent evidence in some other case, where there might be no ordinance, was not in question in that case. The purpose of the last clause in the sentence was to prevent what preceded it from being interpreted into a decision that nothing but an ordinance or court record could be received in any case that might arise. It is impossible to lay down a hard and fast rule that will justly apply to the many varying conditions that may surround a case that might possibly arise; but it is safe to say that, in a case where an ordinance is required, an ordinance ought to be shown.

The evidence introduced by the city in the case at bar to show the purpose to build the viaduct was incompetent. It did not tend to prove that the city had taken any official action in the matter, or that there was any reasonable certainty of the accomplishment of the design. On the contrary, it was shown that the city was in no condition to take action, that it had no money available for that purpose, and was for that reason forbidden by its charter to pass an ordinance undertaking the work. Not even the character of the viaduct, which was talked of and desired, was decided, and whether there would be one or two was left for future determination. The whole scheme was vague. There was no reasonable certainty about it. What the city was unable to do, what it was in fact forbidden in the then condition of its treasury to do, it had no right to assume would be done, and make the assumed fact the basis of its exercise of the high prerogative of eminent domain, to the deprivation of the citizen of his property rights. Decisions by the courts of other states are not always persuasive in a case like this, because the difference in the statute laws of the various states necessitates differences in judicial decisions. We have examined the cases cited by the learned counsel for the city; but, as we construe them, they do not sustain respondent's contention. In the Ohio case it was held that, in assessing the benefits for the street opening, the fact of another proposed street might be taken into account. Chamberlain v. Cleveland, 34 Ohio St. 551. But in that case it seems that land had already been appropriated for the other street, although the city had not taken possession of it. In Dickson v. Racine, 65 Wis. 306, 27 N. W. 58, which was a street opening case, the court held that it was not error to admit testimony tending to show that the property assessed for the benefit would be benefited by the building of a bridge, the building of which would be rendered practicable by the opening of the street. The court said: "The reason for opening the street was to make an approach to a bridge, the construction of which was contemplated by the city in the near future." It does not appear in the opinion of the court what action the city had taken in reference to the bridge, and there was no question raised as to its being constructed in the near future. The only objection was that it was not an accomplished fact. In Orth v. Milwaukee, 92 Wis. 230, 65 N. W. 1029, it was not suggested that the city had not taken all necessary steps towards the construction of the viaduct. It was treated as an assumed fact, and in fact the viaduct was completed before the trial in the circuit court, though it had not been completed when the suit was begun. In neither of those suits was there any question raised as to the city's right to condemn for the purpose shown; but there was only a question as to the amount of damages or benefits. We have been referred to no case where a condemnation suit has been sustained which was based on a contemplated public improvement that had progressed no farther than to have been talked about with approval.

We hold that, without a viaduct spanning West Bottoms from the bluff on the east to Liberty street on the west, neither the proposed grading of Twelfth street nor the condemnation of the three blocks between Santa Fé and Liberty streets and Twelfth and Eleventh streets could result in anything but damage or deprivation of private property without any public benefit; and that there is no legal showing that such viaduct will be constructed in the near future or a reasonable time. Therefore there is no foundation in law for the proceeding relating to the grading of Twelfth street or that relating to the condemnation of the three blocks mentioned.

There are other assignments of error; but, as what is above said is decisive of the case, there is no use discussing the other questions.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to dismiss the suit.

Morse v. Nixon, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 295.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant offered no evidence, but rested his case upon the proof offered by the state. The evidence tended to prove that the dog was running at large off his owner's premises, within the town of Lumber Bridge, in Robeson county, unmuzzled, and was killed by defendant by the administration of poison. There is also evidence that the defendant was the town constable, charged with enforcement of the municipal ordinances which prohibited the running at large within the town of dogs without muzzles. The ordinance provided, further, that any dog found running at large after April 24, 1909, without a muzzle, might be killed by any resident of the town; and the dog in question was killed by the defendant, the constable of the town, after that date. The ordinance also imposed a fine upon the owner of the dog.

The defendant, in apt time, by proper prayers for instruction, requested the court to charge the jury that if there was such an ordinance in force, and he killed the dog in obedience to it, he was not guilty. We think the defendant was clearly entitled to this instruction.

It is needless to consider whether a private citizen could justify under the ordinance, or whether the ordinance is too broad in providing such a general method of enforcement, for the defendant was a police officer whose duty it was to execute the lawful and valid ordinances of the town. The town of Lumber Bridge is invested with the police powers of the state conferred by the general law upon all the cities and incorporated towns of the state. Such powers are usually exercised to further and protect the comfort and safety of citizens generally. The keeping of animals of all kinds is classified as one of "the main subjects of police regulation." Horr & B. Mun. Pol. Ord. § 212. A very general police regulation found in the ordinances of municipalities in this country is one "to require dogs to be muzzled, and to authorize the police officers to kill those to be found at large and unmuzzled." Horr & B. Mun. Pol. Ord. subd. 3, § 213, and cases cited in note to page 200. In addition, the following cases are authority for the text: Faribault v. Wilson, 34 Minn. 255, 25 N. W. 449, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 544; Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 97 Am. Dec. 82, 1 Am. Rep. 94; Morey v. Brown, 42 N. H. 373; Mitchell v. Williams, 27 Ind. 62.

The word "wilful," as used within the meaning of the statute, implies something more than a mere voluntary purpose. When used in criminal statutes, the word "wilful" means not only designedly, but also with a "bad purpose." 8 Words & Phrases, p. 7,469, citing Potter v. United States, 155 U. S. 438, 39 L. ed. 214, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 144; Com. v. Kneeland, 20 Pick. 206, and other cases. A police officer who, in good faith, kills a dog under color of the authority of a municipal ordinance, can-

In McDermott v. Taft (Vt.) 75 Atl. 276, it was said that while dogs are recognized by the law as a species of property, they belong to that class of property the keeping of which may be stringently regulated by the legislature in the exercise of its police power, even to the extent of providing for their destruction, in given circumstances, without judicial proceedings, and in a most summary way.

Evidence that the presence of dogs among defendant's sheep at the time of the killing would have frightened the sheep, and caused the ewes, which were heavy with lambs at that time of the year, to lose their lambs, and that defendant knew this from experience, is admissible in a prosecution for 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

malicious mischief in shooting a dog, for the purpose of rebutting the charge of malice, wilfulness, and wantonness. Caldwell v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 164, 131 Am. St. Rep. 809, 115 S. W. 597.

A statute requiring dogs to be licensed and collared, and providing that "any person may, and every police officer and constable shall, kill or cause to be killed," dogs not so licensed and collared, "when- ever and wherever found," affords a complete defense to a person killing a hound from which the owner had removed its collar, as was his custom when hunting; and such person is not precluded from justifying under the statute by the fact that his motive in shooting the dogs was to save the life of a wild deer which dogs were attacking. McDermott v. Taft, supra. E. S. O.

not be said to do so wilfully, within the meaning of the statute upon which this indictment is founded.

We thing the rulings of the judge deprived defendant of the benefit of a valid defense.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

ELMER G. FILMORE, Plff. in Err.,
v.
METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(82 Ohio St. 208, 92 N. E. 26.)

Life insurance — recovery by beneficiary who caused death.

1. The beneficiary in a life insurance policy cannot recover thereon, where the death of the assured is caused by the intentional and felonious act of such beneficiary.

Same — pleading — murder as intentional killing.

2. In an action to recover upon a policy of life insurance, brought by the person named therein as the beneficiary, an answer by the insurance company, alleging that the plaintiff murdered the assured, states a defense; such an averment, in legal effect, being tantamount to the allegation that the killing charged was intentional and felonious.

(May 3, 1910.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Clark County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certain life insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Johnson, Jr., and C. S. Ollinger, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Martin & Martin, for defendant in error:

If the assignee or beneficiary feloniously causes the death of the assured, there can be no recovery in favor of such wrongdoer under the policy, regardless of whether there is any violation of the stipulations in the policy itself.

Crew, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, Elmer G. Filmore, as the beneficiary under a policy of life insurance issued to Emma Filmore, his wife, by defendant in error, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, brought suit against said company in the court of common pleas of Clark county, Ohio, to recover the sum of $239, with interest thereon from September 3, 1906, which sum he alleged in his petition was due him as such beneficiary under the policy of insurance so issued by said company. For answer to plaintiff's petition, the insurance company pleaded two defenses, the first of which was a general denial, and the second was in the words and figures following, to wit: "For a second cause of defense to the petition, this defendant says that on the 3d day of September, 1906, the said plaintiff murdered his said wife, Emma Filmore, in the city of Springfield, county of Clark, state of Ohio; that on the 25th day of October, 1906, he was indicted by the grand jury of said county for manslaughter on account of the killing of his said wife, and on the 31st day of December, 1906, he was convicted of of the policy, was denied in Anderson v. Life Ins. Co. 152 N. C. 1. 67 S. E. 53; and the proceeds of the policy having been paid to the administrator, with the understanding that he should hold the same to abide the determination of the action, the court, without undertaking to decide what the rights of the party would have been in the absence of such an agreement, held that the funds were properly awarded to the representative of the insured.

Note. — The right of the beneficiary in a policy of life insurance, who kills the insured, to recover on the policy, is treated in a note to McAlister v. Fair, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, on the general question of homicide as affecting devolution of property. Since that note, the right of the administrator of a beneficiary who caused or procured the death of the insured under circumstances amounting to a felony, and then committed suicide, to recover the proceeds 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

said crime, and on February 25, 1907, he was sentenced by the court of common pleas to six years' hard labor in the Ohio Penitentiary, at Columbus, Ohio, where the said plaintiff is now confined. Defendant says that, plaintiff having caused the death of the said assured, as herein set forth, he is estopped from asserting any claim as beneficiary under said policy. Defendant, having fully answered, prays to be hence dismissed, with its costs." To this defense a demurrer was interposed by the plaintiff, Elmer G. Filmore, on the ground that the facts therein stated were insufficient in law to constitute a defense. This demurrer was overruled by the court of common pleas, and the plaintiff not desiring to plead further, judgment was entered dismissing his petition. This judgment of dismissal was subsequently affirmed by the circuit court, and the plaintiff in error now asks that this judgment of affirmance be reversed by this court.

The sole question here presented is as to the legal sufficiency, against a general demurrer, of this second defense as pleaded in defendant's answer. It is conceded by counsel for plaintiff in error to be the well settled and established rule of law that a beneficiary under a policy of life insurance is without right to recover thereon, where the death of the insured has been intentionally caused by the act of such beneficiary; but it is contended in the present case that the second defense of defendant's answer is lacking in an essential allegation, and is fatally defective, because it contains no direct or sufficient averment that the killing of the assured by Elmer G. Filmore, the beneficiary under said policy, was an intentional killing. That such objection is purely technical, and in the present case wholly without merit, is apparent, we think, from a consideration of the character and legal effect of the matter pleaded and the allegations made in said second defense. One of the express averments found in this second defense is that the plaintiff, Elmer G. Filmore, murdered his wife, Emma Filmore, who was the assured in the policy of insurance upon which he was seeking to recover; and while it is true that neither the circumstances of the killing nor the constituent elements of the crime thus charged are pleaded with the particularity that would be necessary in an indictment charging the same crime, it is equally true that in an answer in a civil action such particularity of statement is not required; but it is sufficient if, in such pleading, the matter constituting the defense be stated "in ordinary and concise language." Rev. Stat. § 5066. Murder, being specifically defined by statute in Ohio, is a term or word of technical significance and determinate legal meaning. Hence the averment in an answer in a civil suit that the plaintiff therein murdered his wife is not the averment of a mere conclusion, but is the allegation of a determinate and issuable fact, which, if denied, could not be supported by proof merely of an unintentional or involuntary killing; for while in this state, under our Criminal Code, there are two degrees in the crime of murder, first and second, the purpose or intent to kill is made by statute an essential element of each, except only in the case of death caused from maliciously placing an obstruction upon a railroad track, etc. Rev. Stat. § 6809. Wherefore it follows that the allegation in the second defense of defendant's answer in this case, that the plaintiff, Elmer G. Filmore, murdered his wife, is tantamount to an allegation that he intentionally killed her; and the term "murder," employed therein by the pleader to designate and define the plaintiff's act, itself necessarily imports that such killing was unlawful and felonious. And as said by Mr. Justice Field in New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 600, 29 L. ed. 1000, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877: "It would be a reproach to the jurisprudence of the country if one could recover insurance money payable on the death of a party whose life he had feloniously taken. As well might he recover insurance money upon a building that he had wilfully fired."

In the case of Schreiner v. High Court, C. O. F. 35 Ill. App. 576, cited and relied upon by counsel for plaintiff in error as supporting their contention in the present case, the court also clearly recognizes the principle, applicable to all contracts of insurance, that the insured or beneficiary cannot, under such contract, receive indemnity for a loss that he himself has intentionally brought about; the second paragraph of the syllabus in that case being as follows: "There can be no recovery in an action founded upon intentional wrong. The beneficiary in an insurance policy cannot recover, where the death of assured has been intentionally caused by his act."

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, we are of opinion that in the case at bar the allegation of defendant's second defense, that the plaintiff murdered his wife, should be construed as pleading an intentional killing, and, therefore, as sufficient against a general demurrer. The view we have taken as to the legal effect of this averment renders unnecessary a consideration of the other averments of said second defense.

Judgment affirmed.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for the death of her husband, caused by the electric wires of the defendant. The deceased was employed by a house mover. His principal business was driving a team to convey things needed in the business; but when not so engaged, it was his duty to assist in any way in the business, and he was accustomed to handling electric wires strung on the streets when it became necessary in moving buildings under them. In accordance with the requirements of the ordinances of the city of Wichita, the house mover, before moving the building on the streets, procured a permit therefor from the city clerk. The house mover had given notice to defendant of his intention to move the building upon which the accident occurred, on the day before he started to move it, and the employees of the defendant company had arranged to remove the wires near the building at the place from which it was to be removed. This was to be done on the morning of the removal, and the defendant's workmen remained in the neighborhood subject to call, if they were further needed. The building was moved 350 or 400 feet, to the intersection of Murdock and St. Francis streets, where the wires of the defendant company crossed the street, suspended about 18 or 20 feet from the ground. The comb of the roof of the building was higher than the wires. The wires were raised by the house mover, or some employee, and the building was passed thereunder the greater part of its length, when it was stopped. The mover did not call upon the company's men to handle the wires, but testified that he intended to attend to them himself. He was detained, however, in talking to a man who sought to engage his services, and the deceased, being then unoccupied, went up a ladder, evidently to attend to the wires. In ascending the sloping roof, he slipped, and either fell across or grabbed the wires, and was immediately killed by the shock. The wires were charged to a voltage of 2,300. The contact of a person simultaneously with two wires so charged caused a "short circuit" of the current through the body, and is extremely dangerous to life, if not certainly fatal. It appears that only two witnesses were called who saw the deceased at the time the accident occurred, and each testified that the deceased slipped, or became overbalanced, on the side of the sloping roof, and one says that he in falling seemed to grab for something, for anything he could reach, and came in contact with the wires, and he saw the flash of electricity. The other testified to about the same circumstances, except she says he appeared to fall upon the wires, and she saw the flash. Others testified that they saw the wounds upon the body, that he was burned upon the right side through his clothing, and to or almost to his intestines. His death appears to have been instantaneous. When he was found he was lying across the wires, or his arm thrown over them. One witness says that a wire burned in two. In the trial to a jury, the plaintiff recovered a judgment and verdict for $5,000.

The defendant makes three assignments of error: (1) That the court erred in not sustaining defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence; (2) that the court erred in not instructing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant at the close of the evidence; and (3) that the court erred in instructing the jury that the defendant owed the deceased a positive duty to have its wires in a condition safe for interference therewith by the deceased. After setting forth the respective claims of the parties in their pleadings, and defining the meaning of negligence and contributory negligence, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the court instructed the jury as to negligence as follows:

"You are further instructed that in maintaining its electric wires and carrying on its business in and along the streets of the city of Wichita, Kansas, it was the duty of the defendant to exercise to care proportionate to the risk of its business, to the end that damage might not result therefrom to others.

"You are further instructed that the degree of care required varies according to the circumstances of the particular case; and if the use of electricity by the defendant in the prosecution of its business at the times in question is shown by the evidence to be a highly dangerous agency to life, unless exercised with great care, then, to such extent, a high degree of care in its supervision, management and use was required of the defendant at places where people had a right to go and had been in the habit of going, and would likely continue to go for work or business.

"You are further instructed that if under all the facts and circumstances in this case you find that the defendant knew, or had sufficient and reasonable grounds to anticipate, that persons might, while in the exercise of ordinary care for their own safety, come in contact with and be injured by any defective and dangerous wires it might operate and maintain at said place, and if you further find that the said Walter Winegarner without carelessness on his part, and while rightfully and lawfully engaged in moving or assisting to move a house under said wires at said place, came in contact with said wires, and was, without his fault, then and there injured and killed by electricity escaping from said wires at the point of said contact, through the dangerous condition and defective insulation of said wires and the carelessness of the defendant as set out in the petition, and that said wires were at said time and place charged with a powerful current of electricity, and that they were not properly insulated, and were unsafe and dangerous to the lives of persons who might come in contact with them, and that the defendant and its agents and employees knowingly maintained and operated said wires in said condition at said time and place, in the manner and under the circumstances charged in the petition; and if you further find that the defendant was negligent in so maintaining and operating said wires at said time and place in said condition as charged, and that said negligence was the direct, proximate, and natural cause of said injury and death resulting to said Walter Winegarner as charged,—then the defendant would be liable to the plaintiff for the damages so caused plaintiff by said death, unless you should further find that the act or acts of the said Walter Winegarner himself contributed to his own injury and death; but if the said deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in the premises, and thereby contributed to his own injury and death, then the plaintiff cannot recover herein.

"You are further instructed that if a negligent act or omission of a party is such that a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence should have foreseen that an accident and injury were liable to be produced thereby, then such negligent act or omission may be said to be the proximate cause of such accident and resulting injury.

"Negligent acts cannot be the proximate cause of an injury to one, unless, under all the circumstances, ordinary prudence would have admonished the person sought to be charged with the negligence that his acts or omissions would result in injury to someone; and in order to warrant your finding that any of the alleged acts or omissions of the defendant constituted the proximate cause of the injury and resulting death to the said Walter Winegarner, it must appear from the preponderance of the evidence that such injury and death were the natural and probable consequence of such negligence or omission, and that it ought to have been foreseen by defendant in the light of all the attending circumstances."

The court also instructed the jury that if the injury occurred through the contributory negligence of the deceased, the plaintiff could not recover.

The defendant urges his assignments of error for the following reasons: "(a) The deceased was but a bare licensee; the defendant owed him no duty to have its wires in a condition safe for him to handle. (b) Deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. (c) Even though it be conceded that defendant owed deceased some duty other than that owed to a bare licensee, it discharged its full duty, as shown by plaintiff's evidence."

It is true that the house mover by ordinance of the city was required to get a permit from the city clerk before removing the building on the streets. On the other hand, by the statutes of the state, and by ordinance of the city, the defendant company was required to have the grant of a franchise and permission to set poles, etc., before engaging in the business of conducting electricity, and its business was subject to regulation by the city, so that the company was also, in this sense, a licensee. The use of the streets, either for moving buildings, or for sustaining the poles and wires of electric light and power companies, cannot be said to be the ordinary use of the streets. As to the city, the house mover and the company were alike licensees, except that the house mover had to have a license for each particular moving, while the license to the company was for a certain time. It can hardly be said that the deceased was a licensee as to the defendant, or vice versa.

There is evidence that the company had notice of the moving of this building. Whether it had notice of its passing the particular point where the accident occurred, or not, is not shown, but there is evidence tending to show that the moving of buildings was of so frequent occurrence that the defendant must have taken notice of such use of the streets.

It is contended on the part of the plaintiff that it was the duty of the company to have its wires crossing streets so insulated as not to be dangerous to persons who are liable to come in contact therewith, and that the wires should be so insulated at street crossings where persons engaged in moving buildings are liable to come in contact with the wires.

There was evidence that the wires which caused the death of deceased carried a current of 2,300 voltage; also, that no insulation is efficient to save the life of a person who comes in contact with a wire carrying such a current. On the other hand, there is evidence that a proper insulation would prevent injury to a person coming in contact with a wire having such voltage. The plaintiff insists that it was impossible for the deceased, even if he voluntarily came in contact with the wires, to know anything of the strength of the voltage; and, on the other hand, it is insisted that the deceased should have known of the danger of coming in contact with the wires, and that he was guilty of contributory negligence in so doing. It is a matter of common knowledge that wires carrying only a light voltage, like, for instance, a telephone wire, are not liable to produce any injury by contact, and that wires carrying a high voltage, as shown in this case, are extremely dangerous in case of contact.

The court submitted to the determination of the jury, as a question of fact, whether under all the evidence in the case the defendant was guilty of negligence, and whether the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, and by its instructions told them that if, under all the facts of the case, persons were liable to come in contact with these wires, at the high voltage shown by the evidence, the defendant was under obligation to have the wires insulated so that injury would not result therefrom. If, on the other hand, the deceased knew of their dangerous character, and, so knowing, purposely came in contact with the wires, he was guilty of contributory negligence. We think the instructions of the court to the jury were in accordance with the principles laid down in numerous cases cited with approval in Metropolitan Street R. Co. v. Gilbert, 70 Kan. 261, 78 Pac. 807, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 256. In the latter case, the following citation was made with approval from Fitzgerald v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 200 Pa. 540, 86 Am. St. Rep. 732, 50 Atl. 161: "Wires charged with an electric current may be harmless, or they may be in the highest degree dangerous. The difference in this respect is not apparent to ordinary observation, and the public therefore, while presumed to know that danger may be present, are not bound to know its degree in any particular case. The company, however, which uses such a dangerous agent, is bound not only to know the extent of the danger, but to use the very highest degree of care practicable to avoid injury to everyone who may be lawfully in proximity to its wires, and liable to come, accidentally or otherwise, in contact with them."

If, from all the circumstances, the defendant had reason to apprehend that the building would be moved under the wires where the accident occurred, it was its duty, knowing its wires to be highly charged with electricity, to have such wires at the street crossing insulated, or to take such other precautions as might be necessary to protect anyone who might be liable to be upon such building from contact or injury from such wires.

The case was submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and we think that the jury were amply justified by the evidence in finding that the defendant was guilty of negligence which caused the death of the deceased, and that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Statute of frauds — sale of realty — action by nonsigning vendor.

Under a statute providing that no action shall be brought to charge any person upon any contract for the sale of real estate unless the promise be in writing and signed by the person to be charged, a vendor who has not signed a contract cannot maintain an action to charge the vendee thereon, although the latter has expressed his assent in writing sufficiently to satisfy the statute.

(April 27, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Calloway County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of an alleged contract to purchase certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Coleman & Linn and Rainey T. Wells, for appellant.

Messrs. Speight & Dean, for appellee.

If a contract made by a municipal corporation is not in violation of its charter nor of any statute, and the corporation, by its promise, has induced a party relying on the promise, and in execution of the contract, to expend money and perform his part thereof, the corporation is liable on the contract.

Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 341, 24 L. ed. 659.

The contract cannot be avoided because within the statute of frauds.

57, 44 L.R.A. 790, 43 Atl. 593, 1042; Covington v. Ludlow, 1 Met. (Ky.) 298.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Pursuant to an ordinance regularly passed, an election was held on November 6, 1906, in the city of Murray, by which the sense of the qualified voters was taken as to whether the council should issue and sell bonds of the city to the amount of $19,500 for the purpose of purchasing, installing, and maintaining a system of electric lights and waterworks in the city. The requisite majority voted in favor of the proposition. C. N. Crawford and J. J. Moore owned an electric light plant in the city, which they were operating in connection with their flour mill; that is, the same engine ran both, the electric light plant being in a brick building adjoining the mill house. On May 6, 1906, before the bonds had been issued or sold, the council appointed a committee of three "to make investigation into the possibility of buying the Murray electric light plant," and to report at the next meeting. On May 10th the committee was continued, with further instructions to buy the plant at a price not exceeding $8,000. The committee had several conferences with Crawford, the result of which was a verbal agreement between the committee and Crawford, after consultation with his partner, by which the committee agreed to buy the electric light plant property for $8,000, and Crawford and Moore were to move their who seeks to enforce the same, the question whether the action or suit will lie would seem to be readily susceptible of answer by deduction from judicial constructions of the phrase, "party to be charged," employed in the 4th section of the original English statute of frauds and perjuries (stat. 29 Car. II.), or "parties to be charged," employed in the 17th section of that statute, if these phrases have been preserved in the particular jurisdiction in which the question arises; or directly from the terms of the statutes in those jurisdictions in which the statute expressly requires the contract, or note or memorandum thereof, to be signed by the "party assigning, granting, or surrendering" the estate or interest in the land; by the "lessor or grantor;" or by the person by whom the sale or lease is to be made.

Since, however, the same state of facts in respect of the party who signed and the party who seeks to enforce the contract may be presented in a jurisdiction in which the statutory phrase, "party to be charged," or "parties to be charged," is construed to mean the party or parties sought to be charged in the particular action or suit, irrespective of whether they are the vendors or vendees, or in a jurisdiction where the view prevails that these phrases relate to the vendor or owner of the property, as such, irrespective of whether the contract is sought to be enforced by or against him, or in a jurisdiction in which the statute in terms requires the contract, or note or memorandum thereof, to be signed by the vendor or owner or person granting the interest, there is some apparent conflict—which, for the most part, disappears when these differences are attended to—as to the right to maintain the action or suit upon a given state of facts in these respects. That is, if actual results alone be regarded, there is an apparent conflict among the cases from different jurisdictions as to the right of a vendor who has not signed to enforce the contract against the vendee who has signed, or as to the right of the vendor who has signed to enforce the contract against the vendee who has not. For these reasons, it is thought that it may be of service to present the subject from two points of view; considering first the general question of statutory construction, and, in that connection, the objection of lack of mutuality frequently urged against the enforcement of the contract at the instance of the party who did not sign, against the party who did; and then collating the cases with a view of showing the state of authorities as to the right to maintain the action or suit under each variation in respect of the form of remedy, and of the party who signs and the party who seeks to enforce the contract, and under the varying provisions and judicial interpretations of the statutes.

It is assumed for the purposes of this note that the particular contract in question was within the statute of frauds, and that there had been no part performance or other acts to take it out of the statute; and it is further assumed that the writing relied upon to satisfy the statute was in all respects, other than the mere matter of signing, sufficient to satisfy the statute.

The note does not cover the point whether the grantee in a deed poll or the lessee in a lease of real property is bound by the covenants therein.

The note is also limited in the main to cases in which the action or suit was planted upon an executory contract with relation to real or personal property, and does not purport to cover the question whether the statute of frauds is available as a defense to an action on a note or other money obligation given for the purchase price of real or personal property.

For convenience, the signing of the note or memorandum is treated as equivalent to the signing of the contract itself; and the signing by an agent as a signing by the principal.

I. Not necessary that both parties sign.

Neither the purpose of the original English statute of frauds and perjuries, as declared in its preamble, nor the language in which the provisions of the 4th and 17th sections are framed, is of itself suggestive of any intention to require the contract to mill off the lot. The committee all say that they told Crawford that they had no money to buy with unless they sold the bonds, and that the arrangement was dependent upon the sale of the bonds. Crawford insists that it was a positive agreement and without condition. No writings of any kind were drawn or signed.

The committee, on June 7th, made this report to the council:

To the City Council of Murray, Ky.:

We, your committee on purchase of light plant, beg to make the following report: We purchased the machinery, and all wire and poles, including buildings and grounds, well, and right to use railroad track, and franchise to operate, for the price of $8,000, to have possession on demand.

Respy,

E. A. Hughes,

J. B. Hay, Committee

After spreading the report of the committee on its record, the council entered the following minute: "Which report was received, adopted, and trade ratified by all members present, being a quorum, and the committee discharged." It will be observed that the report closes with the words "to have possession on demand." The committee and the members of the council say that these words were put there because they had not sold the bonds and did not know whether they could sell them, and the city would not need the property unless it could sell the bonds. After this, Crawford and Moore moved their mill off the lot at an expense of something like $1,600, and lost the use of the mill during the time. The city was unable to sell the bonds, and refused to take the property. Thereupon Crawford and Moore brought this suit against the city to recover damages for the breach of the contract.

In the circuit court there was evidence on behalf of the city that Crawford and Moore applied to the city authorities to know whether they must move their mill, and the city authorities told them they could not be signed by both parties, i. e., by both vendor and vendee. That, at least, is true of the 4th section, which, it will be observed, employs the term "party," not "parties." And, as subsequently shown, the courts have very generally repudiated any distinction based on this variation in the language of the two provisions.

The doubt as to whether either party could enforce the contract unless signed by both was engendered neither by the purpose of the statute nor by the language in which the provisions were framed, but by the consideration that if the party who did not sign the contract, and was therefore not bound, was permitted to enforce the contract against the party who did sign, the fundamental principle that requires mutuality of obligation and remedy would be violated.

Cases reported very shortly after the adoption of the statute reflect the doubt arising from this source, though, in the earliest cases, the objection of lack of mutuality was not regarded as sufficient to prevent the enforcement of the contract, even in a court of equity, at the instance of the party who did not sign, against the party who did.

The report of Hatton v. Gray, 2 Ch. Cas. 164 (decided in 1684, which was but eight years after the adoption of the statute), is very brief. It is merely stated that Hatton sold houses to Gray, that a note was made of the agreement, signed by Gray, but not by Hatton. That statement is followed by what appears to be an argument of counsel for Gray that "the note binds not him who signed it not, for the statute of frauds and perjuries, etc.; and, therefore, in equity cannot bind the other party, for both must be bound, or neither of them in equity." The report concludes, "but decreed contrary."

by the purchaser, against the vendor, for the specific performance of an agreement to convey real property), said: "Many cases have occurred where agreements for lands, appearing in writing under the hand of the party who was to be bound by it (which are the words of the statute of frauds), notwithstanding there was no writing of the other part, have been carried into execution; and I have known the objection often taken of its not appearing, on the side of the purchaser, and as often overruled. But it may be taken as an ingredient to add weight to other objections." Specific performance was granted in this instance, at the instance of the purchaser, who had not signed.

In 1802, however, Lord Redesdale, in a dictum in Lawrenson v. Butler, 1 Sch. & Lef. 13, expressed his opinion that a court of equity, at least, ought not to enforce a contract in relation to real property at the instance of the party who did not sign, against the party who did. He said in this connection: "In the case of Hatton v. Gray, supra, it was considered as sufficient that the agreement should be signed by the party against whom the performance was sought, because such are the words of the statute of frauds. Now such, certainly, is the import, that no agreement shall be enforced but when it is signed by the party to be charged; but the statute does not say that every agreement so signed shall be enforced; the statute is in the negative. To give it this construction would, as I have heard it urged, make the statute really a statute of frauds, for it would enable any person who had procured another to sign an agreement to make it depend on his own will and pleasure whether it should be an agreement or not." Again, as to the necessity of mutuality as a condition of specific performance, Lord Redesdale remarked: "I confess I tell until they found a purchaser for the bonds, and that Crawford and Moore went on and moved the mill on their own judgment. There was no direction from the council for them to move the mill, and the functions of the committee were ended when they were discharged, so that the rights of the parties must depend on whether there was an enforceable contract by the council to buy the mill when the council adopted and ratified, on June 14th, the trade made by the committee. In the circuit court there was a verdict and judgment in favor of Crawford and Moore in the sum of $2,500. The city appeals.

The contract, as shown by the record, was one for the purchase of the lot, buildings, and electric light plant for the lump sum of $8,000. The whole arrangement between Crawford and the committee was verbal. Crawford and Moore signed no writings of any kind until they signed the deed which they tendered with their petition in this case. They were the vendors of the property. The title was in them. The city was the proposed purchaser. The question we have is: Was the contract taken out of the statute of frauds by the written report signed by the committee and the adoption and ratification of that report by the council? The statute of frauds, among other things, provides: "No action shall be brought to charge any person . . . upon any contract for the sale of real estate, . . . unless the promise, contract, . . . or some memorandum or note thereof be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his authorized agent; but the consideration need not be expressed in the writing. . . ." Ky. Stat. § 470 (Russell's Stat. § 1775).

The question we have before us is: Who is "the party to be charged therewith," under this statute? May the vendor, who has signed no writing, sue the vendee upon tendering a deed, and recover damages for a breach of the contract, where the vendee has made a memorandum in writing of the contract? It is clear here that, if Crawford and Moore had refused to make the deed have no conception that a court of equity ought to decree a specific performance in a case where nothing has been done in pursuance of the agreement, except where both parties had by the agreement a right to compel a specific performance according to the advantage which it might be supposed that they were to derive from it; because otherwise it would follow that the court would decree a specific performance where the party called upon to perform might be in this situation, that if the agreement was disadvantageous to him, he would be liable to the performance, and yet, if advantageous to him, he could not compel a performance. This is not equity, as it seems to me."

As was said by Chancellor Kent in Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 485: "The intrinsic force of this argument, the boldness with which it was applied, and the commanding weight of the very respectable character who used it, caused the courts for a time to pause . . . but the courts have, on further consideration, resumed their former track."

In Huddleston v. Briscoe, 11 Ves. Jr. 583, Lord Eldon, in passing, called attention to the doubt expressed by Lord Redesdale, whether the court could grant specific performance of a contract signed by one party only, but was not called upon to express an individual opinion, as the contract in that case was signed by both parties.

In Flight v. Bolland, 4 Russ. Ch. 298, the court, while denying the right of an infant to maintain a suit for specific performance of a contract, on the ground of lack of mutuality, said that it was settled, although seriously questioned by Lord Redesdale, that plaintiff may obtain a decree for specific performance of a contract signed by defendant, although not signed by plaintiff.

And Lord Redesdale's dictum was also reputed by other early English and Irish cases. Ormond v. Anderson, 2 Ball & B. 263; Thornton v. Kempster, 5 Taunt. 786; Allen v. Bennett, 3 Taunt. 169; Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. Jr. 275; Field v. Boland, 1 Drury & Walsh, 37.

The entire repudiation in England of Lord Redesdale's dictum, and the return to the earlier view, is also shown by the later English cases cited throughout the note, all of which either assume or expressly hold that it is not indispensable that the contract be signed by both parties.

A number of eminent jurists in this country have expressed their personal concurrence in the argument and position of Lord Redesdale on this point.

Chancellor Kent, while constrained by the weight of authority to declare a contrary rule, expressed his own individual concurrence in Lord Redesdale's position, remarking in Clason v. Bailey, supra: "I have thought, and have often intimated, that the weight of argument was in favor of the construction that the agreement concerning lands, to be enforced in equity, should be mutually binding, and that the one party ought not to be at liberty to enforce at his pleasure an agreement which the other was not entitled to claim."

So, Chief Justice Gibson, in Wilson v. Clarke, 1 Watts & S. 554, took occasion to express his approval of Lord Redesdale's dictum and of the individual opinion expressed by Chancellor Kent in Clason v. Bailey, supra, though the entire dissimilarity of the Pennsylvania statute rendered an expression on this point unnecessary.

The weight ordinarily attached to the opinions of Kent and Gibson has been insufficient to induce the courts of this country to accept Lord Redesdale's dictum. On the contrary, while individual judges still oc-upon the city's tendering to them $8,000, they could have relied upon the statute, and said: "We have made no written contract for the sale of this land." If the contract is within the statute, then damages cannot be recovered for its breach; for to allow damages for the breach of a contract is only in another form to enforce it. It is true the courts will not allow a party to a contract to refuse to carry it out because it is within the statute of frauds, and retain the benefits which he has received under it. But the city here has received no benefits, and if the contract alleged is within the statute of frauds and unenforceable, no action, by the terms of the statute, "shall be brought to charge" the city thereon. So the question is: Is the contract void under the statute, because not in writing and signed by Moore and Crawford?

In M'Dowel v. Delap, 2 A. K. Marsh. 33, the plaintiff brought a suit to recover the price of an interest in land which he averred he had sold the defendant, and proved by parol testimony the agreement on his part, but produced no written evidence to that effect. Holding that there could be no recovery, the court said: "Now, it is obvious that, according to the provisions of the statute against frauds and perjuries, a verbal agreement on the part of the plaintiff to transfer his interest in the salt well to the defendant was not obligatory. Such an agreement was, consequently, not a sufficient or valid consideration for the promise on the part of the defendant. . . . In casually concede the force of the argument based on lack of mutuality, the rule that under a statute requiring the contract, or note or memorandum thereof, to be signed by the "party to be charged" or the "parties to be charged," is not indispensable, either for the purposes of a suit in equity or an action at law, that both parties should sign, is sustained by the overwhelming weight of authority in this country as well as in England. As subsequently shown, however, the objection of lack of mutuality has, in individual cases, in connection with other objections, prevailed to the extent of inducing courts of equity to exercise their discretion by refusing the particular relief of specific performance. And in Kentucky and Tennessee, as subsequently shown, this objection has been persuasive in inducing the courts to construe the phrase, "party to be charged," to mean the vendor or owner of the property, as such, irrespective of whether the contract is sought to be enforced by or against him.

The subject was thoroughly discussed by the New York court of appeals in Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 494, 1 Am. Rep. 576, and the conclusion there reached, in harmony with the almost unbroken current of authority since that time that neither the phrase, "party to be charged," employed in the 4th section of the original statute (which had in fact been superseded in New York by a new statutory form), nor the phrase, "parties to be charged," employed in the 17th section of the original statute (which was still preserved by the New York statute in relation to the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise), requires the contract to be signed by both parties; that the objection of lack of mutuality, arising in that view of the statute, is not sufficient to prevent the enforcement of the contract by the party who did not sign, against the party who did. That was an action at law by the purchaser, to recover damages from the defendants for the nonperformance of their promise, contained in a memorandum or instrument in writing signed by them, but not by the plaintiff, to deliver certain chattels. But the argument by which the court met and disposed of the objection of lack of mutuality is generally accepted and adopted by courts of equity as well as courts of law, and regarded as applicable to contracts in relation to real property, as well as those in relation to chattels. The argument, which follows that employed by the English cases, is, in effect, this: The statute of frauds does not define nor prescribe what shall be necessary to constitute a contract. Upon the other hand, it presupposes the existence of an agreement having all the requisites at common law to constitute a complete and mutually binding contract, supported by a mutual consideration; and the fact that, because of the intervention of the statute of frauds, the party who does not sign or subscribe may not be liable thereon in an action by the other party, does not destroy or annul the consideration, since the inability of the party who did sign, to enforce the contract against the party who did not sign, results simply from his failure to take the precautionary means required by law to charge the other party.

Some courts add that the contract becomes mutual in fact as well as theory as soon as the party who did not sign brings his action to enforce the contract.

The point is well expressed by the court in Fenly v. Stewart, 5 Sandf. 101, as follows: "This construction has proceeded not on the ground that contracts need not be mutual, but that the statute in certain enumerated cases has taken away the power of enforcing contracts which would otherwise be mutually binding unless the parties against whom they are sought to be enforced have subscribed some note or memorandum thereof in writing. If a mutual contract is made, and one of the parties to it gives the other a memorandum, in pursuance of the statute, but neglects to take from that other a corresponding memorandum, he has but himself to blame if he is unable to compel its performance, while he is bound to the other party. The difficulty is not that the contract, as originally entered into, is not mutual, but that one of the parties has not the evidence which the statute has made indispensable to its enforcement."

order to support the count, it was certainly necessary to produce in evidence some memorandum in writing of the agreement, signed by the plaintiff or someone duly authorized by him." In Thomas v. Harrodsburg, 3 A. K. Marsh. 298, 13 Am. Dec. 165, the trustees of Harrodsburg brought a suit on a bond given for the price of certain lots of ground purchased of them. The defendant pleaded that the trustees had not signed or made any written contract of sale. In the replication they pleaded that a record of a sale of the lots was made in the books of the trustees. Disposing of the case on these facts, the court said: "The only matter of avoidance alleged in the replication is that of the lots having been sold at public auction, and an entry and record thereof made in the books of the trustees; but that matter, certainly, does not take the sale out of the statute against frauds and perjuries. The statute contains no exception of sales at auction, and the entry in the books of the trustees, unless signed by the trustees, or some person authorized by them, is not a compliance with the requisitions of the statute; and the replication contains no averment of the entry having been so signed. From both replication and plea, therefore, the sale must be admitted to be within the statute; and, as the bond is alleged to have been given for the price of the purchase made at that sale, the plea, under the statute authorizing the consideration of sealed writings to be gone into and impeached, contains a good and valid de-

The case of Justice v. Lang came before the court of appeals on a second appeal, following a new trial (52 N. Y. 323); and on that occasion Allen, J., who wrote for the court, while disclaiming any intention to modify the decision on the first appeal, that the signing of the contract by the defendant was sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds, intimated that he was inclined to question the correctness of that decision on principle. The decision on this appeal, however, reversing the judgment for the plaintiff, was not upon the ground that the plaintiff did not sign the contract, but that the question whether he assented to the contract at all as a contract binding on him should have been submitted to the jury. The intimation in this opinion, especially in view of subsequent cases in New York, cannot be regarded as impairing the weight of the decision on the first appeal on this point.

Nor may similar intimations in Cammeyer v. United German Lutheran Churches, 2 Sandf. Ch. 187, Davis v. Shields, 26 Wend. 341, Dykers v. Townsend, 24 N. Y. 57, and Brabin v. Hyde, 32 N. Y. 519, be regarded as any longer throwing doubt upon the point.

With the exception of a few cases, presently referred to, practically all the cases hereafter cited in this note expressly hold, or tacitly assume, that it is not necessary that the contract, or note or memorandum, be signed by both parties. This has also been recognized in the following cases, which do not purport to be exhaustive, decided under the statute requiring a contract not to be performed within one year to be signed by the party to be charged: Smith v. Neale, 2 C. B. N. S. 67; Reuss v. Picksley, 4 Hurlst. & C. 588; Gaunt v. Hill, 1 Starkie, N. P. 10; Raphael v. Hartman, 87 Ill. App. 634; First Presby. Church v. Swanson, 100 Ill. App. 39; Smith v. Theobald, 86 Ky. 141, 5 S. W. 394; Himrod Furnace Co. v. Cleveland & M. R. Co. 22 Ohio St. 451; Kearby v. Hopkins, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 166, 36 S. W. 506.

In Wilkinson v. Heavenrich, 58 Mich. 574, 55 Am. Rep. 708, 26 N. W. 139, however, the court took the contrary view, and, while 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

recognizing the conflict of authority on the point, held that under a statute requiring a contract not to be performed within a year to be signed by the "party to be charged," both parties must sign.

And to the same effect are Co-Operative Teleph. Co. v. Kadus, 140 Mich. 367, 112 Am. St. Rep. 414, 103 N. W. 814, and Adams v. Harrington Hotel Co. 154 Mich. 198, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 919, 117 N. W. 551, and upon the authority of the Wilkinson Case it was held in McIlroy v. Richards, 148 Mich. 694, 112 N. W. 489, that a contract signed by defendant, not to be performed within a year, whereby he agreed to purchase certain stock in a corporation, could not be enforced against him, as the plaintiff had not signed.

The case of Corbitt v. Salem Gaslight Co. 6 Or. 405, 25 Am. Rep. 541, has sometimes been referred to as though it held that to satisfy the requirement of the statute that the contract be signed by the "parties to be charged," both parties must sign. It is doubtful, however, whether the case was not decided upon the ground that there was no sufficient allegation of acceptance, written or otherwise, by the plaintiff.

In Halsell v. Renfrow, 202 U. S. 287, 50 L. ed. 1032, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 610, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 189, the United States Supreme Court said that the Oklahoma statute providing that no contract relating to real estate, other than for a lease for not over one year, "shall be valid unless reduced to writing and subscribed by the parties thereto," if taken literally and naturally, goes further than its English prototype. "It is not satisfied by a memorandum made with a different intent, but requires an instrument drawn for the purpose of embodying the contract, and in the case of an agreement to buy and sell, the subscription of both the buyer and seller, not merely that of 'the party to be charged therewith.'" The court, however, was evidently not expressing its own independent opinion as to the proper construction of the statute, but merely the view taken by the Oklahoma courts, citing in that connection the case of McCormick v. Bonfils, 9 Okla. 618, 60 Pac. 296. The opinion in that case

fense to the action of the trustees. No action at law or bill in equity can be maintained by either Bush or the representatives of Thomas on the sale; and it is a settled rule of the common law that a promise on which no action can be sustained forms no sufficient consideration for any other promise." It will be observed that in this case the purchaser had executed a bond for the price of the lots, and yet the bond was held unenforceable because the vendor had signed no written memorial of the sale.

The question came up again in Murray v. Pate, 6 Dana, 335. In that case Pate made a verbal agreement to sell Tunstall a piece of land for $500, and Tunstall placed a $500 bank note in Murray's hands, to be delivered to Pate upon his executing a deed, provided a certain person should determine that the title was good. The person referred to pronounced the title good. The deed was made by Pate and tendered to Tunstall, but he refused to accept it, and notified Murray not to pay over the money. Thereupon Pate sued. Holding that there could be no recovery, the court said: "The contract by which this note, or its nominal or actual value, was payable, being for the sale of land and by parol, did not give a right of action to either party until a deed was not only made, but accepted (M'Dowel v. Delap, supra; Lewis v. Grimes, 7 J. J. Marsh. 336), and was not legally obligatory on either party, until a deed conveying the land, or some other writing evidencing the sale, and binding the vendor, was actually does contain an intimation that the contract must be signed by both parties, but there was no discussion of the point, and the court expressly refrained from deciding it.

The decision of the Oklahoma supreme court in Halsell v. Renfrow, 14 Okla. 674, 78 Pac. 118, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 286, which was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in the Halsell Case, did not rest upon the ground that the contract was not signed by both parties, but upon the ground that a sufficient contract to satisfy the statute in other respects was not shown.

Spence v. Apley, 4 Neb. (Unof.) 358, 94 N. W. 109, an action by real estate broker to recover commissions, was decided under a statute which expressly requires the contract to be signed by the owner and the broker.

Repudiation of distinction between "party to be charged" and "parties to be charged."

It has been suggested in a few cases that the use of the singular "party" in the 4th section, and the plural "parties" in the 17th section, of the original statutes and the other statutory provisions modeled thereon, makes a distinction, bearing on the necessity that the contract, or note or memorandum thereof, be signed by both parties.

Thus, in Champion v. Plummer (1805) 5 Esp. 240, Sir James Mansfield said that he was of the opinion that the sale was void; that the statute meant to make the obligation reciprocal and to bind equally both contracting parties; that the words of the act were not "party" to be charged, but the word "parties," in the plural number, meaning that each should be liable on his default. He further stated, apparently as an independent ground for the decision, that the note did not specify the buyer, and therefore might apply to the plaintiff or to anyone else. In a report of the case in 1 Bos. & P. N. R. 252, more emphasis is placed on the latter point. It is, however, stated in that report that it was objected on the part of the defendant that the note or memorandum was not sufficient, because not signed by the purchaser, and that his Lordship, being of that opinion, nonsuited the plaintiff. The 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

accuracy of these reports of the case is doubtful, in view of the remarks of the same judge in the subsequent case of Allen v. Bennett (1810) 3 Taunt. 169 (an action of assumpsit for nondelivery of goods as required by a contract signed by defendant, but not by plaintiff). He there said: "It was then objected that one party who has not signed is not bound, but the fact was the same in the cases of Egerton v. Mathews, 6 East, 307, and Champion v. Plummer, and the objection was never taken in either of these cases, but the whole of this case supposes that the plaintiff had agreed; suppose he has not contracted by writing, he has by parol, and he is bound in honor; and it has never yet been decided that an obligation in honor would not be a good consideration. All these cases, Egerton v. Mathews, Saunderson v. Jackson, 2 Bos. & P. 238, and Champion v. Plummer, suppose a signature by the seller to be sufficient; and everyone knows it is the daily practice of the court of chancery to establish contracts signed by one person only, and yet a court of equity can no more dispense with the statute of frauds than a court of law can. There is no reason, therefore, to set aside the verdict, and the rule must be discharged."

Chancellor Kent, in Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 485, expressly repudiated the distinction based on the use of the singular "party" in the 4th section, and the plural "parties" in the 17th section, remarking: "But I do not find from the cases that this variation has produced any difference in the decisions. The construction as to the patent under consideration has been uniformly the same in both cases." And his views on this point were adopted by the court in Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 494, 1 Am. Rep. 576.

This attempted distinction was also expressly repudiated in Cunningham v. Williams, 43 Mo. App. 629. And as will subsequently appear, the courts have uniformly repudiated or ignored the distinction, and have applied the same rule whether the case arose under a statute modeled on the 4th section of the original statute, which employed the singular "party," or the 17th section, which employed the plural "parties."

accepted by the purchaser, or his authorized agent. The parol agreement to sell and convey the land, being unobligatory on the vendor, formed no consideration for the promise to pay the price or to accept the deed. To say that the purchaser is bound to accept the deed, which will bind him to pay the money, would be to hold him bound by the contract at the will of the vendor, who is not bound, and would enable the vendor to maintain an action against the vendee for the nonacceptance of the deed and for the nonpayment of the money, while the vendee could not, by paying or tendering the money, have an action against the vendor."

The same question was again before the court in Curnutt v. Roberts, 11 B. Mon. 42.

Necessity of actual assent by party who does not sign.

Since the rule, now established beyond question, that it is not necessary for both parties to sign, presupposes a transaction between the parties, which, but for the statute, would have every requisite of a complete mutually binding and mutually enforceable contract at common law, it in no wise dispenses with the necessity of establishing an actual assent by the party who did not sign to the terms proffered by the other party, and his acceptance, as a contract, of the paper or instrument signed by the other party. In other words, the rule merely dispenses with the necessity of showing such assent and acceptance by writing signed by the party, and permits those facts to be proven by the same means that would have been available in the absence of a statute. The question as to what is necessary to establish a parol assent and acceptance, by the party who did not sign, of the written proposition or contract signed by the other party, and thus convert it into a contract, is not within the scope of this note. The necessity, however, of proving in some way such assent and acceptance by the party who does not sign, is doubtless assumed in all the cases cited in this note. It is especially emphasized in the following cases, among many others that might be mentioned: Ullsperger v. Meyer, 217 Ill. 262, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 221, 75 N. E. 482, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1032; Forthman v. Deters, 206 Ill. 159, 99 Am. St. Rep. 145, 69 N. E. 97; Ives v. Hazard, 4 R. I. 14, 67 Am. Dec. 500.

And Gradle v. Warner, 140 Ill. 123, 29 N. E. 1118, emphasizes the point that while it is not necessary that the acceptance of the contract by the party seeking to enforce it be in writing, it is necessary that he shall have accepted it in some other manner without varying its terms.

There the court, again refusing a recovery, said: "A verbal contract for the sale of land is not legally obligatory upon either party until some writing evidencing the sale, and sufficient to take the contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds, is executed by the vendor, and accepted by the purchaser. . . . The verbal agreement to sell and convey land, not being binding on the vendor, formed no consideration for the promise to pay the money or to accept the deed. The promise, therefore, to pay the money, being without consideration, was legally invalid, and could not be enforced."

These cases were approved in Usher v. Flood, 83 Ky. 552; Fite v. Orr, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 349, 1 S. W. 582. In the subsequent 70 N. Y. Supp. 861, affirmed in 171 N. Y. 659, 63 N. E. 1119; and Wright v. Mischo, 20 Jones & S. 241, recovery was denied, not because the plaintiff, seeking to enforce the contract, had not signed, but because it did not appear that the written instrument or paper signed by the defendant, and relied upon as the contract, had been accepted by the plaintiff as a contract in any manner sufficient to conclude a binding contract, even apart from the statute of frauds.

And see Justice v. Lang, 52 N. Y. 323, infra V, b. 2.

In Lanz v. McLaughlin, 14 Minn. 72, Gil. 55, the court held that an oral acceptance of a written proposal to sell did not satisfy the statute of frauds. The court said that a contract which could be perfected only by an acceptance of the proposal or offer would not be a contract in writing, unless the acceptance also was in writing. The distinction here suggested seems to be between a case where the paper signed by one party, and orally accepted by the other, purported to be merely an offer, and one where it purported on its face to be a binding agreement, though not originally signed by the party against whom it is sought to be enforced. (See Wemple v. Knopf, 15 Minn. 444, Gil. 355, 2 Am. Rep. 147.)

Discretion as to specific performance.

Although, as above stated, the objection of lack of mutuality of remedy is no more an absolute bar to a suit in equity for the specific enforcement of a contract at the instance of a party who did not sign, against the party who did, than to an action at law between the same parties, it has more or less effect, according to the circumstances, upon the exercise of the discretion of a court of equity in granting this particular form of relief. Thus Lord Manners, in Ormond v. Anderson, 2 Ball & B. 263, remarked that in a case where the court finds the party who is not bound has endeavored to obtain some undue advantage, or has been playing fast and loose, the courts will not assist him. As a matter of fact, however, the case of Moore v. Chenault, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 531, 29 S. W. 140, where the court had before it again the construction of the statute, it said: "The vendor is the party vested with title. It is he who can assume a liability which will compel him to convey the title to the property to the vendee. It is he alone who can sign such writing as will divest him of title. The law intended him to be protected in his right to his property until he voluntarily disposed of it by a writing. It did not intend that he should be placed in the power of perjurers to take it from him by proving a parol sale. It is the vendor 'to be charged' with the contract of sale."

It has been held in a number of cases that the contract need not be signed by the purchaser; that a receipt showing the contract and signed by the vendor is sufficient. Gully v. Grubbs, 1 J. J. Marsh. 388; King v. Hanna, 9 B. Mon. 371; Tyler v. Onzts, 93 Ky. 331, 20 S. W. 256, and cases cited. The necessary effect of these opinions is that, under the statute, the purchaser is not "the party to be charged;" and manifestly a writing executed by one who is not "the party to be charged" cannot satisfy the statute. The purpose of the statute is to protect the holders of title to realty from alleged verbal agreements for its sale. The English act was given this meaning (Browne, Stat. Fr. §§ 267, 269); and while some of the words contained in it are omitted from ours, the meaning on this point is the same. To hold that "the party to be charged" is the party against whom the suit is brought would be to allow the vendor, in cases like this, to maintain an action, though none could be maintained by the vendee against him. This, as shown by the cases cited, cannot be done. The justice of the rule thus declared by the court is well illustrated in this case; for it is manifest that, if the contract between the committee and Crawford had been drawn up and put in writing, there would have been no such misunderstanding between the parties as is shown by the record before us. The statute against frauds and perjuries was designed to prevent the use of oral evidence in controversies of this kind. We therefore conclude that the contract sued on being within the statute, no action can be maintained upon it.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the Circuit Court to sustain the defendant's demurrer to the petition.

specific performance was denied in this case because of the omission of an essential part of the agreement.

So, in Backhouse v. Mohun, 3 Swanst. 434, note, Lord Hardwicke, while granting specific performance at the instance of a purchaser who had not signed, against the vendor, who had, admitted that the objection of lack of mutuality might be taken as an ingredient to add weight to other objections.

And in Stengel v. Sargeant, 74 N. J. Eq. 20, 68 Atl. 1106, the court, while recognizing that in general the party who did not sign may enforce the contract against the party who did sign, said that courts of equity exercise their discretion as to specific performance of such contracts with great caution, and view somewhat narrowly the conduct of the party claiming the benefit of his unilateral right to make the contract absolute; that the unilateral contract becomes binding on the party who has not signed only by the filing of the bill, and up to that time he is free from any legal or equitable obligation, and it would not ordinarily be equitable to enforce against a principal a unilateral contract made in that form by his agent, without the principal's knowledge or express authority. The court in this case denied the relief of specific performance at the instance of the vendee, who did not sign, against the vendor, whose agent did sign.

So, in Love v. Welch, 97 N. C. 200, 2 S. E. 242, the court, while recognizing that generally a suit for specific performance will lie by the vendee who did not sign, against the vendor who did, held that that form of relief, not being an absolute right, the court will take into consideration the fact that the plaintiff was not bound, in connection with his long delay before asking relief, and may, in view of the circumstances, decline to grant the relief.

The question as to the right of the party not bound, because he did not sign the contract, to enforce specific performance against the party who did, was considered in the note to Western Timber Co. v. Kalama River Lumber Co. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 397. That note, however, proceeded upon the assumption that there was no question but that the statute of frauds was satisfied, and that the point was merely whether, in view of the circumstance that the complainant was not bound prior to the filing of his bill, he ought to be allowed the equitable remedy of specific performance. Treated from that point of view, the note fails to bring out the full weight of authority in support of the right to specific performance under such circumstances, which is furnished by the cases that did not treat the lack of mutuality as a distinct objection to the remedy of specific performance, apart from the proper construction of the statute of frauds, but considered it simply in its bearing on the question of construction, and having decided, in spite of that objection, that the signing by the defendant sufficiently satisfied the statute, granted the relief of specific performance as a matter of course, without distinguishing particularly between legal and equitable remedies. For the purpose of showing the bearing of these cases on the question as to the right to the particular remedy of spe-

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

CARRIE HARPER, Appt.,

v.

H. H. GOLDSCHMIDT, Respt.

(156 Cal. 245, 104 Pac. 451.)

Specific performance — statute of frauds — part performance.

1. Under a statute making invalid contracts within the statute of frauds unless a memorandum thereof be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, an action for specific performance cannot be maintained against a vendee who did not sign the agreement, although he paid a small portion of the purchase money, and accepted a receipt therefor.

Contract — mutuality — offer to perform.

2. A contract for the sale of land is not void for lack of mutuality from the fact that it is not enforceable against the vendee, because he did not sign the memorandum, as required by the statute of frauds, at least, where the statute provides that a party who has signed a written contract may be compelled specifically to perform it, though the other party has not signed it, if the latter has performed or offers to perform it.

specific performance, they are discriminated in the subsequent subdivisions from the cases in which the action was at law, although, as already stated, in most of them the form of the remedy was not regarded as important.

II. View that "party to be charged" is the party sought to be charged in the suit.

As shown in the last division, the cases are practically unanimous that under a statute requiring the contract, or note or memorandum, to be signed by the "party to be charged," or the "parties to be charged," it is not essential that both parties shall sign. The great majority of these cases have apparently assumed that the only alternative was to hold that the "party to be charged" was the party against whom the contract was sought to be enforced in the particular action or suit; and in this view of the statute have met the objection of lack of mutuality in the way indicated in that division. Comparatively few of them have considered the possibility of avoiding the force of that argument by construing the phrase, "party to be charged," to mean the vendor or owner of the property, as such, and thus defeating the very promise of the argument.

As illustrated by the comments in HARPER v. GOLDSCHMIDT, on the case of Scott v. Glenn, 98 Cal. 168, 32 Pac. 983, the occasional intimation in opinions that it is the vendor, as such, who must sign, are not to be too hastily taken as authority for that 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Pleading — complaint — statute of frauds — demurrer.

3. A complaint showing on its face that the agreement sued upon is within the statute of frauds, and fails to comply with its requirements, is demurrable.

(August 31, 1909.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in defendant's favor in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract to purchase certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. E. Gibbon and G. W. Crouch, for appellant:

A contract in the form of a receipt, signed only by the vendor, or his duly authorized agent for him, can be specifically enforced against the vendee, who has not signed.

1 Wharton, Contr. § 2; Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123, 27 Pac. 280; Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249; Cavanaugh v. Casselman, 88 Cal. 543, 26 Pac. 515; Joseph v. Holt, 37 Cal. 254; Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 213; Scott v. Glenn, 98 Cal. 170, 32 Pac. 983; Hubbard v. Marshall, 50 Wis. 322, 6 N. W.

view, as opposed to the view that it is the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced, whether vendor or vendee, who must have signed, since it is often practically unnecessary to choose between these two doctrines in order to dispose of the case on the facts. This is true where as in the cases cited in V. b, supra, the action or suit is by the vendee, who did not sign, against the vendor, who did. In the great majority of these cases, however, it is clear that the contract was held enforceable not because the party who had signed the contract was the vendor, but because he was the party against whom the contract was sought to be enforced in the particular action or suit in question. This is made apparent in many of the cases of this class by the fact that the court assumed that the contract could not have been enforced at the instance of the defendant in the suit, against the plaintiff, for the reason that the latter had not signed the contract, and dealt with the objection of lack of mutuality on that assumption, disposing of it in the manner indicated in I., supra. This sometimes serves to dissipate the apparent ambiguity arising from conflicting statements on the point in the same opinion. Thus, for example, the opinion in Ullsperger v. Meyer, 217 Ill. 262, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 221, 75 N. E. 482, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1032, declares at one point that it is sufficient if the vendor sign, but immediately quotes a text writer to the effect that it is sufficient if the instrument be signed by the party defendant, whether he be vendee or vendor. Since the suit was

Messrs. B. F. Mull and E. B. Coll, for respondent:

The agreement is defective under the statute of frauds, in that it is not signed by the party to be charged.

The memorandum is not sufficient under against the vendor, who had signed, the result would be the same in either view; but the fact that the court assumed that the contract could not have been enforced by the defendant against the plaintiff, and on that assumption met and overruled the objection of lack of mutuality, shows that the signing by defendant was sufficient to sustain the action, not because he was the vendor, but because he was the party against whom the contract was sought to be enforced.

Practically all the cases cited in V. b, 1 and 2, infra, may therefore be regarded as supporting the doctrine that the "party to be charged," or the "parties to be charged," is the party or parties against whom the contract is sought to be enforced, irrespective of whether he is vendor or vendee.

Even stronger authority, however, for that position, is furnished by the cases cited in V. a, 1 and 2, infra, holding that a vendor or owner of the property, who did not sign the contract, or any note or memorandum thereof, may enforce the same against the vendee, who did sign, and, upon the other hand, by cases cited in V. c, 1 and 2, infra, which deny the right of the vendor, who did sign the contract, to enforce the same against the vendee, who did not sign, since it is apparent that this view is necessary in order to justify the results reached in either of those classes of cases, and the results in those cases are therefore necessarily inconsistent with the view that the "party to be charged" is the vendor, as such irrespective of whether the contract was sought to be enforced by or against him.

The Kentucky and Tennessee cases cited in V. c, 1, upholding the right of the vendor in such circumstances to maintain the suit, are opposed to the view sustained by the weight of authority, that the "party to be charged" is the party sought to be charged in the action whether vendor or vendee. But the other cases cited in that 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hogue*, 91 Cal. 447, 27 Pac. 744; McGovern v. Hern, 153 Mass. 308, 10 L.R.A. 815, 25 Am. St. Rep. 632, 26 N. E. 861; Ross v. Allen, 45 Kan. 231, 10 L.R.A. 839, 25 Pac. 570.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by plaintiff for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of realty, which contract, as pleaded in the complaint, was evidenced by the following written memorandum or receipt:

Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 11, 1907.

Received of H. H. Goldschmidt $100, part subdivision, upholding the vendor's right to maintain the suit in such circumstances, are not opposed to that view, since they were decided under statutes not employing the phrase, "party to be charged."

Ordinarily it is the plaintiff who is seeking to enforce the contract against the defendant, so that usually the use of the term "defendant" as a substitute for the phrase, "party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced," or similar phrases employed in this note, would answer all practical purposes of the case; but occasionally the defendant seeks by cross bill or counterclaim to enforce the contract against the plaintiff, and in that event it is, of course, the plaintiff who, in this view of the statute, must have signed. Hence, the use in this note of the descriptive phrases, rather than the term "defendant," to indicate the party who must have signed.

While most of the courts have acted upon the prevailing rule that the "party to be charged" is the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced in the particular action or suit have tacitly assumed that that is the rule, after holding that it is not necessary for both parties to sign, some of them have given their reasons for adopting that view in opposition to the contrary view, that the party to be charged is the vendor or owner of the property as such.

Thus, in Heflin v. Milton, 69 Ala. 354, the court said: "The words, spirit, and policy of the statute cannot be met and satisfied, unless there is written evidence of the contract subscribed by the party to be charged, the defendant in the action, whether he is the vendor or vendee."

And in Simms v. Killian, 34 N. C. (12 Ired. L.) 253, Ruffin, Ch. J., said that the danger was as great that a purchase at an exorbitant price may by perjury be imposed on one who did not contract for it, as that, by a similar means, a feigned contract of sale should be established against the own-payment on lot numbered 3, block —, Harper's Magnolia Place. Terms: Total price, $5,250; balance to be paid as follows: $1,400 cash on delivery of contract, less $250 discount as com. on sale, $1,250 in six months from date, $1,250 twelve months from date, $1,250 eighteen months from date, and interest at 7 per cent semiannually. This receipt is issued subject to the conditions in the regular form of contract and deed given for lots in the here-in-mentioned tract.

Geo. C. Peckham & Company,
By Geo. C. Peckham.

Plaintiff averred the tender to defendant of the contract mentioned in the receipt, and the due performance of all of the terms and conditions upon her imposed by the contract, with defendant's refusal to accept the contract and to pay the moneys due thereer of the land. And that statement is quoted with approval in Hall v. Misenheimer, 137 N. C. 183, 107 Am. St. Rep. 474, 49 S. E. 104.

III. View that "party to be charged" is the vendor or owner, as such.

The view taken in MURRAY v. CRAWFORD clearly opposed to the great weight of authority, that the "party to be charged" is the vendor or owner of the property, irrespective of whether the contract is sought to be enforced by or against him, is quite consistently supported by the earlier decisions in Kentucky. (See Moore v. Che-nault, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 531, 29 S. W. 140; Lloyd v. O'Rear, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1000, 59 S. W. 483, with the exception of King v. Cheatham, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1176, 104 S. W. 751, where the court said that the "party to be bound" is the party sued, or him against whom it is sought to enforce the contract. In that case, however, the vendee, who had signed, was seeking to enforce the contract against the vendor, who had not; and it was clear that in either view the action would not lie under such circumstances. The decision, therefore, cannot be regarded as opposed to the position taken in the other Kentucky cases.)

The view that it is the vendor, as such, who must sign, is also sustained by the Tennessee cases. Thus, in Frazer v. Ford, 2 Head, 464, the court, in answering the argument that, as the action was against the vendee, and he signed the contract, that was a compliance with the statute, since the vendee was the party attempted to be charged, said: "This is not the meaning of the act. It means the persons who sell the land shall sign the writing,—the vendor, and not the vendee. The filing of the bill by all the vendors, with an express ratification of the contract therein, and tender of title, does not remedy the defect of failure to sign the writing by the vendor, as is contended by counsel. The principle would under. A general demurrer to this complaint was interposed and sustained. From the judgment which followed plaintiff appeals.

The principal question presented upon the appeal is whether, under the circumstances here indicated, a vendee who has not signed the contract of sale, and who has done no more than pay $100 upon the purchase price, accepting a receipt therefor, can be compelled specifically to perform. Appellant answers this question by saying that under our statute of frauds and the sections of the Code relating to specific performance, and the decisions of this court, construing the statute and the Code, specific performance should be decreed. Respondent makes answer that under our statute of frauds and the sections of the Code dealing with specific performance, and the decisions of this court, expounding the statute and the Code, make the contract binding on one party, and not on the other,—on the purchaser, and not the seller. Whereas, to make it obligatory, it must be mutual."

To the same effect is Lee v. Cherry, 85 Tenn. 707, 4 Am. St. Rep. 800, 4 S. W. 835.

The declaration by the court in Scott v. Glenn, supra, that the vendor is the party to be charged, taken by itself, would tend to support this view, but that statement is explained away in HARPER v. GOLDSCHMIDT, which squarely holds in accordance with the weight of authority, that the party to be charged is not necessarily the vendor or owner of the property, but the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced whether vendor or vendee.

The Mississippi cases are somewhat ambiguous on this point. In Curtis v. Blair, 26 Mass. 309, 59 Am. Dec. 257, holding that specific performance would lie at the instance of the vendee, who did not sign, against the vendor, who did sign, the court said that while the letters in question, when written, were but propositions to sell, they contained a description of the land and the terms, and the moment the proposition was accepted and the terms complied with by the other party, the transaction became mutual as to all rights and liabilities thereunder. If by the last statement the court meant that the transaction became mutual in the sense that it could be enforced by the party who did sign, against the party who did not, it would seem to be true only upon the assumption that the statute requires the contract to be signed by the vendor, as such, rather than by the party sought to be charged.

In Johnson v. Brook, 31 Miss. 17, 66 Am. Dec. 547, the court, while holding that a deed executed by the vendor, but not delivered to the vendee, could not be regarded as a sufficient note or memorandum to satisfy the statute of frauds, seems to have placed the decision on the ground of lack of delivery; and there is no suggestion that the fact that the vendee did not sign would no action will lie, and the defendant is not bound. That such a contrariety of opinion should exist upon a proposition which should be well settled, not only excites surprise, but demands an exposition of it resolving all uncertainty.

Upon the statute of frauds, appellant points out that § 1091 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "An estate in real property, other than an estate at will, or for a term not exceeding one year, can be transferred only by operation of law, or by an instrument in writing, subscribed by the party disposing of the same, or by his agent thereunto duly authorized;" that § 1971 of the Code of Civil Procedure prescribes that "no estate or interest in real property, other than for leases for a term not exceeding one year, nor any trust or power over or concerning it, or in any manner relating thereto, can be created, granted, assigned, surrendered, or declared otherwise than by operation of law, or a conveyance or other instrument in writing, subscribed by the party creating, granting, assigning, surrendering, or declaring the same, or by his lawful agent thereunto authorized by writing." From the language of these sections he argues that when in § 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in §§ 1624 and 1741 of the Civil Code, it is declared that contracts within the statute of frauds are invalid unless they, or some note or memorandum of them, "be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent," the "party to be charged" is the vendor, and in itself have been fatal, although it would seem that objection in itself would be fatal except upon the assumption that it is the vendor, and not the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced, who must sign.

In Peevey v. Haughton, 72 Miss. 918, 43 Am. St. Rep. 592, 17 So. 378, 18 So. 357, however, holding that specific performance would lie at the instance of the vendee, who did not sign, against vendor, who did, it seems to have been assumed that the vendee was not bound by the contract until he filed his bill to enforce the same.

In Bailey v. Leishman, 32 Utah, 123, 89 Pac. 78, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1116, holding that the purchaser of goods, who did not sign, could maintain an action for breach of contract against the seller, who did sign, the court said that it has often been held that the phrase, "party to be charged," applies to the vendor in case of sale; and that the purchaser's acceptance of the offer made it a contract mutually binding. Probably, however, the court did not mean to adopt the view that it is the vendor, as such, rather than the person against whom the contract is sought to be enforced, who must sign. At least, the facts did not call for a choice between the two views.

IV. Statutes not employing the phrase, "party to be charged."

Most of the states originally adopted the 4th section of the original statute of frauds and perjuries, which required a contract for the sale of real property, or some note or memorandum, to be signed by the "party to be charged." The 4th section, however, was never adopted in Pennsylvania. That state, however, did adopt the 3d section, which, in effect, provided that no lease, estate, or interest in lands should be assigned, granted, or surrendered unless by deed or note in writing, "signed by the party so assigning, granting, or surrendering the same." And this provision was held applicable to equitable as well as legal interests. (Wilson v. Clarke, 1 Watts & S. 554.)

this statute there would be no room for the contention that the contract must be signed by both parties, and it has been expressly held that signing by both is not necessary. Lowry v. Mehaffy, 10 Watts, 387; Simpson v. Breckenridge, 32 Pa. 287; Cadwalader v. App. 81 Pa. 194; Everhart v. Dolph, 133 Pa. 628, 19 Atl. 431; Witman v. Reading, 191 Pa. 140, 43 Atl. 140; and Brodhead v. Reinbold, 200 Pa. 618, 86 Am. St. Rep. 735, 50 Atl. 229.

The 4th section of the original statute was originally adopted in New York, but by the Revision of 1830 a new provision was substituted to the effect that a contract for the leasing for a longer period than one year, or for the sale of any real property, or an interest therein, is void unless the contract, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing, subscribed by the "lessor or grantor," or by his lawfully authorized agent.

And in a number of other states provisions which in terms require the contract for the sale or leasing of real property to be signed by the person by whom the sale or lease is to be made have been substituted for the original provision.

Under these forms of the statute, as well as under the Pennsylvania form, it seems clear that signing by both parties is not necessary, and as shown by cases cited in subsequent divisions in this note, it is so held when the question directly arises. Indeed, under these forms of the statute there would seem to be no basis or premise whatever for the argument, based on lack of mutuality, so frequently, though unsuccessfully, urged under statutes requiring signing by the "party to be charged," against the right of the party who did not sign to enforce the contract against the party who did sign. Curiously enough, however, in cases arising under these changed forms of the statute, where the vendee who did not sign sought to enforce the contract against the vendor or owner who did sign, the courts have frequently invoked the reasoning employed in the cases arising under the old forms of statute (i. e., those employing the phrases "party to be charged" or "par-not the vendee. And it is said that such is the construction put upon the statute in this state by the cases of Joseph v. Holt, 37 Cal. 254, Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 213, and Scott v. Glenn, 98 Cal. 170, 32 Pac. 983; while elsewhere this construction receives support, as in Wisconsin (Hubbard v. Marshall, 50 Wis. 322, 6 N. W. 497); in Nebraska (Gardels v. Klope, 36 Neb. 493, 54 N. W. 834); in Michigan (Mull v. Smith, 132 Mich. 620, 94 N. W. 183); in Montana (Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17, 24 Pac. 695); and in New York (Boehly v. Mansing, 52 Misc. 382, 102 N. Y. Supp. 171).

Upon the proposition that specific performance is a road open to the vendor under the circumstances here presented, it is said ties to be charged") to meet the objection of lack of mutuality; thus apparently implying that the contract could not have been enforced in a suit by the vendor who did sign, against the vendee who did not. (See Gartrell v. Stafford, 12 Neb. 545, 41 Am. Rep. 767, 11 N. W. 732; Robinson v. Cheney, 17 Neb. 673, 24 N. W. 378; Gardels v. Klope, 36 Neb. 493, 54 N. W. 834; Worrall v. Munn, 5 N. Y. 229, 55 Am. Dec. 330; Pettibone v. Moore, 75 Hun, 461, 27 N. Y. Supp. 455; Cheney v. Cook, 7 Wis. 413; Lowber v. Connit, 36 Wis. 176.)

Although on its face M'Crea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 460, 30 Am. Dec. 103, having been decided after the change of the statute by the Revision of 1831, would seem to be subject to the same comment, the contract in that case was made prior to the change of statute, and the court probably assumed that it would be governed by the statute in force at the time it was made.

In Parrish v. Koons, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 79, the court, on the authority of Chief Justice Gibson's dictum in Wilson v. Clarke, 1 Watts & S. 554, supra, actually held that specific performance would not lie at the instance of the vendee, who did not sign, against the vendor, who did, although, as above shown, the provision of the Pennsylvania statute is not that the contract should be signed by the "party to be charged," but that it must be signed by the party granting the interest in the land.

Although, as already stated, the dictum of the chief justice on this point is clearly opposed to the overwhelming weight of authority even in those jurisdictions in which the requirement of the statute is that the contract must be signed by the "party to be charged" or "parties to be charged," there is under that form of the statute a basis or premise for the objection of lack of mutuality, since it is conceded that the party who did sign could not have enforced the contract against the party who did not. There would seem, however, to be no basis or premise whatever for the objection under the Pennsylvania statute, since, if the contract, as required by that statute, be signed by the party transferring the interest, there that the vendee who has not signed may prosecute such an action against the vendor who has signed. This being admitted, reference is made to § 3386 of the Civil Code, which declares that "neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party thereto has performed, or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, either completely or nearly so, together with full compensation for any want of entire performance;" and to such authorities as Wharton on Contracts, where (vol. 1, § 2) it is said: "The parties to a contract, therefore, must both be bound;" and the language of our adjudications, such as that in Doe v. Culverwell, 35 Cal. 295, where would seem to be no reason why it should not be enforced by, as well as against, him; and in that view the objection of want of mutuality altogether disappears. As a matter of fact, in the Wilson Case the contract was not signed by either party; and it is doubtful whether the chief justice intended his animadversions on the doctrine that the party who does not sign may enforce specific performance against the party who does sign, to apply to cases arising under the Pennsylvania statute. That he did not so intend is apparently indicated by the fact that, after remarking that Chancellor Kent was reluctantly obliged to concede that the doctrine was established by weight of authority, Chief Justice Gibson added: "But we are able to escape it by the fact that this section (4th section of the original statute of frauds) has been omitted in the statute of Pennsylvania."

As shown in subsequent divisions in this note, the latter Pennsylvania cases have frequently recognized that it is not necessary for both parties to sign the contract, and in one or two instances have expressly held that specific performance would lie at the instance of the vendee who did not sign, against the vendor who did sign.

Some of the cases decided under these changed forms of statutes have expressly stated, what but for the confusion created by the cases just referred to would scarcely seem to require express statement, that the signing by the vendor or owner is sufficient to render the contract enforceable by either party against the other.

Thus, in Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17, 24 Pac. 695 (a suit by the vendee, who did not sign, against the vendor, who did, for specific performance), the court, in reply to the argument that the contract could not have been enforced against plaintiff if he had been the party sought to be charged, as he had not signed, and therefore it could not be urged against the defendant, said that the statute does not require the writing to be signed by the party to be charged, but only by the party by whom the sale is made.

So, in Boehly v. Mansing, 52 Misc. 382, the well-established principle is enunciated that, "to be obligatory on either party, a contract must be mutual and reciprocal in its obligations." Upon these principles, it is argued that, as the contract is admitted to be enforceable against the vendor, and as it could not be so enforceable without mutuality of obligation, it must be equally enforceable against the vendee.

The English statute of frauds and perjuries of Charles II., to which the similar statutes of all our states owe their origin, used the phrase, "party to be charged," in precisely the same manner and to the same effect as it is now used in our sections of the Code. A glance at the English cases will establish that the "party to be charged" did not mean the vendor, nor yet the vendee, but it meant the person charged in court with the performance of the obligation,—the party defendant. 1 Sugden, Vendors, chap. 4, § 3, ¶ 2; Thornton v. Kempster, 5 Taunt. 786; Allen v. Bennet, 3 Taunt. 169; Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. Jr. 265. It was not the vendor alone whom the statute of frauds and perjuries sought to protect, but the vendee equally. For, as is well said by Ruffin, Ch. J., speaking for the supreme court of North Carolina: "The danger seems as great that a purchase at an exorbitant price may by perjury be imposed on one who did not contract for it, as that by some means a feigned contract of sale should be established against the owner of the land. Hence the act in terms avoids entirely every contract of which the sale of land is the sub-

102 N. Y. Supp. 171, the court said that if the owner of the land signs the contract, or note or memorandum, so as to satisfy the statute of frauds, and the purchaser unreservedly agrees to take the property and pay the purchase price, although his acceptance is expressed by word of mouth, the contract is mutually obligatory, and can be enforced by either party.

And in Mull v. Smith, 132 Mich. 618, 94 N. W. 183, the court expressly declares that under the statute requiring the contract to be signed by the vendor, if he does sign it, it is valid against both. And it will be observed by referring to V. c, infra, that when the situation has been presented, the courts, under statutes in this form, have held the contract enforceable at the instance of the vendor who did sign, against the vendee who did not.

These decisions directly on the point clearly outweigh any inference against the right of the vendor who has signed the contract under a statute requiring the contract to be signed by the vendor or person by whom the sale is to be made, to enforce the same against the vendee who has not signed, that might otherwise be drawn from the apparent assumption by the cases above cited, in meeting the objection of lack of mutuality, that the vendor could not have enforced the contract against the vendee, for the reason that the latter did not sign. That assumption is not only contrary to the clear implication of the statute, but also to the decisions in the cases in which the point was presented for decision.

V. Who may enforce contract.

a. Vendor who did not sign against vendee who did.

1. Contracts as to real property.

It logically follows from the rule, established by the great weight of authority that the "party to be charged" is the party sought to be charged with the contract in the particular action or suit in question, whether he be the vendor or vendee, that the vendor or owner who does not sign may nevertheless enforce the same against the vendee who does sign; and so it has been specifically held or recognized, under a statute in form requiring the contract or note or memorandum to be signed by the "party to be charged," that the vendor or owner who has not signed may enforce specific performance against the vendee or other party who has signed. Hodges v. Kowing, 58 Conn. 12, 7 L.R.A. 87, 18 Atl. 979; Old Colony R. Corp. v. Evans, 6 Gray, 25, 66 Am. Dec. 394; Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 407; Ivory v. Murphy, 36 Mo. 534; Marquize v. Caldwell, 48 Miss. 23 (overruling intimations to contrary in Lee v. Dozier, 40 Miss. 481) Hunter v. Seton, 7 Ves. Jr. 265; Butcher v. Nash, 61 L. T. N. S. 72.

So, under a statute in that form, it has been held or declared that an action at law may be maintained by the vendor or owner who did not sign a contract relating to real property, against the vendee or other party who did sign. Oliver v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 82 Ala. 417, 2 So. 445 (action for rent); Byers v. Aiken, 5 Ark. 419 (action for purchase price); Drennen v. Boyer, 5 Ark. 497; Browning v. Walbrun, 45 Mo. 477 (action for breach of agreement to accept premises and pay rent); Booklovers' Library v. Bogigian, 193 Mass. 444, 79 N. E. 769 (action to recover damages for breach of contract to take a lease of premises); Crutchfield v. Donathon, 49 Tex. 691, 30 Am. Rep. 112 (obiter); Anderson v. Tinsley (Tex. Civ. App.) 28 S. W. 121 (action for damages for breach of contract to purchase land); Laythoarp v. Bryant, 2 Bing. N. C. 735 (action for damages for refusal to pay for leasehold premises).

In Vyers v. Aiken and Drennen v. Boyer, supra, the actions were on bonds given for the purchase price, and the decisions perhaps rest on the ground that the defendant in such an action cannot avail himself of the statute of frauds, rather than on the ground that the statute is satisfied if the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced has signed.

In Oliver v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. supra, the action was upon a promissory note ject, in respect of a party—that is, either party—who does not charge himself by his signature to it, after it has been reduced to writing.” Simms v. Killian, 34 N. C. (12 Ired. L.) 252.

In 1830 the state of New York changed the language of the English statute, and enacted the following: “A contract for the leasing for a longer period than one year, or for the sale of any real property, or an interest therein, is void unless the contract or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration in writing, be subscribed by the lessor or grantor, or by his lawfully authorized agent.” In 1850 the state of California passed an act concerning fraudulent conveyances and contracts (Stat. 1850, chap. 114, p. 267, § 8), for rent, given by defendant, but the court seems to treat the question the same as if the action had been to enforce a contract in relation to real property, and the decision is referred to the doctrine that only the party sought to be charged need sign.

As pointed out in IV., supra, some of the states, while preserving the language of the 17th section of the original statute without substantial modification, have entirely changed the 4th section in relation to contracts in regard to real property, and have substituted in place of the requirement that a contract, or note or memorandum thereof, shall be signed by the “party to be charged,” an express requirement that the contract shall be signed by the owner of the property, or by the party by whom the sale is to be made. This change was made in New York by the Revision of 1831, and the example of New York in that respect has been followed in some other states. Under this form of statute it has been expressly held that the vendor or owner of the property who has not signed cannot maintain an action thereon against the vendee or other party who has signed. Maynard v. Brown, 41 Mich. 298, 2 N. W. 30; McWhorter v. McMahan, 10 Paige, 386; Champlin v. Parish, 11 Paige, 405; Miller v. Pelletier, 4 Edw. Ch. 102; DeBeerski v. Paige, 47 Barb. 172, affirmed in 36 N. Y. 537; Laughran v. Smith, 75 N. Y. 205.

The same result clearly follows under a statute which in terms requires the contract, or note or memorandum thereof, to be signed by the “party to be charged,” if, as in Kentucky and Tennessee, that phrase is by judicial construction deemed to mean the vendor or owner of the property, as such, irrespective of whether the contract is sought to be enforced by or against him. There seems to be no case in Kentucky in which this precise situation has been presented; but in Frazer v. Ford, 2 Head, 464, the view that the “party to be charged” is the vendor or owner of the property, as such, irrespective of whether the contract is sought to be enforced by or against him, was specifically applied by denying the right of the vendors, some of whom had not signed the contract, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) which declared: “Every contract for the leasing for a longer period than one year, or for the sale of any lands, or any interest in lands, shall be void, unless the contract, or some note or memorandum thereof expressing the consideration, be in writing, and be subscribed by the party by whom the lease or sale is to be made.” This was an express and admitted adaptation of the New York statute. In turn, a similar statute was adopted by the states of Wisconsin, Nebraska, Michigan, and Montana,—all of the states upon whose decisions appellant leans to support his contention. It must be apparent that the language of the courts in construing a statute which requires only that the contract shall be signed by the vendor can have no weight, to maintain a suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real property, against the vendee, who had signed.

2. Contracts for sale of goods.

Under the rule that the phrase, “party to be charged,” or “parties to be charged,” means the party or parties sought to be charged in the suit, it has been specifically held or declared that a contract for the sale of chattels within the statute of frauds may be enforced by the seller who did not sign against the purchaser who did sign. In Re Neff, ante, 349, 84 C. C. A. 561, 157 Fed. 57; Schaefer v. Whitman (Iowa) 124 N. W. 763 (obiter); Barstow v. Gray, 3 Me. 409; J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Smith, 16 Or. 381, 18 Pac. 641 (obiter); Wemple v. Knopf, 15 Minn. 440, Gil. 355, 2 Am. Rep. 147; Kessler v. Smith, 42 Minn. 494, 44 N. W. 794; Cunningham v. Williams, 43 Mo. App. 629; Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 485 (obiter); Mason v. Decker, 72 N. Y. 595, 28 Am. Rep. 190; Penniman v. Hartshorn, 13 Mass. 87; Egerton v. Mathews, 6 East, 307. See Dykers v. Townsend, 24 N. Y. 57, supra.

In McIlroy v. Richards, 148 Mich. 604, 112 N. W. 489, however, a contract signed by defendant only, and not to be performed within one year, whereby he agreed to purchase certain shares of stock, was held bad under the statute of frauds, and insufficient to sustain an action, because not signed by the plaintiff. The court relied on Wilkinson v. Heavenrich, 58 Mich. 574, 55 Am. Rep. 708, 26 N. W. 139. This case is clearly opposed to the weight of authority.

Some of the cases sustaining the right of the seller under these circumstances may have been decided under a form of statute employing the phrase, “party to be charged,” rather than the phrase, “parties to be charged,” as employed in the 17th section of the original statute of frauds and perjuries in relation to goods, wares, and merchandise. But, as shown in I., supra, the courts are practically agreed that no distinction can be based on the difference of the language in this respect.

either by way of reasoning or authority, in a case where a statute requires that the contract must be signed by the party to be charged. Such is the situation touching the last two of the cases from this state, relied upon by appellant. Joseph v. Holt, supra, was decided under the law expressed in the Statutes of 1850. Its language is: "To take a contract for the sale of land out of the statute of frauds, a mere note or memorandum in writing, subscribed by the vendor or his agent, containing the names of the parties and a summary statement of the terms of the sale, . . . is all that is required." This language is strictly true with reference to the statute as it then stood. So, in Rutenberg v. Main, supra, the same remark is applicable to the court's language when it states: "The statute only requires that the memorandum of sale of real property shall be signed by the vendor or his agent. Act concerning fraudulent conveyances, §§ 8, 9."

As an essential of every contract there must be an agreement and meeting of minds. Thus, the agreement must precede the signature to the contract, however speedily thereafter such signature may follow. Before the statute of frauds, an oral agreement could be proved against either party. The statute of frauds in no way interfered, or attempted to interfere, with the antecedent oral agreement, but, in effect, declared a rule of evidence that such agreement could not be proved unless the essentials of it had been reduced to writ-

These cases doubtless assume that the contract was not mutual in the sense that an action could have been maintained thereon by the purchaser who did sign, against the seller who did not.

But in Ames v. Moir, 130 Ill. 582, 22 N. E. 535, the court said that where the sellers of goods accepted a written contract signed by the purchaser as a contract, they become bound by its terms and conditions as completely as if they had in form signed the paper. The action in this case, however, was by the sellers, who did not sign the contract, against the purchasers, who did, to recover the purchase price, and the statement of the court was made in considering the question whether the action was one founded upon a written contract within the statute of limitations.

b. Vendee who did not sign against vendor who did.

1. Contracts as to real property.

Since, as stated in I., supra, it is now established beyond question that a statute providing that a contract, or note or memorandum thereof, must be signed by the "party to be charged" or "parties to be charged," does not require signing by both parties, it is clear that a vendee, or other party, who contracts with the owner of land, in relation thereto, may, if the latter has signed, maintain a suit for specific performance, although he himself did not sign. Moses v. McClain, 82 Ala. 370, 2 So. 741; Ross v. Parks, 93 Ala. 153, 11 L.R.A. 148, 30 Am. St. Rep. 47, 8 So. 368; Vance v. Newman, 72 Ark. 359, 105 Am. St. Rep. 42, 80 S. W. 574; *Farwell v. (But see I., supra, as to specific performance viewed as a matter of discretion.)

In Shirley v. Shirley, 7 Blackf. 452, it was held that the vendee, who did not sign, could maintain a suit against the vendor, who did, to enforce a vendee's lien.

And in Trulock v. Parse, 83 Ark. 149, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 924, 103 S. W. 166, where de-

ing, and signed by the party to be charged. By the English statute, the party to be charged was either of the parties against whom enforcement of the contract was sought; but by the statute of California, until the reversion to the English statute, which took place in 1873-74, and by the statutes of New York, Wisconsin, and the other states whose law in this regard is like the early law of California, the statute of frauds was satisfied if the vendor of the property alone signed the contract. There was no such requirement as to the vendee, and, consequently, against him, proof of its acceptance could rest in parol. Hence the repeated declarations from the courts of those states,—like the declarations above quoted from the early decisions of this state,—to the effect that the statute is satisfied if the memorandum be signed by the vendor. The statute was satisfied because all that it required was that the vendor alone should sign; hence the inapplicability of the decisions of those states to our existing law. Guthrie v. Anderson, 47 Kan. 383, 28 Pac. 164. But in all of the states like California to-day, where the statute requires the signature of the party to be charged, when effort is made to charge the vendee, it is uniformly held that the signature of the vendor plaintiff is not sufficient, but that the signature of the defendant vendee is absolutely essential, saving in the exceptional class of cases where the conduct of the vendee has amounted to such a performance, or part performance, of the confeudant in a suit to enjoin interference with complainant's wall relied on an agreement signed by the latter only, it was held that defendant's signature was unnecessary, since the agreement obligated him to do nothing, but merely gave him a right to use the wall.

In Bogle v. Jarvis, 58 Kan. 76, 48 Pac. 558, holding that an offer to sell, signed by the vendor, and accepted orally by the purchaser, was available to the latter as a defense to ejectment brought by the vendor, there had been part performance by part payment of the purchase price, and taking possession.

In a few of these cases, if they stood alone, it might be difficult to determine whether the courts were of the opinion that the "party to be charged" is the party sought to be charged in the suit, irrespective of whether he is the vendor or vendee, or whether that phrase means the vendor or owner, as such, irrespective of whether the contract is sought to be enforced by or against him. Thus, for example, in McConnell v. Brillhart, 17 Ill. 354, 65 Am. Dec. 661, the court said that the "party to be charged" or the vendor must sign. And there is the same doubt in some of the other earlier Illinois cases. The result in these cases, of course, does not remove the doubt, since the party against whom the contract was sought to be enforced was the vendor or owner, so that the result would be the same in either view. In the later Illinois cases, however, it is made clear that the reason the suit can be maintained under these circumstances is not that the vendor or owner, as such, has signed, but that the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced has signed. And this is true of practically all of the jurisdictions represented by the cases just cited.

The fact that in the situation now considered (i. e., where the vendee who did not sign seeks to enforce the contract against the vendor who did sign) it is immaterial which view of the phrase, "party to be charged," is taken, so long as it is conceded that that phrase does not require both parties to sign, is illustrated by a Kentucky case (Lloyd v. O'Rear, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1000, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

59 S. W. 483) and a Tennessee case (Lee v. Cherry, 85 Tenn. 707, 4 Am. St. Rep. 800, 4 S. W. 835), holding that the vendee who did not sign may enforce specific performance against the vendor who did, although, as already shown (supra, III.), in those two jurisdictions the view prevails, contrary to the great weight of authority elsewhere, that the "party to be charged" is the vendor or owner of the property, as such, and not necessarily the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced. See also Curtis v. Blair, 26 Miss. 309, 59 Am. Dec. 257, supra, III.

In Acree v. Rozzell, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1342, 108 S. W. 846, holding that a contract in relation to real property, signed by the owner's agent, satisfied the statute of frauds, the nature of the action does not clearly appear but it does appear that the contract was successfully asserted by the vendee, who apparently did not sign it, against a subsequent grantee of the vendor. Curtis v. Blair, 26 Miss. 309, 59 Am. Dec. 257, supra, III.

The intimation of Chancellor Kent in Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 370, 7 Am. Dec. 484, that lack of mutuality would prevent the specific performance at the instance of the vendee, where the contract was signed only by the vendor, has been overruled by the later cases in New York, although, as already shown, Chancellor Kent, while deferring to the weight of authority, still persisted in the doubt intimated in this case.

It is clear, of course, that under a statute requiring a contract, or note or memorandum thereof, to be signed by the "party to be charged," a vendee or other party who did not sign may maintain an action at law against the vendor or owner, upon a contract in regard to real property, signed by the latter. To that effect are Cavanaugh v. Casselman, 88 Cal. 543, 26 Pac. 515 (action for damages for breach of contract); Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123, 27 Pac. 280 (action to recover money paid on purchase price); Black v. Crowther, 74 Mo. App. 480 (action for damages for breach of contract); Mizell v. Burnett, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 249, 69 tract, as to relieve the contract from the necessity of his signature.

Nor is there any weight to the objection of lack of mutuality which follows this interpretation of the law. Such objection was early made by Lord Chancellor Redesdale in Lawrenson v. Butler, 1 Sch. & Lef. 13. It was considered a valid objection by Chancellor Kent in Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 484, but, as pointed out in Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458, the courts refused to hold it tenable. Says Parsons (Parsons, Contr. §§ 9, 10): The difficulty, therefore, cannot be that the contract is not mutual, but that one of the parties has not obtained the evidence which the statute requires him to produce to bind the other. In Chitty on Contracts, 8th Am. ed. 4, note, it is said that the reason why a party may sue on a contract, although it may be void against him for want of his signature, under the statute of frauds, is that the signature is prescribed as "necessary evidence of a contract," and not as an essential or constituent part of the engagement itself. In equitable theory, the requirement of mutuality of remedy is satisfied when the nonsigning plaintiff enters suit, since, by the very bringing of his action, he binds himself to abide by the decree of the court in chancery, and so empowers that court to decree specific performance against him. The commencement of his action is his offer to perform, and the precise situation is met and covered by the provisions of § 3388 of the Civil Code, which declares that "a party

Am. Dec. 744 (assumpsit); Cosack v. Descoudres, 1 M'Cord, L. 425, 10 Am. Dec. 681 (action for damages for breach of contract); Wharton v. Tolbert, 84 S. C. 197, 65 S. E. 1056 (action for damages for breach of contract); Bailey v. Leishman, 32 Utah, 123, 89 Pac. 78, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1116 (see supra, III., as to this case).

In Wharton v. Tolbert, supra, the court expressly repudiated the contention made by counsel, that it is only in actions for specific performance that the party who did not sign may enforce the contract against the party who did sign.

So, of course, under a statute which in terms requires the contract to be subscribed by the party by whom the sale is to be made, the contract may be enforced or asserted at the instance of the vendee or party who did not sign, against the vendor or owner of the property, who did sign. Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458 (the California statute was subsequently changed so as to require the contract to be signed by the party to be charged, as under the 4th section of the original English statute); Smith v. Gibson, 25 Neb. 511, 41 N. W. 360; Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17, 24 Pac. 695; M'Crea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 460, 30 Am. Dec. 103; Worrall v. Munn, 5 N. Y. 229, 55 Am. Alexander*, 123 App. Div. 1, 107 N. Y. Supp. 422; Boehly v. Mansing, 52 Misc. 382, 102 N. Y. Supp. 171; Caren v. Liebovitz, 113 App. Div. 674, 99 N. Y. Supp. 952 (impliedly); Cheney v. Cook, 7 Wis. 413; Docter v. Hellberg, 65 Wis. 415, 27 N. W. 176.

In Wardell v. Williams, 62 Mich. 50, 4 Am. St. Rep. 814, 28 N. W. 796, recovery was denied in an action at law by the vendee, who did not sign, against the vendor, who did, to recover damages for breach of a contract, because, by the terms of the contract, the vendee was to give back a mortgage on the property. The court likened the case to an agreement for the exchange of lands.

28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In Parish v. Koons, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 79, it was held that specific performance would not lie at the instance of the vendee, who did not sign, against the vendor, who did. The objections to this decision are stated in IV., supra. The right of the vendee, who did not sign, to enforce specific performance against the vendor, who did, was assumed in Re Eargood, 1 Pearson (Pa.) 399 (though specific performance was denied for other reasons), and was expressly held in M'Farson's Appeal, 11 Pa. 503. And in Smith's Appeal, 69 Pa. 475, the right of the vendee who does not sign to specific performance against the vendor who does is clearly recognized. The last case was a suit by the purchasers to enjoin the vendors from cutting timber on the land; but the court said that the question whether the plaintiffs had such a right or title in the land as would sustain the action by them depended on the question whether the contract, which was signed by the vendors only, could have been specifically enforced against the latter; and that question was answered in the affirmative.

So, under the Pennsylvania statute, it has been held that a contract signed by the vendor alone may be set up by the vendee as a defense in an action of ejectment by one claiming under the vendor. Shoofstall v. Adams, 2 Grant, Cas. 209; Brodhead v. Reinbold, 200 Pa. 618, 86 Am. St. Rep. 735, 50 Atl. 229.

And so, in Witman v. Reading, 191 Pa. 134, 43 Atl. 140, it was held that an indorsement, signed by the lessor, upon a lease, of an extension of the lease, though not signed by the lessee, and though the execution of a more formal writing was contemplated, was sufficient to establish the lessee's interest in the land, as against a third person, even assuming that the latter would have the same right as the lessor to plead the statute of limitations.

2. Contracts for sale of goods.

Whether the statute of frauds in relation to the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise employs the phrase of § 17 of the original who has signed a written contract may be compelled specifically to perform it, though the other party has not signed it, if the latter has performed or offers to perform it, on his part, and the case is otherwise proper for enforcing specific performance." Bird v. Potter, 146 Cal. 286, 79 Pac. 970. The decision of this court in Scott v. Glenn, 98 Cal. 168, 32 Pac. 983, must be construed by the light of this principle of mutuality of remedy, where the party not signing seeks the aid of the court. In Scott v. Glenn, the action was by the non-signing vendee to recover the portion of the purchase price paid by him on the vendor's failure to perform. The vendor, by cross complaint, alleged due tender of the deed, and demand and refusal of the payment of the balance due, and asked judgment that plaintiff be compelled to accept the deed, and pay the balance of the purchase price. It was there insisted that the contract was void against the vendee plaintiff because not signed by him. The court said that the vendor was the party to be charged, as he was in the original action, and that his signature to the contract, taken in connection with the delivery thereof to the vendee, and a partial payment thereunder, bound both parties. This was sufficiently accurate, perhaps, for the circumstances of the case, but in fact, while by the original action, the vendor, who had signed, was the party to be charged, by the cross complaint, the vendee, who had not signed, was the party to be charged; and statute, "parties to be charged," or the phrase, "party to be charged," it is clear that a purchaser who has not signed may enforce the contract against the seller, who has signed, although the contract remains wholly executory, and there has been no delivery or part payment to take it out of the operation of the statute. Linton v. Williams, 25 Ga. 391; Smith v. Smith, 8 Blackf. 208; Nebfaska Bridge Supply & Lumber Co. v. Conway, 127 Iowa, 237, 103 N. W. 122; Williams v. Robinson, 73 Me. 186, 40 Am. Rep. 352; Sanborn v. Flagler, 9 Allen, 474; Morrison v. Browne, 191 Mass. 65, 77 N. E. 527; Morin v. Martz, 13 Minn. 191, Gil. 180; Bowers v. Whitney, 88 Minn. 168, 92 N. W. 540; Russell v. Nicoll, 3 Wend. 112, 20 Am. Dec. 670; Davis v. Shields, 26 Wend. 341; Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 494, 1 Am. Rep. 576; Bristol v. Mente, 79 App. Div. 67, 80 N. Y. Supp. 52 (affirmed in 178 N. Y. 599, 70 N. E. 1096); Napier v. French, 8 Jones & S. 122; West v. Newton, 1 Duer, 277; Weidmann v. Champion, 12 Daly, 522; Fenly v. Stewart, 5 Sandf. 101; Brooklyn Oil Refinery Co. v. Brown, 38 How. Pr. 444; Douglass v. Spears, 2 Nott & M'C. 207, 10 Am. Dec. 598; Hodson v. Carter, 3 Pinney (Wis.) 212.

Of course, this would be true even if the courts were of the opinion that the phrase, "party to be charged," or "parties to be charged," means the seller or sellers, irrespective of whether the contract is sought to be enforced by or against them. (See Bailey v. Leishman, 32 Utah, 123, 89 Pac. 78, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1116, supra, III.)

The New York superior court, in Justice v. Lang, 2 Robt. 333, denied recovery in such an action, upon the ground that the contract, note or memorandum, must be signed by both parties; and before that case had been reversed by the court of appeals (42 N. Y. 493, 1 Am. Rep. 576) the decision of the superior court had been followed by other cases in that court (Marcus v. Barnard, 4 Robt. 219; Johnson v. Mulry, 4 Robt. 401; Dilworth v. Bostwick, 1 Sweeney, 581). These cases were, of course, overruled by the decision of the court of appeals in Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 494, 1 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Am. Rep. 576. The latter case again came before the court of appeals (52 N. Y. 323) upon a new appeal, and Allen, J., who wrote the opinion on the new appeal, while disclaiming any intention on the part of the court to modify the decision on the first appeal, that the signing of the contract by the defendant was sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds, took occasion to say that he was inclined to question the correctness of the decision on principle. The decision, however, reversing a judgment for plaintiff, was not upon the ground that the plaintiff had not signed the contract, but that the question whether he had assented to the contract at all as a contract binding on him should, under the facts of the case, have been submitted to the jury, the paper signed by the defendant being unilateral in form as well as execution.

In Roget v. Merritt, 2 Caines, 117, where such an action was maintained, there are intimations in the opinion that the result was referable to the doctrine that the "party to be charged" on such a contract was the seller, and that he had signed. This view, if it was entertained, is contrary to the rule established by many later New York cases.

See also Corbitt v. Salem Gaslight Co. 6 Or. 405, 25 Am. Rep. 541, supra, I., and Lanz v. McLaughlin, 14 Minn. 72, Gil. 55, supra, I., Necessity of actual assent by party who does not sign.

c. Vendor who did sign against vendee who did not.

1. Contracts as to real property.

Under the prevailing view, that the "party to be charged" or the "parties to be charged" is the party or parties against whom the contract is sought to be enforced in the particular action or suit, and not the vendor or owner of the property, as such, it is clear that the fact that the vendor or owner signed the contract, or a note or memorandum thereof, is not sufficient, in the absence of part performance, to enable him to maintain either a suit in equity since the vendee had sought the aid of the court for a recovery growing out of this contract, he made the remedy mutual, and bound himself by his action to abide the judgment of equity upon the whole matter.

But where, as in this case, the contract is wholly executory, and the evidence of it amounts to nothing more than a receipt, signed by the vendor, and the alleged part performance is nothing more than the payment of a small amount of money by the nonsigning vendee, and the acceptance of a receipt therefor, no case can be found which holds such to be sufficient part performance to relieve from the statute of frauds. In precise point upon this matter is Guthrie v. Anderson, supra. The statute of Kansas, in which state the case arose, is or an action at law upon the contract against the other party who did not sign the same.

Thus, under a statute requiring the contract to be signed by the "party to be charged," it has been held or clearly recognized that, in the absence of part performance, a vendor who has signed cannot maintain a suit to enforce specific performance by the vendee of a contract for the purchase of real property. HARPER v. GOLDSCHMIDT; Kingsbury v. Cornelison, 122 Ill. App. 495; Hall v. Misenheimer, 137 N. C. 183, 107 Am. St. Rep. 474, 49 S. E. 104; Moore v. Powell, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 43, 25 S. W. 472; Capeheart v. Hale, 6 W. Va. 547; Steenrod v. Wheeling, P. & B. R. Co. 27 W. Va. 1.

So, under a statute in this form, a suit cannot be maintained to enforce the vendor's lien where the vendee did not sign the contract, or any note or memorandum thereof. Heflin v. Milton, 69 Ala. 354.

Upon its face, Gardels v. Klocke, 36 Neb. 493, 54 N. W. 834, would seem to be authority for the position that the vendor who did sign could maintain a suit against the vendee who did not, to foreclose the contract, as it is stated in effect that the Nebraska statute embodies the provision of the original statute, requiring the contract to be signed by the "party to be charged." This, however, was a mistake, as the requirement of the Nebraska statute was that the contract must be signed by the party by whom the sale is to be made. Under that form of statute, the decision that the vendor could maintain the suit was right (see cases subsequently cited in this subdivision); but if, as the court apparently assumed, the statute had been in the form of the 4th section of the original English statute, the decision would have been against the clear weight of authority, and would have been clearly wrong, unless the court had adopted the Kentucky and Tennessee view of the phrase, "party to be charged."

Under a statute requiring the contract, identical with our own. The necessity of the signature of the party to be charged was pointed out, together with the inapplicability of the decisions of states such as New York and Wisconsin, whose laws differ from our own. It was shown that the statute is satisfied, and the nonsigning defendant is held, where the contract has been executed upon the part of the vendor, or lessor, by the giving of a deed or lease, which has been accepted by the vendee or lessee. Worrall v. Munn, 5 N. Y. 229, 55 Am. Dec. 330; Wilkinson v. Scott, 17 Mam. 249; Wood, Fr. §§ 222, 223. In such a case, the contract has been wholly executed by the one party, and the acceptance of the deed or lease is consistently held to be a sufficient part performance to charge the or note or memorandum thereof, to be signed by the "party to be charged," it has been held or clearly recognized that a vendor who did sign cannot maintain an action at law to recover the purchase price against the vendee who did not sign. Montgomery v. Waldeck, 2 Alaska, 581; Smith v. Jones, 66 Ga. 338, 42 Am. Rep. 72; Wilson v. Miller, 42 Ill. App. 332 (reversed in 146 Ill. 523, 37 Am. St. Rep. 186, 34 N. E. 1111 on another ground); Guthrie v. Anderson, 49 Kan. 416, 30 Pac. 459; O'Donnell v. Brehen, 36 N. J. L. 257; Rice v. Carter, 33 N. C. (11 Ired. L.) 298; Simms v. Killian, 34 N. C. (12 Ired. L.) 253; Love v. Atkinson, 131 N. C. 544, 42 S. E. 966; Miller v. Carolina Monazite Co. 152 N. C. 608, 68 S. E. 1.

It is apparent, however, that if, as in Kentucky, the courts take the view that the phrase, "party to be charged," in relation to a contract concerning real property, means the vendor or owner, the statute is satisfied if the contract is signed by the vendor, although not signed by the vendee; and where this view of the statute prevails, the vendor who has signed may maintain an action or suit on the contract against the vendee who has not signed. This is expressly held in MURRAY v. CRAWFORD; Moore v. Chenault, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 531, 29 S. W. 140 (action for purchase price).

In Garth v. Davis, 120 Ky. 106, 117 Am. St. Rep. 571, 85 S. W. 692, the case was disposed of on the ground that the auctioneer's memorandum bound both parties,—a point not within the scope of this note.

And so, under a statute which in terms provides that the contract shall be signed by the owner or party by whom the sale is to be made, the vendor who has signed may maintain an action or suit against the vendee who has not signed. Ehrmantraut v. Robinson, 52 Minn. 333, 54 N. W. 188; Bleecker v. Franklin, 2 E. D. Smith, 93 (impliedly); Reilly v. Steinhart, 126 App. Div. 909, 110 N. Y. Supp. 1142 (action for purchase price); Wright v. Mischo, 20 Jones & S. 241 (relief denied because not other party. So, also, in case of executory contracts, where the nonsigning vendee enters into possession, or exercises dominion in other ways over the land, it is held that this amounts to such a part performance as will bind the nonsigning vendee. But where the act of the vendee is no more than the payment of a small amount of the purchase price, and the acceptance of a receipt for that amount, leaving all of the rest of the contract executory, both upon his part and upon the part of the vendor, no case has been pointed out which holds such acts to amount to a part performance which will bind the vendee. His refusal "to complete the contract after paying part of the purchase money would be no fraud upon the seller, but his own loss." Fry, Spec.

shown that vendee had accepted instrument as a contract, verbal or otherwise); Earl v. Campbell, 14 How. Pr. 330 (specific performance); Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 213 (implied); Lowber v. Connit, 36 Wis. 176 (specific performance); Vilas v. Dickinson, 13 Wis. 489 (implied); and see Gardels v. Klope, 36 Neb. 493, 54 N. W. 834, supra.

So, under the Pennsylvania statute which requires the writing to be signed by the party granting the interest in real property, it has been held that signing by the vendor alone is sufficient to sustain an action at law by him against the vendee, to recover the purchase money. Lowry v. Mehaffy, 10 Watts, 387; Tripp v. Bishop, 56 Pa. 424; Johnston v. Cowan, 59 Pa. 275.

2. Contracts for sale of goods.

Under a statute requiring the contract, or note or memorandum thereof, for the sale of goods, to be signed by the "party to be charged" or the "parties to be charged," it has been held or clearly recognized that an action cannot be maintained upon the contract, in the absence of part payment or delivery to take the case out of the statute, by the seller of the goods, who did sign, against the purchaser, who did not. Dupuy v. Macleod (Cal.) 33 Pac. 1115 (taken out of the statute by part delivery); Groover v. Warfield, 50 Ga. 644; Newby v. Rogers, 40 Ind. 9; Boardman v. Spooner, 13 Allen, 353, 90 Am. Dec. 106; Becker v. Calmenson, 102 Minn. 406, 113 N. W. 1014; Bailey v. Ogden, 3 Johns, 399, 3 Am. Dec. 509; Rayner v. Linthorne, 2 Car. & P. 124.

Cases like Cook v. Anderson, 20 Ind. 15, in which the action was taken out of the statute of frauds by part payment or delivery, are, of course, not opposed to the decisions in the above cases.

In Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 493, 1 Am. Rep. 576, where the action was by the purchasers, who did not sign, against the sellers, who did sign, and therefore, so far as the decision is concerned, belongs to 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Perf. §. 567. It is held, therefore, that in this case there was no such part performance as the law contemplates.

The questions here presented arose properly, and were properly decided, upon demurrer. "Whenever it appears from the face of the declaration, bill, or complaint, that the agreement sued upon is within the statute of frauds, and fails to comply with the requirements thereof, the appropriate mode of taking advantage of the defect is by demurrer." 9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 704, and cases.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: Melvin, J.; Lorigan, J.

V. b. 2, Lott, J., who spoke for the court, and reached the conclusion, after a long discussion and an elaborate consideration of the cases, that the "parties to be charged" as used in the 17th section of the original statute, and the state statutes modeled thereon, are the party or parties sought to be charged in the suit, and that the statute does not require both parties to sign, remarked, before entering upon the discussion of the objection of want of mutuality which arises in that view of the statute: "It is true that the party who does not sign or subscribe it may not be liable thereon in an action, as to which I deem it unnecessary to express an opinion." It is not clear why the learned justice should have entertained any doubt upon the point. His conclusion that the "parties to be charged" are the parties sought to be charged in the action seems by logical necessity to involve the result that the contract cannot be enforced against the party who did not sign, by the party who did sign.

d. Vendee who did sign against vendor who did not.

It is clear that a vendee who did sign may not, in the absence of part performance taking the case out of the statute of frauds, enforce the contract against the vendor, who did not sign, and this is true whether the court adheres to the doctrine, sustained by the weight of authority, that the "party to be charged" is the party sought to be charged in the action or suit, or whether that view has been abrogated in the particular jurisdiction by statutory provisions requiring the contract to be signed by the owner, or, as in Kentucky and Tennessee, by judicial construction of the phrase, "party to be charged," to mean the vendor or owner. It has been expressly so held in King v. Cheatham, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 1176, 104 S. W. 751; Taylor v. R. D. Scott & Co. 149 Mich. 525, 113 N. W. 32; Haydock v. Stow, 40 N. Y. 363.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

SARAH I. SLATER

v.

EDMUND H. ROCHE.

(— Iowa, —, 126 N. W. 925.)

Action — service by publication — when commenced.

1. In case process is served by publication, the action is not commenced, for the purpose of determining whether or not it is within the time allowed by the statute of limitations, until the publication is completed.

Same — attachment — effect.

2. An action to subject property of a nonresident to payment of a judgment against him is, for the purpose of determining whether or not it is within the time allowed by the statute of limitations, commenced when the property is attached.

Evidence — judicial notice — proceedings in case.

3. To warrant a judgment in a proceeding commenced by attachment, the attachment and return need not be offered in evidence, since the court may take judicial notice of them.

Note. — When action based on service by publication deemed to be commenced, for purpose of statute of limitations.

Little authority has been disclosed upon the question here considered. No case has been found which holds an action to be commenced for this purpose before the filing of the petition and affidavit required in cases of service by publication.

Thus, in Bisbee v. Evans, 17 Fed. 474, an action to foreclose a vendor's lien was held barred by limitations although the complainants' bill was filed before the expiration of the period of limitations, but was not sworn to, or the necessary affidavit for the issuance of a warning order against the nonresident defendant made, until after the expiration of the period of limitations.

And in Bates v. Smith, 80 Tex. 242, 16 S. W. 47, where the plaintiff filed his petition in a suit on a note within the period of limitations, but instructed the clerk not to issue citation until later, on account of negotiations for a settlement, and no citation issued until after the lapse of the period of limitations, the action was held barred. It does not appear clearly, however, whether the citation referred to in this case was by publication.

In Hoffman v. Brungs, 83 Ky. 400, it was held that an action to foreclose a mortgage, claimed to be constructively fraudulent, was commenced within the six months allowed, where a warning order was entered as to a nonresident within that period.

The question of when an action is deemed commenced is regulated by statute in some states.

Limitation of actions — attached property — appearance of owner.

4. The appearance of a nonresident defendant in an action after the limitation period has run will not deprive plaintiff of the right to a judgment against property which he attached within the limitation period, although defendant is no longer subject to a personal judgment.

Same — appearance after bar — effect.

5. The appearance of a nonresident defendant in an action commenced by attachment, after the limitation period has elapsed, does not authorize a personal judgment against him, where process was not served upon him within the limitation period.

(June 16, 1910.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a certain foreign judgment, and to reach certain assets by attachment; defendant appealing from so much of the judgment as subjected the attached property to the payment of the foreign judgment, and plaintiff

Thus, the statute in Indiana provides that a civil action shall be commenced as to those against whom publication is made "from the time of the first publication;" and where the first publication is not made until the expiration of the period of limitations, the action is barred. Wood v. Bissell, 108 Ind. 229, 9 N. E. 425.

So, in Nebraska, the statute provides that an action where service is by publication "shall be deemed commenced at the date of the first publication;" and where the affidavit for service by publication against a nonresident purchaser of property is not filed before the expiration of the two years allowed to foreclose a mechanics' lien, the action is barred. Pickens v. Polk, 42 Neb. 267, 60 N. W. 566.

The Code in Oregon provides that an attempt to commence an action shall be deemed equivalent to its commencement when the complaint is filed and summons delivered, with the intention that it shall be actually served; "but such an attempt shall be followed by the first publication of the summons, or service thereof, within sixty days;" and where the first publication is not attempted until after the expiration of the period of limitations, the action is barred. Dutro v. Ladd, 50 Or. 120, 91 Pac. 459.

The statute in Ohio provides that "where service by publication is proper, the action shall be deemed commenced at the date of the first publication, which publication must be regularly made." Robinson v. Orr, 16 Ohio St. 284. This case does not involve the question of service by publication, but that of service by summons.

appealing from so much as denied a personal judgment for the balance of the amount of the foreign judgment. Affirmed on both appeals.

Statement by Deemer, Ch. J.:

Action aided by attachment upon a foreign judgment. Defendant pleaded the statute of limitations. Upon trial to the court, judgment was rendered subjecting the attached property to the payment of the judgment, but denying a personal judgment against defendant for the remainder. Both parties appeal; but, as defendant first perfected his appeal, he will be called "appellant."

Messrs. Dunshee & Haines and C. R. Dorn, for plaintiff:

For the purposes of the attachment proceeding, the suit was commenced by the levy of the writ of attachment.

It was not necessary that the writ of attachment and notice should be formally offered in evidence, as the court had a right to inspect its own record, and take judicial notice of it on its own motion.

Poole v. Seney, 70 Iowa, 275, 24 N. W. 520, 30 N. W. 634; Conlee Lumber Co. v. Meyer, 74 Iowa, 403, 38 N. W. 117; Dewey v. St. Albans Trust Co. 60 Vt. 1, 6 Am. St. Rep. 84, 12 Atl. 224; Denney v. The first publication of an original notice of suit against a nonresident is a commencement of the suit sufficient to prevent the bar of the statute of limitations.

25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1292; Ross v. Luther, 4 Cow. 158, 15 Am. Dec. 344.

Messrs. Mulvaney & Mulvaney, for defendant:

An action is not deemed commenced wherein service is had by publication, until the publication of notice is completed, and proof thereof is made by the publisher.

Tunis v. Withrow, 10 Iowa, 305, 77 Am. Dec. 117; Littlejohn v. Bulles, 136 Iowa, 150, 113 N. W. 756; Bardsley v. Hines, 33 Iowa, 157.

The writ of attachment, with the return thereof, must be introduced in evidence; otherwise there can be no competent evidence before the court upon which to render judgment, as the return of the writ constitutes the statutory evidence as to what was done thereunder.

Rock v. Singmaster, 62 Iowa, 511, 17 N. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

W. 744; McDonald v. Moore, 65 Iowa, 171, 21 N. W. 504; 4 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 606, 607.

An attachment being merely a mode of security, if the original debt becomes extinguished, then the security must fail also, the same rule applying as in the case of a mortgage and the note or debt for which the same is given.

Clinton County v. Cox, 37 Iowa, 570; Brown v. Rockhold, 49 Iowa, 282.

A writ of attachment is not to compel the payment of a debt, but to secure a lien upon the defendant's property for the payment of any judgment which the plaintiff may recover in the main suit against him.

Carothers v. Click, Morris (Iowa) 54; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 187.

Deemer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant was rendered by a district court of the state of Minnesota on the 8th day of December, 1897, for the sum of $416.28. On the 23d day of November, 1907, plaintiff filed a petition in the district court of Polk county, Iowa, in which she asked judgment for the amount of the Minnesota judgment, with interest and costs. Alleging that defendant was a non-resident of the state, she asked and obtained a writ of attachment against the property of the defendant, which writ was issued, and upon the same day levied upon certain property of the defendant in Polk county, Iowa. Notice of the levy was immediately served upon the manager of a company in which defendant was interested. On November 26, 1907, a proper affidavit for publication of notice was filed, and on the 24th day of December proof of publication of notice was filed in the Polk county district court. The affidavit of publication showed that the notice was published November 27, December 4, December 11, and December 18, 1907. April 11, 1908, plaintiff filed an amendment to her petition and also a supplemental petition, and on May 4, 1908, she filed another amended and supplemental petition. Defendant appeared and filed answer October 31, 1908, in which, among other things, he pleaded the statute of limitations. He also pleaded a Minnesota statute reading as follows: "No action shall be maintained upon a judgment or decree of a court of the United States, or of any state or territory thereof, unless begun within ten years after the entry of such judgment." Rev. Laws 1905, chap. 77, § 4075.

A demurrer to defendant's answer and plea of abatement was overruled, and thereupon plaintiff filed a reply, in which, among other things, she pleaded a statute of Minnesota reading as follows: "If, when a cause of action accrues against a person, he is out of the state, an action may be commenced within the times herein limited after his return to the state; and if, after a cause of action accrues, he departs from and resides out of the state, the time of his absence is not part of the time limited for the commencement of the action." Rev. Laws, § 4082. She further averred that, after the rendition of said judgment, the defendant departed from the state of Minnesota, and was absent from said state several years, by reason of which plaintiff's cause of action on said judgment was never fully barred by the laws of the state of Minnesota. Upon these issues the case was tried to the court, a jury being waived, resulting in a judgment condemning the attached property, and ordering it subjected to the payment of plaintiff's judgment for the sum of $704.93, but denying plaintiff's prayer for personal judgment.

Appellant contends that, under the Minnesota statute first quoted, plaintiff's action was fully barred, and that the trial court erred in subjecting the attached property to the payment of the Minnesota judgment. Plaintiff contends that the court erred in not rendering personal judgment against the defendant for the full amount of the Minnesota judgment, with interest and costs. It is conceded that, at all times material to our inquiry, defendant was a non-resident of this state, and it is also conceded that, if this action was not commenced within ten years from the time of the rendition of the Minnesota judgment, this action is barred. Completed service of notice by publication was not had until December 18, 1907, which was more than ten years after the rendition of the Minnesota judgment, although the first two publications were made within that time. However, the writ of attachment was issued, levied, and returned within the ten years, although defendant did not personally appear until some months after the expiration of the ten-year period. It is contended that action was not commenced until the completion of the service of notice by publication. This seems to be the rule established by this court. Littlejohn v. Bulles, 136 Iowa, 150, 113 N. W. 756; Bardsley v. Hines, 33 Iowa, 157. Neither the filing of the petition nor of the affidavit for publication in themselves amounted to the commencement of the action, and, as completed service was not had until the expiration of the ten-year period, plaintiff's action is barred, unless it be for the fact that an attachment was sued out and levied upon defendant's property in this state before the expiration of the ten-year period. We have held that, where an action is aided by attachment, it is to be deemed commenced when the petition is filed. Hargan v. Burch, 8 Iowa, 309. Again, in Sweatt v. Faville, 23 Iowa, 321, which was an action for an injunction, it was held that the action was commenced "at least when the writ was served," and was not barred although no notice was delivered to the sheriff or served within the statutory period. In Lacey v. Newcomb, 95 Iowa, 287, 63 N. W. 704, we held that the filing of a claim with an assignee for the benefit of creditors was the commencement of an action, and stopped the running of the statute of limitations. So, also, it has been held that the filing of a note with an administrator of an estate is the commencement of a suit. Fritz v. Fritz, 93 Iowa, 27, 61 N. W. 169. These cases by analogy point the way to the decision of this appeal. This action was to subject the property of a non-resident to the payment of a foreign judgment. It could only be done by attaching the property,—the res,—and when that was done the action was commenced within the meaning of the limitation statutes. Moreover, defendant's agent and manager was served with notice of the levy. We are constrained to hold that the action, in so far as it was brought to subject property to the payment of the judgment, was commenced when the property was levied upon, if not before, and that it is not barred by the statute.

2. But the appellant contends that plaintiff did not offer the writ of attachment or the return of the officer thereon in evidence, and that for this reason the trial court was in error in rendering any kind of judgment in the case. The writ was issued in the case on trial, and plaintiff was relying upon the issuance and service thereof in support of her claim. The trial court found that a writ was issued, and in its judgment copied the return made by the sheriff. It does not appear that defendant made the point upon which it now relies in the trial court; but if it did, no ground for reversal on this score appears. The court was justified in taking judicial notice of all the papers properly issued and filed or returned in the case. That it did take such notice is apparent from the record. This question of the right and duty of the court to take judicial notice of the papers and proceedings in the case on trial is fully considered in the recent case of Haaren v. Mould (Iowa) 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 404, 122 N. W. 921. See also Poole v. Seney, 70 Iowa, 275, 24 N. W. 520, 30 N. W. 634; State v. Olds, 106 Iowa, 114, 76 N. W. 644; Kenosha Stove Co. v. Shedd, 82 Iowa, 544,

48 N. W. 933; Conlee Lumber Co. v. Meyer, 74 Iowa, 403, 38 N. W. 117.

The trial court found that the levy of the writ of attachment was sufficient to stop the running of the statute in so far as the attachment was concerned, but insufficient in so far as personal judgment was sought against the defendant, who was a nonresident. Defendant did not personally appear until after the statute of Minnesota had fully barred the claim, and he pleaded that statute as a bar to the cause of action. It was only by reason of his personal appearance that judgment might be rendered against him. At that time, however, the action against him personally was barred; hence, plaintiff had no right to a personal judgment. But it does not follow that plaintiff was not entitled to subject the property attached to the payment of the judgment. The action, in so far as the attachment is concerned, was in rem, or quasi in rem. In other words, it was an action to subject the property of a nonresident to the payment of a foreign judgment against him. This action, as we have seen, was commenced in time, and could proceed to judgment even though defendant did not appear. So that whether he appeared or not, plaintiff was entitled to subject the property. Defendant's appearance gave him no greater rights in this respect than if he had not appeared. Upon appearance, plaintiff would be entitled to personal judgment against him unless the right thereto was barred; but his appearance did not deprive plaintiff of the right to proceed with the attachment. As that action was not barred, the property could be subjected to the payment of the debt, although, by reason of the statute of limitations, no personal judgment could be obtained against the defendant. Defendant's counsel reason in a circle when they say that the attachment cannot be sustained, for the reason that there is no debt which can be enforced against the defendant. When the action was commenced, there was a debt which could be made the basis of an attachment suit, and nothing which defendant might do or fail to do would affect plaintiff's right to subject the property. Upon the levy of the writ, that right became fixed; and the statute, in so far as the right to subject the property to the payment of the debt is concerned, was suspended and ceased to run. It is not necessary that the debt be enforceable as a personal claim in order to justify the subjection of property to the payment thereof. If the action had been against a resident of this state, perhaps a different rule might apply. Upon that question we make no pronouncement at this time.

holding of the trial court that she was not entitled to personal judgment against the defendant for the full amount of the Minnesota judgment, with interest and costs. Unless the action was commenced in time, so that the statute of limitations did not bar the claim, the holding of the trial court was correct. Defendant's personal appearance was the only justification for a personal judgment against him, and as this was after the judgment was barred, no personal judgment could properly be rendered. Neither the filing of the affidavit for publication nor the two publications of notice amounted to the commencement of the action for any purpose. If publication of notice be sufficient to arrest the running of the statute upon a personal claim,—a point which we do not decide,—such publication must be complete before the action may properly be said to have been commenced. Ordinarily an action is "commenced" by the service of notice; and the service contemplated is a completed one. For the purpose of the statute of limitations, other things may be regarded as the commencement of the suit, as the delivery of the notice to the sheriff, with intent that it be served immediately, as provided in § 3450 of the Code. But there is no provision for treating any step short of completed service as the commencement of an action where the service is by publication. The trial court was right in denying plaintiff a personal judgment against the defendant.

No error appears, and the judgment must be, and it is, affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

FRANCES A. BROWN, Plff. in Err.,

v.

THOMAS F. HUBER et al.

(80 Ohio St. 183, 88 N. E. 322.)

Deed — restrictive covenant — validity — injunction.

1. A covenant in a deed of conveyance, whereby the grantor, in part consideration for said conveyance, stipulates and agrees for himself, his heirs, and assigns, touching and concerning an adjacent lot which he then owns, "that the only building put upon said lot shall be a residence and the necessary attachments, and that it shall be used for no other purposes than that of a family residence, and shall cost not less than $5,000 for the residence alone," is a covenant binding on the grantor and all persons claiming under him with notice of the same, and its observance may, in equity, be enforced by injunction.

Injunction — deed — restrictive covenant — violation.

2. Where such covenant or restriction is still of substantial value to the dominant lot, notwithstanding the changed condition of the neighborhood in which said lot is situated, a court of equity will restrain its violation.

I. Scope and introduction.

The cases falling within the scope of this note start with the assumption that no difficulty stands in the way of granting equitable relief against the violation of the restriction sought to be enforced, other than that arising from changes in the character of the locality, due either to the act or default of the complainant or his predecessors in title, or to causes beyond their control.

Consequently, although cases in which the change, while caused by the complainant or his predecessors, did not involve a violation of the same general restriction, are included, those in which the complainant himself had been guilty of violating the restriction which he was seeking to enforce

Statement by Crew, Ch. J.:

This was a suit in equity commenced by plaintiff in error in the court of common pleas of Lucas county, Ohio, to enjoin the construction and maintenance of certain buildings upon property located on Ashland avenue in the city of Toledo. The trial of the case in the court of common pleas resulted in a finding and judgment in favor of the defendants. Plaintiff thereupon appealed said cause to the circuit court, where, on a hearing upon the pleadings and evidence, that court made the following finding of facts:

Finding of Facts.

(1) Prior to October 4, 1871, Barnett T. Scott was the owner and in possession of a against others, and in which relief was denied upon the ground that he had not come into court with clean hands, are excluded. As instances of this sort, mention may be made of such cases as Compton-Hill Improv. Co. v. Tower, 158 Mo. 282, 59 S. W. 239; Olcott v. Sheppard, K. & Co. 96 App. Div. 281, 89 N. Y. Supp. 201 (affirmed without opinion in 185 N. Y. 584, 78 N. E. 1108); and Schubert v. Eastman Realty Co. 25 Ohio C. C. 336. Nor does this note include cases in which the change in the neighborhood has been produced by the violations complained of, and relief is denied on the ground of laches.

Nor does it include cases in which the change in the character of the neighborhood has been held to mark the limit of the duration of the restriction, as where it is held to apply only to the buildings in contemplation at the time it was imposed,—such as Hamlen v. Keith, 171 Mass. 77, 50 N. E. 462; and American Unitarian Assn. v. Minot, 185 Mass. 589, 71 N. E. 551.

Another class of cases which do not properly fall within the scope of this note are those in which the change in the neighborhood consists in the abandonment of an affirmative easement, which thereby terminates the corresponding servitude. See, for example, Bangs v. Potter, 135 Mass. 245.

As has been remarked by some courts, it is not possible to reconcile all that has been said in the cases that have discussed this subject. The resulting decisions, however, generally may be harmonized by reference to the status of the complainant and to the purpose of the covenant sought to be enforced. With reference to their purpose, negative covenants restricting the right of a purchaser to use the land purchased may be considered as falling under the three classes enumerated by Farwell, J., in Osborne v. Bradley [1903] 2 Ch. 446: (1) Where the covenant is entered into simply for the vendor's own benefit; (2) where the covenant is for the benefit of the vendor in his capacity of owner of a particular property; (3) where the covenant is for the benefit of the vendor in so far as he reserves unsold property, and also for the benefit of other tract of land in the city of Toledo, Ohio, which he platted into nine lots, under the name of Barnett T. Scott's First Addition. At the time of the platting of this property, there were only one or two buildings in the neighborhood. At the time of the platting of the property and the selling of it as hereinafter found, no building restrictions of any kind whatsoever were placed upon any of the lots, except lots 1 and 2 as hereinafter found. At the time of the platting of the property for sale, no general plan of improvement was intended or undertaken by Mr. Scott. Since the first platting, this property has been replatted to make the lines of the lots conform to the lines of ownership. The plaintiff is the owner of lot No. 3, which she acquired as hereinafter set forth. The defendant Roger Huber is the owner of lot No. 2, which he acquired as hereinafter set forth.

(2) On the 4th day of October, 1871, said Barnett T. Scott and wife conveyed by duly executed warranty deed to one Mary I. Kelley, lot three (3) in said Barnett T. Scott's First Addition to the city of Toledo, according to the terms of the deed, the body of which is as follows:

Know all men by these presents: That I, Barnett T. Scott, of the city of Toledo, Lucas County, Ohio, in consideration of three thousand two hundred ($3,200) dollars to me paid by Mary I. Kelley, of the same place, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby bargain, sell, and purchasers as part of what is called a building scheme. It is readily apparent that the same change in the locality which would render accomplishment of the end aimed at in covenants of the third class impossible might not furnish a valid reason for declining to enforce an identical restriction imposed for the benefit of the grantor personally or of his remaining property.

The further general observation may be made that the courts of this country appear to be disposed to go further than the English courts in denying relief on the ground of change in the character of the locality. They seem, in some instances at least, inclined to strike a balance between the benefit to the complainant and the detriment to the defendant which would result from the enforcement of the restriction, irrespective of whether the successive owners of the property affected by the restriction have been in any way responsible for the change in conditions; while the English view seems to be that the question of relative advantage does not arise unless there is a personal equity against the person seeking to enforce the restriction.

This may be illustrated by reference to the opinion rendered in the case of Osborne v. Bradley, supra, in which Farwell, J., after dividing negative covenants restricting the right of a purchaser to use the land purchased, into the three classes above mentioned, said: "To all three classes the rule enunciated by Lord Cairns in Doherty v. Allman, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 719, applies,—that is to say, where there are negative covenants which are binding on the defendant, the court has, speaking generally, no discretion to consider the balance of convenience or matters of that nature, but is bound to give effect to the contract between the parties, unless the plaintiff seeking to enforce the covenant has by his own conduct, or by that of the persons through whom he claims, become disentitled to sue."

Cas. 101; and Craig v. Greer [1899] 1 Ir. Ch. 258.

It may be said in favor of the American view, that it recognizes a certain public policy that land shall not be unnecessarily burdened with permanent or long-continued restrictions; and in favor of the English view it may be said that it does not deprive persons to whom no default is attributable of the benefit of a valid contractual obligation.

II. Inapplicability of doctrine in law.

As remarked in a recent English case: "Contractual obligations do not disappear as circumstances change;" and there is no dissent from the proposition that only the granting of equitable relief, and not the binding force of the restrictive covenant, is affected by a change in the character of the neighborhood.

A change of circumstances cannot be considered, on a petition at law to ascertain the limits of a restriction in a deed, as equitable ground for not enforcing it. Welch v. Austin, 187 Mass. 256, 68 L.R.A. 189, 72 N. E. 972.

And the covenant will not for that reason, and in advance of a breach, be declared a nullity in a suit instituted by the covenantor. Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190.

Nor will such change present an answer to any action at law which may be brought by one interested in the covenant for damages sustained by reason of its violation. Kountze v. Helmuth, 67 Hun, 343, 22 N. Y. Supp. 204 (affirmed on other grounds in 140 N. Y. 432, 35 N. E. 656).

III. Change due to act or default of complainant or his predecessor.

a. In general.

A leading case upon the question of the discussion is that of Bedford v. British Museum, 2 Myl. & K. 552, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 702. In that case the Duke of Bedford, desiring to protect his manor house upon sell-convey to the said Mary I. Kelley, her heirs, and assigns forever, the following real estate, viz.: Lot number three (3) in Barnett T. Scott's First Addition to the city of Toledo, Lucas County, Ohio. And the said Barnett T. Scott hereby covenants and agrees for himself, his heirs, assigns, executors, and administrators, that neither he, his heirs, or assigns will at any time erect upon lot number two (2) of said Scott's First Addition to the city of Toledo, thereon, any building nearer than sixty (60) feet to the southwesterly line of Adams street, and that the only buildings put upon said lot shall be a residence and the necessary attachments, and that it shall be used for no other purpose than that of a family residence, and shall not cost less than $5,000 for the residence alone; together with the privileges and appurtenances to the same belonging. To have and to hold the same to the said Mary I. Kelley, her heirs, and assigns forever, I hereby covenanting that the title so conveyed is clear, free, and unencumbered, and that I will warrant and defend the same against all claims whatsoever, except taxes of A. D. 1871. And I, Clara M. Scott, wife of the said Barnett T. Scott, in consideration of $1 to me in hand paid, do promise, release, and forever quitclaim unto the said grantee all my right, by way of dower or otherwise, in and to the above granted premises. In witness whereof, the said Barnett T. Scott, and Clara M. Scott, his wife, hereunto set our hands this

ing an adjacent tract of land, the purchaser of which contemplated the building of a family mansion, imposed certain restrictions as to the buildings to be erected. Many years thereafter, a portion of the grantor's property which was originally intended not to be built upon, having been built up in the meantime, a subsequent duke sought to restrain the trustees of the British Museum, who had become the proprietors of the restricted property, from extending their buildings contrary to the restrictive covenant. It was held that the situation of the property having been so altered by the acts of the plaintiff and his predecessors as to render enforcement of the restriction oppressive, he should be deemed voluntarily to have waived and abandoned all that control which was applicable to the property in its former state.

In German v. Chapman, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 271, it is said that if there is a general scheme for the benefit of a great number of persons, and then, either by permission or acquiescence or by a long chain of things, the property has been either entirely or so substantially changed as that the whole character of the place or neighborhood has been altered, so that the whole object for which the covenant was originally entered into must be considered to be at an end, then the covenantee is not allowed to come into the court for the purpose merely of harassing and annoying some particular man, where the court can see he is not doing it bona fide for the purpose of effecting the object for which the covenant was originally entered into.

In Star Brewery Co. v. Primas, 163 Ill. 652, 45 N. E. 145, it is said that, it is, as a general thing, where the acts of the grantor or those deriving their title under him have altered the character and condition of the adjoining lands, so as to make the restriction of the covenant inapplicable according to the intent and spirit of the contract, that courts of equity refuse to interfere by injunction to prevent a breach of the covenant, and leave the parties to their remedy at law.

51 L.R.A. 310, 57 N. E. 1051, it is said that equity will not as a rule enforce a restriction where, by the acts of the grantor who imposed it, or of them who derive title under him, the property and that in the vicinage has so changed in its character and environment and in the uses to which it may be put as to make it unfit or unprofitable for use if the restriction be enforced, or where, to grant the relief would be a great hardship on the owner and of no benefit to the complainant, or where the complainant has waived or abandoned the restriction; or in short, it may be said that where, from all of the evidence, it appears that it would be against equity to enforce the restriction by injunction, relief will be denied, and the party seeking its enforcement will be left to whatever remedy he may have at law.

In Loud v. Pendergast, 206 Mass. 122, 92 N. E. 40, it is said that where there has been no uniform observance of the restrictions and substantially all the landowners affected thereby have so conducted themselves as to indicate an abandonment of the right, which is in the nature of an easement, to have the neighborhood kept to the standard established by the original plan, and where the enforcement of the restriction against the defendant would not tend materially to restore to the district the character impressed upon it by the scheme, and the infraction complained of does not diminish the value of other estates, then it would be inequitable and oppressive to compel at great loss a compliance with the restrictions—especially where the restrictive covenant has only a few years more to run.

In Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190, it is said that where specific enforcement of a covenant is sought, it is both the right and duty of the court to look at the conduct of the parties to the litigation, and also at the conduct of their predecessors in right and duty, to see how they dealt with each other in respect to the covenant, and also to contrast the condition of the property when the litigation arose with its condition when the covenant was made, and then either decree or deny the 4th day of October in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-one.

Barnett T. Scott. [Seal.]

Clara M. Scott. [Seal.]

Signed, acknowledged, and delivered in the presence of:

James Kelley.

Chas. M. Lang.

Said deed was duly recorded in volume 69 of Deeds, page 405, Lucas County, Ohio, Records. Within a year after said 4th day of October, 1871, said Barnett T. Scott and wife also conveyed to said Mary I. Kelley by duly executed warranty deed, (20) feet off the northerly side of lot two (2) running the same width from front to rear of said lot in said Barnett T. Scott's First Addition. All of said premises so acquired by said Kelley making a total of 120 feet front by an average depth of 318 feet on Adams street, and now known as Ashland avenue in the said city of Toledo.

(3) On the 8th day of August, 1873, Barnett T. Scott and wife conveyed by duly executed warranty deed the southeasterly 80 feet of lot two (2) and the northwesterly 20 feet of lot one (1) of Barnett T. Scott's First Addition to Toledo, Ohio, to one Samuel B. Wood. The body of which deed is as follows:

Know all men by these presents: That Barnett T. Scott, of Toledo, Ohio, in consideration of six thousand dollars ($6,000) to me paid by Samuel B. Wood aforesaid, specific performance as should appear to be most in accordance with justice and right under all the circumstances of the case.

In Brown v. Wrightman, 5 Cal. App. 391, 90 Pac. 467, it was held that the grantor of a tract of land conveyed subject to the condition that the grant should become void if the business of selling intoxicating liquors or keeping a house of prostitution was conducted on the premises was precluded from claiming a forfeiture for breach of such condition by his action in selling portions of another tract, separated from the property first granted by a street, without restricting or limiting the use of the premises, which were devoted to the prohibited uses, and in leasing other parcels with the understanding that they were to be used for such purposes, with the result that the district in which both of such tracts of land were situated ceased to be a respectable residence neighborhood.

In Chippewa Lumber Co. v. Tremper, 75 Mich. 36, 4 L.R.A. 373, 13 Am. St. Rep. 420, 42 N. W. 532, it was held that a condition inserted in deeds of village lots by the corporation owning the plat, which provided for the forfeiture of the lots in case intoxicating liquor should be sold thereon within thirty years, would not be enforced where it appeared that the corporation had permitted its secretary and business manager to sell liquor as a beverage within the village, and that the conditions were inserted for the purpose of creating a monopoly for his benefit in the business of selling liquor therein.

b. Failure to carry out scheme.

1. In general.

Equity will not enjoin the breach of a restriction or condition imposed as a part of a general plan for the benefit of a locality, if the original plan has been abandoned or the right waived. Curtis v. Rubin, 244 Ill. 88, 91 N. E. 84.

Equity will not lend its aid to enforce restrictions in deeds inserted in pursuance of a scheme of improvement which has afterward been abandoned, or where the circumstances surrounding the property have so entirely changed in other respects as to render enforcement inequitable. Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54; Scharer v. Pantler, 127 Mo. App. 433, 105 S. W. 668.

2. What amounts to.

In Curtis v. Rubin, 244 Ill. 88, 91 N. E. 84, it was held that where it was thoroughly proved that the original building line, established for the benefit of a number of lots, had been abandoned, and the restriction disregarded by all the complainants, except one on the opposite side of the street, who made no protest or objection to what was done by the others, equity would not interpose to prevent the defendants from erecting a building extending beyond the building line to a greater extent than those of the complainants.

In Duncan v. Central Pass. R. Co. 85 Ky. 525, 4 S. W. 228, it was held, where the owner of a tract of land conveyed a portion of it by deed restricting its use to residential purposes, but subsequently sold a number of lots without any restriction, that, although no buildings had been erected upon any of the lots, the general scheme had, by the grantor's own permission and conduct, been so changed, and the condition of the property so altered, that it was liable to be defeated at the pleasure of others, and might in fact be regarded as impossible of fulfilment; and, therefore, that a court of equity would not interfere.

In Jenks v. Pawlowski, 98 Mich. 110, 22 L.R.A. 863, 39 Am. St. Rep. 522, 56 N. W. 1105, it was held that a vendor of property upon the condition that no intoxicating liquors should be sold thereon cannot maintain a suit to enjoin the sale of liquor in violation of such condition, where he subsequently sold adjoining premises without restriction, which were used for such purpose.

3. What does not amount to.

In Reilly v. Otto, 108 Mich. 330, 66 N. W. 228, it was held that a restriction in a the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby bargain, sell, and convey to the said Samuel B. Wood, his heirs, and assigns forever, the following real estate, viz.: Situate in the state of Ohio, county of Lucas, and city of Toledo, and described as the southeasterly eighty (80) feet of lot 2 and the northwesterly twenty (20) feet of lot 1 of Barnett T. Scott's First Addition to Toledo, fronting 100 feet on Adams street, and running back the same width till it meets the east line of the 20-foot alley and the south side of the 16-foot alley laid out in the plat of said addition, subject, however, to all the conditions as to location of building, etc., contained in the deed from said Scott to Mary I. Kelley of lot 3 in said addition. And said Scott also hereby makes the same agreement for himself, his heirs, assigns, executors, and administrators concerning so much of lot 1 as remains in him after this conveyance as is contained in said last-mentioned deed, together with the privileges and appurtenances to the same belonging. To have and to hold the same to the said Samuel B. Wood, his heirs, and assigns forever, I hereby covenanting that the title so conveyed is clear, free, and unincumbered, and that I will warrant and defend the same against all claims whatsoever. And I, Clara M. Scott, wife of the said Barnett T. Scott, in consideration of $1 to me in hand paid, do remise, release, and forever quitclaim unto the said grantee, all my right, by way of dower or otherwise, in and to the above deed that there should not be placed or erected on the premises conveyed any store, and only dwelling houses, could not be considered as having been waived by a grantor by his conveyance of adjoining property without any restrictions as to buildings or business, and his leasing a store opposite for a saloon, where it appeared that the lease and the contracts for the sale of the unrestricted property were made before the deed containing the restriction, and the evidence showed that his purpose in buying the land sold under restriction was to prevent the erection of a saloon there, and to protect his store on the next corner and his residence property in the next block from thereby being depreciated in value.

The fact that two lots were sold without restrictions will not be regarded as inconsistent with the general scheme of the grantor, where one of these was sold before the plan was made, and the other was so small as to have been useless if the building line restriction had been placed upon it. Bacon v. Sandberg, 179 Mass. 396, 60 N. E. 936.

c. Acquiescence in violations of restriction.

1. Generally.

In Roper v. Williams, Turn. & R. 18, Lord Eldon declined to enjoin the breach of a covenant that the buildings to be erected upon the premises conveyed should be detached houses of a certain class, built in a line 30 feet from an intended road, where the covenantee had acquiesced in a partial deviation from the plan, saying that, while the covenantee might have a good case for damages at law, yet, having taken away the benefit of his general plan from some of his grantees, he cannot with any justice come into equity for an injunction. "It is not a question of mere acquiescence; but in every instance in which the grantor suffers grantees to deviate from a general plan intended for the benefit of all, he deprives others of the right which he had given them to have the general plan enforced for the benefit of all. In such cases I have always understood this court will leave the parties to their remedy at law."

And in Peek v. Matthews, L. R. 3 Eq. 515, it was held that a grantor of a number of lots subject to a restriction against building upon certain portions of the respective lots purchased was precluded, by his failure to enforce such restriction against others of his grantees, from enforcing it against the defendant; and that it made no difference that the covenant was also a covenant between all the purchasers inter se, or that the defendant executed his deed after the breach by the other covenanting parties had been committed.

In Ocean City Asso. v. Chalfant, 65 N. J. Eq. 156, 55 Atl. 801, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 601, it is said that the recognized doctrine is, where the vendor sells off an estate in lots with restrictions upon the use of the lots sold, he will lose his right in equity to enforce the restrictions against one grantee if he has knowingly permitted other grantees to violate the same restrictions, the effect of which violation is to abrogate the purpose of the restriction and alter the general scheme intended to be conserved by it; and that this rule is applicable whether the suit is brought by the covenantee or by one of several grantees of land sold in accordance with the general scheme by the original covenantee. It rests upon the equitable ground that if anyone who has a right to enforce the covenant, and so preserve the conditions which the covenant was designed to keep unaltered, shall acquiesce in a material alteration of those conditions, he cannot thereafter ask the court of equity to assist him in preserving them, although if the complainant is in privity with the defendant he may have his action at law for the breach.

And in Bowen v. Smith (N. J. Eq.) 74 Atl. 675, it is said to be well settled that the equitable right to enforce restrictive covenants may be lost by a degree of acquiescence in their violation amounting to an abandonment of the right of the complainant.

The court will not specifically enforce a granted premises. In witness whereof, the said Barnett T. Scott and wife, Clara M. Scott, hereunto set their hands this 8th day of August, in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-three (1873).

restrictive covenant in the sense or with the meaning of the covenant as practically but erroneously construed and acted on by the complainants and the lot owners other than defendants, where defendants have not adopted or acted on such practical construction, since in such case the rights of complainants against them must depend solely on the covenant or agreement. Righter v. Winters, 68 N. J. Eq. 252, 59 Atl. 770.

See also, as to the effect of an erroneous practical construction, Morrow v. Hasselman, 69 N. J. Eq. 612, 61 Atl. 369; Brigham v. H. G. Mulock Co. 74 N. J. Eq. 287, 70 Atl. 185, under heading, "Under what circumstances not a bar," infra.

Acquiescence in the breach of a covenant by other grantees of the common grantor will not deprive a lot owner of the right to enforce a restrictive covenant, so long as it remains of any value to him. Lattimer v. Livermore, 72 N. Y. 174.

While a building line restriction will be enforced if a departure from it would result in the erection of houses on lines out of harmony with the general character of the neighborhood, yet where an enforcement would make a departure with reference to the building lines from the general location of the surrounding buildings, and if it would deprive the owner of an opportunity to improve his land as the adjacent lands have been improved, then a court of equity will not interfere. Roth v. Jung, 79 App. Div. 1, 79 N. Y. Supp. 823.

In Righter v. Winters, supra, where it appeared that other lot owners had built bay windows and piazzas extending beyond the building line, and that defendant's structure had not destroyed or substantially affected the general symmetry of the block of houses, it was held that under the circumstances a specific enforcement of the restrictive covenant would be inequitable; but that complainants should be left to their remedy at law.

2. As affected by materiality of violation.

sold all the property in this addition without placing any building restrictions whatsoever upon any of the lots, save and except the restrictions upon lots 1 and 2 as above found. At the time of the sale of lot No. 3 to Mary I. Kelley, no restriction whatsoever was placed upon the use of lot No. 3, and no restriction has been placed thereon since. The present owner of lot No. 1 has joined with the defendants in this case in making the improvement hereinafter found to be in process of construction. In the year 1872 said Mary I. Kelley constructed a large residence and barn upon lot No. 3, which cost over $25,000. The residence fronts upon Ashland avenue, and is not nearer the street line than 60 feet and is 50 feet from the dividing line between lot No. 3 and lot Eq. 156, 55 Atl. 801, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 601, it was said that the question of waiver of the right to enforce a restrictive covenant by permitted violations of the covenant is dependent upon the character and materiality of the permitted breach; and that while the doctrine of waiver applies both to covenants restricting erections upon, or a permanent physical change in, the property subject to restriction, and to covenants restricting the use of the property for certain occupations, the propriety of the enforcement of the doctrine in particular instances may differ in each. This results from the fact that breaches of the first class usually permanently change the conditions which the covenant was designed to perpetuate, while breaches of the second class do not necessarily have that result. It is only when the person in whom the right to enforce the covenant resides has permitted such infringement of its provisions as results in alteration that cannot be corrected, or which it is manifest there is no intention to have corrected, that he is precluded from further enforcing the covenant. When, however, the known breach consists in introducing upon the property some occupation interdicted by the covenant, and no considerable amount of money has been expended in fitting the property for a particular business, or the character of the business is such that it constitutes an inconsiderable alteration of the conditions which the parties had in view, then waiver of the right to restrain other and more considerable breaches may not result.

The materiality of the violations is to be determined by the circumstances of each case, and the question seems to be whether they are such as to indicate an abandonment of the original general plan and make its enforcement inequitable because of the changed condition of the property under restriction. Morrow v. Hasselman, 69 N. J. Eq. 617, 61 Atl. 369.

Violation of building restrictions will not prevent their enforcement if the violations are immaterial, and such as do not prevent the general plan from being carried out. Hyman v. Tash (N. J. Eq.) 71 Atl. 742.

No. 2; in other words, 50 feet from the line of the defendants' property. The residence was occupied by Mrs. Kelley and her family for some years, and was later acquired and taken over by a mortgagee, the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, and for a time stood vacant. In 1904 this property was purchased by plaintiff, Frances A. Brown, for $11,000, and has been improved by her at a cost of several thousand dollars. Since said time the plaintiff and her family have been living in the property. The house is a large, old-fashioned residence. The living rooms, to wit, the parlor, sitting room, and dining room, are on the southerly side of said residence, next to the premises conveyed to said Wood; and the barn is located upon the rear of the premises about 90 feet from the said party line. Said buildings are still upon said premises in good order and condition. The premises have never been used except for residence purposes.

(5) Prior to the 1st day of April, 1905, the premises described in finding of fact No. 3 were willed by Samuel B. Wood, deceased, to his wife, Minerva Wood, and upon said date were duly conveyed by deed duly executed by Jethro G. Mitchell, trustee under the will of Minerva Wood, to the defendant Roger Huber. Prior to said date these premises were never improved, except by fencing. Before said Huber improved these premises, as hereinafter stated, he was notified by T. P. Brown, the husband of plaintiff, of the terms of the building restrictions afore-

Equity will not decline to enforce a building restriction on the ground of its violation by some of the grantees affected thereby, where there has not been any such change in the character of the neighborhood as to defeat the original purpose and design of the covenants. Bowen v. Smith (N. J. Eq.) 74 Atl. 675; Adams v. Howell, 58 Misc. 435, 108 N. Y. Supp. 945.

See also German v. Chapman, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 271; Knight v. Simmonds [1896] 2 Ch. 294; Tripp v. O'Brien, 57 Ill. App. 407; Bacon v. Sandberg, 179 Mass. 396, 60 N. E. 936; Loud v. Pendergast (Mass.) 92 N. E. 40; Waters v. Collins (N. J. Eq.) 70 Atl. 984; McGuire v. Caskey, 62 Ohio St. 419, 57 N. E. 53, 19 Atl. 190, hereinafter set out under heading, "Under what circumstances not a bar," infra.

3. Where other violations not injurious to complainant.

A person entitled to enforce a restrictive covenant may take no notice of violations not especially offensive to him, without losing the right to enforce the restrictions in the case of a specially offensive violation. Knight v. Simmonds [1896] 2 Ch. 294; Osborne v. Bradley [1903] 2 Ch. 446; Craig v. Greer [1899] 1 Ir. Ch. 258; Barton v. Slifer, 72 N. J. Eq. 812, 66 Atl. 899; Rowland v. Miller, 139 N. Y. 93, 22 L.R.A. 182, 34 N. E. 765; Levy v. Halcyon Casino Hotel Co. 45 Misc. 289, 92 N. Y. Supp. 231; McDonald v. Spang, 55 Misc. 332, 105 N. Y. Supp. 617; Du Bois v. Darling, 12 Jones & S. 436.

In Brigham v. H. G. Mulock Co. 74 N. J. Eq. 287, 70 Atl. 185, and in Bowen v. Smith (N. J. Eq.) 74 Atl. 675, it is said that any claim of bar asserted against the rights of an owner of a single lot, by reason of acquiescence in the violation of building restrictions, must be measured by the relation of the asserted violation to the individual lot.

A failure on the part of the grantor to enforce similar covenants in behalf of lots remaining unsold will not operate to destroy the right of the owner of a lot previously sold to enforce in behalf of that lot covenants made for its benefit, pursuant to the general building plan. Ibid.

In McGuire v. Caskey, 62 Ohio St. 419, 57 N. E. 53, it was held that plaintiff's submission to violations of a building line restriction, most of which were upon portions of the street remote from his premises, and some were upon the opposite side of the street, which violations did not substantially affect his enjoyment of his own property, did not operate as a waiver of his right to object to other encroachments by which such enjoyment would be materially impaired.

4. Under what circumstances a bar.

An encroachment of a building upon a space reserved for a courtyard in a plat of city lots will not be prevented by injunction when all others who have constructed buildings on the same side of the block have encroached on such space, though to a less extent, and without any attempted hindrance on the part of the complainants, where it seems clear that the character of the property is somewhat changed and it is being used to a large extent for business purposes, even if the complainants' lots are still vacant. Ewertsen v. Gerstenberg, 186 Ill. 344, 51 L.R.A. 310, 57 N. E. 1051.

In Loud v. Pendergast, 206 Mass. 122, 92 N. E. 40, it was held that equity would not enforce a building line restriction where substantially all the landowners affected thereby had so conducted themselves as to indicate an abandonment of the right, and the erections complained of caused no pecuniary damage to the plaintiff and did not diminish the market value of her estate, while the enforcement of the restriction against the defendant would make her house less commodious and attractive and would thus cause her substantial loss.

In Scharer v. Pantler, 127 Mo. App. 433, 105 S. W. 668, where it appeared that the grantor by whom the restriction was introduced, and all of her grantees, although their deeds contained a covenant requiring no building to be erected nearer than 25 feet to the front street line, had erected buildings upon their lots each with said, and that the same would be enforced by the plaintiff. The property owned by the defendants, up to the time of the commencing of the improvements, has been vacant property, used in the summer time for pasturage purposes, and used generally by the neighbors as a dumping ground for rubbish of various kinds.

(6) Since the construction of the improvements upon lot No. 3, plaintiff's property, the character of the surrounding neighborhood has greatly changed. At the time of the construction of the Kelley house, this section was a very high class residence section, with large lots for residence purposes. Since said time, in the near vicinity has developed a business center with a number of business blocks, mostly small, containing about twenty stores and shops, and two large dwellings in the immediate vicinity have been torn down and smaller buildings erected in their place, thereby dividing the large lots. There are, within two blocks distant, a large apartment house and kindergarten school. At the time of the improvement of lot No. 3 by Mrs. Kelley, the property in that neighborhood was reasonably adapted to such improvement. At the present time, the property in that neighborhood, including the property of the defendants, which is 100 feet wide by 325 to 350 feet deep, is not reasonably suitable to, and cannot be profitably used for, the purpose of one single dwelling house upon an entire lot of such dimensions. Said Ashland avenue is one of the main thorough-its front 15 feet from the street line, it was held that the owners of such property could not restrain one of their number from erecting a building within 5 feet from the line.

In Hemsley v. Marlborough Hotel Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 Atl. 14, affirmed without opinion in 63 N. J. Eq. 804, 52 Atl. 1132, it was held that a restrictive covenant against the erection of any building except as and for use as a dwelling house must be considered to have been waived, where it appeared that for at least ten years past two boarding houses, accommodating in the aggregate 350 guests, had been conducted upon adjoining property subject to the same restriction, and that the neighborhood was one largely devoted to boarding houses and hotels.

In Ocean City Asso. v. Chalfant, 65 N. J. Eq. 156, 55 Atl. 801, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 601, in which the restriction in question was against carrying on any business upon Sunday, it was held that where it appeared that for a number of years bathhouse keepers, livery stables, and cigar and fruit stores had done business on Sundays, and that the officers of the grantor had not used reasonable diligence in prosecuting infringements of the covenant, they might be held to have waived their right to equitable assistance.

In Chelsea Land & Improv. Co. v. Adams, 71 N. J. Eq. 771, 66 Atl. 180, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 758, it was held that where a building line restriction incorporated in the deeds of over 150 purchasers had been violated by 99 or 100 of them, without objection on the part of complainant who was the successor of the original grantee, except that in one instance a suit was instituted, but not diligently pursued, such a general consent to the nonobservance of the restrictive covenants amounted to an abandonment of the original plan.

In Russell v. Harpel, 20 Ohio C. C. 127, it was held that where plaintiff had permitted the erection of a house on the other side of her lot within 14 feet of the street, and had permitted without objection sixteen houses in the block to be erected nearer to the street than 20 feet, the court would not enjoin the erection of a house on the lot adjoining plaintiff's which did not strictly conform to the 20-foot restriction.

In Kelsey v. Dodd, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 34, where the owners of an estate, in selling off a portion of it, took a covenant against, inter alia, beer houses, it was held that persons subsequently becoming the owners of the remaining portion of the estate, by a long-continued acquiescence in breaches of the covenant by other covenantees, had lost their right to an injunction.

5. Under what circumstances not a bar.

In German v. Chapman, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 271, it was held that the fact that the grantor had permitted a private school to be conducted upon the edge of a property consisting of 57 acres of land, which did not interfere with the general scheme, the waiver in that particular instance did not preclude the enforcement in equity of a restrictive covenant that "no house or other building to be erected or built upon the land shall be used or occupied otherwise than as and for a private residence only, and not for any purpose of trade."

In Knight v. Simmonds [1896] 2 Ch. 294, it was held that while, if the object to be attained by a restrictive covenant cannot be attained, equitable relief to enforce it will be refused, yet, that where such business as had been carried on in the neighborhood had not been openly carried on, but the premises in which business had been carried on had preserved their appearance of private residences, equitable relief would be granted against a breach of covenant not to carry on any trade or business.

The right to the enforcement of a covenant that no portion of the granted premises shall be used for the sale of intoxicating liquors is not lost by permitting the occupation of certain premises covered by the covenant as a drug store, where, under a so-called package license, liquors had been sold as ordinarily sold by druggists, but not to be drunk upon the premises. Hall v. Solomon, 61 Conn. 476, 29 Am. St. Rep. 218, 23 Atl. 876.

fares, leading from the business portion to the best residence portion of the city of Toledo. It is 66 feet wide, and the premises in question are located about $1\frac{1}{4}$ miles from the business center of the city. Bancroft street crosses Ashland avenue some 445 feet from the southerly line of the Huber property, and that point is the center of the business houses in that vicinity. Ashland avenue intersects Collingwood avenue two blocks northerly from plaintiff's said property. Between Bancroft street and Collingwood avenue, Ashland avenue is built up with a good class of residences varying in value from \$3,000 to \$15,000. Within the past three years, two of the large-sized residences upon said portion of Ashland avenue have been converted into two-family flat buildings. At the corner of Ashland avenue and Bancroft streets, on the easterly side of Ashland avenue, being the side opposite to that which the Brown and Huber properties occupy, there was in 1872 a frame horse-car barn. This was replaced some years ago with a two-story brick building for storing electric cars, which said building has been remodeled into two storerooms fronting on Ashland avenue, the corner room being occupied by a drug store. Immediately northerly of this building an old frame residence was demolished about five years ago, and small shops built next to the street line, making a total of about 180 feet front on the easterly side of Ashland avenue, next to Bancroft street, now devoted to business purposes. This is the only business prop-

Front steps over a building line, and ornamental projections, will not preclude the enforcement of the building line agreement. Tripp v. O'Brien, 57 Ill. App. 407.

The fact that the plaintiffs have infringed a building line restriction by allowing projections from their houses consisting of bay windows, piazzas, and steps, will not prevent them from obtaining an injunction against the building of a separate house in the space in front of the established line. Bacon v. Sandberg, 179 Mass. 396, 60 N. E. 936.

In Stewart v. Finklestone (Mass.) 92 N. E. 37, it was held that where there had been no change whatever in the character of the buildings contemplated by the scheme contained in the restrictions, with the exception of those at the corners of streets, which were not of sufficient moment to interfere with it as a whole, there is no room for the application of the doctrine of changed conditions.

In Righter v. Winters, 68 N. J. Eq. 252, 59 Atl. 770, it was held that an entire contract as to restrictions cannot be considered as waived or abandoned by reason of violations which have occurred, not with the intention of abandoning the contract, but under an erroneous construction thereof adopted by the vendors and the previous builders of houses.

The erection of porches and bay windows extending beyond the building line, if under an erroneous construction of the restrictions, is no evidence of an abandonment of the general scheme. Brigham v. H. G. Mullock Co. 74 N. J. Eq. 287, 70 Atl. 185; Morrow v. Hasselman, 69 N. J. Eq. 612, 61 Atl. 369.

The fact that verandas and porches have been built over the established building line is not sufficient evidence of the general abandonment of a scheme of restriction, where there has been no general change in the neighborhood rendering the restrictions useless, and the greater number of the grantees have conformed to the restrictions. Waters v. Collins (N. J. Eq.) 70 Atl. 984.

Acquiescence in the violation of a covenant not to erect upon the premises any structure other than a genteel dwelling house will not deprive a lot owner of the right to enforce a distinct covenant not to cover any lot to the depth of more than 50 feet, so long as its performance remained of any value. Lattimer v. Livermore, 72 N. Y. 174.

The failure of the complainant to take notice of the violation of a restrictive covenant against injurious or offensive business, by business carried on remotely from his residence, will not deprive him of the right to enforce it against a business specially offensive by reason of its proximity. Rowland v. Miller, 139 N. Y. 93, 22 L.R.A. 182, 34 N. E. 765.

The existence of other violations of a covenant relating to the distance of dwellings from the street will not prevent a lot owner affected by the defendant's acts from compelling him to obey the covenants. McDonald v. Spang, 55 Misc. 332, 105 N. Y. Supp. 617.

In Adams v. Howell, 58 Misc. 435, 108 N. Y. Supp. 945, it was held that the fact that the steps to plaintiff's house projected about 4 feet into a 25-foot space in front of the house, reserved by a building restriction, would not deter equity from preventing a substantial violation of such restriction by defendant.

In McGuire v. Caskey, 62 Ohio St. 419, 57 N. E. 53, it was held that the fact that complainant and others had built porches extending beyond the building line, which were not shown to offer any obstruction to the easements of neighboring proprietors of light, air, and view, nor to be subversive of the expressed purpose of the restrictive covenant to increase the beauty of the street and enhance the value of lots for the purpose of private residence, did not preclude him from obtaining the aid of equity to prevent its substantial violation by defendant.

In Landell v. Hamilton, 177 Pa. 23, 34 L.R.A. 231, 35 Atl. 242, it was held that building along the division line and partly on each lot a solid wall higher than a covenant requires the servient lot to remain unobstructed, for the purpose of furnishing light and air to the dominant lot, will pre-erty on Ashland avenue between Bancroft street and Collingwood avenue, and is included in the business properties referred to in finding No. 6.

(7) The defendants have platted said lot No. 2, as shown by the exhibits in this case, by placing a driveway upon the southerly side of said lot, and have planned the construction of four modern residences facing upon this driveway. The improvement when completed will be known as 'Ashland place,' and will include two other houses facing the driveway upon the other side and located upon the rear of lot 1. No one of the houses is proposed to be built nearer Adams street, or Ashland avenue, than 60 feet, and each and every one of the houses will cost to exceed $5,000. Two of the houses have been constructed upon the rear portion of lot No. 2, and defendants propose to construct two more between those erected and Ashland avenue, all fronting upon the driveway. All the houses constructed, and those proposed to be constructed, will be of modern design and modern construction. There is intended to be no outbuilding or shed of any kind upon the property. The two houses constructed are intended to be heated with hot water circulation from a central station in the neighborhood, and those to be constructed are designed to be heated in the same way, and the houses, although the rear parts thereof are towards plaintiff's residence, are so constructed that no back door thereof is observable from the residence of the plaintiff, and none of the houses are vent the dominant owner, who builds it, from enforcing the covenant in equity as to the space below the top of the wall, but will not absolutely terminate the covenant.

IV. Change due to other causes.

a. In general.

In Sayers v. Collyer, L. R. 28 Ch. Div. 103, 13 Eng. Rul. Cas. 101, reversing L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 180, it was said that the rule that equity will not enforce observance of a restrictive covenant where the character of the neighborhood was changed, while applying where an alteration takes place through acts or permission of the plaintiff or those under whom he claims, so that his enforcing his covenant becomes unreasonable, does not apply to cases where the change which has taken place was beyond the control and independent of the action of the plaintiff.

And see also, as supporting this view. Osborne v. Bradley [1903] 2 Ch. 446, hereinbefore set forth, and Craig v. Greer [1899] 1 Ir. Ch. 258, infra.

On the other hand, it has been stated as a general rule that, while a court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce the observance of covenants made by an owner of lands in a city with an adjoining owner, in consideration of similar reciprocal agreements on the part of the latter, restricting the use of the lands to purposes of private residences, the exercise of this authority is within its discretion; and where there has been such a change in the character of the neighborhood as to defeat the purposes of the agreement and to render it inequitable to deprive such owner of the privilege of conforming his property to that character, such relief will not be granted. Columbia College v. Thacher, 87 N. Y. 311, 41 Am. Rep. 365; Amerman v. Deane, 132 N. Y. 355, 28 Am. St. Rep. 584, 30 N. E. 741; McClure v. Leaycraft, 183 N. Y. 36, 75 N. E. 961, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 45 (reversing 97 App. Div. 518, 90 N. Y. Supp. 233); Leonard v. Hotel Majestic Co. 17 Misc. 229, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1044; Russell v. Harpel, 20 Ohio C. C. 127.

Courts will not compel the observance of restrictions and conditions when they have 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

ceased to be of benefit. Abraham v. Stewart, 83 Mich. 7, 21 Am. St. Rep. 585, 46 N. W. 1030.

In Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir, 136 Cal. 36, 68 Pac. 308, it is said that surrounding conditions may so change that a court of equity will relieve the covenantor and the property from a restriction to a certain use, since public policy requires that land should not be unnecessarily burdened with permanent or long-continued restrictions, depreciating the value of its use to the owner, as well as its selling value in the market.

In Star Brewery Co. v. Primas, 163 Ill. 652, 45 N. E. 145, it is said that where the change in the condition of the surrounding property is such that a performance of the covenant in the deed would injure the grantee's property, or make it yield less profit, or make it incapable of yielding any profit, the covenant will not be enforced, as being unreasonable and oppressive.

Whether an equity court will refuse to restrain the violation of a restrictive covenant and leave the parties to their legal remedies, on account of changed conditions, depends largely upon the facts, and mainly whether the enforcement of the agreement would greatly harm the defendant without any substantial benefit to the plaintiff, so as to make enforcement inequitable. Rowland v. Miller, 139 N. Y. 93, 22 L.R.A. 182, 34 N. E. 765.

A court of equity will enforce a covenant not to permit any noxious or offensive trade or business, but to use the premises for the erection of first-class private residences only, unless there has been such a change in the character of the neighborhood as to defeat the object and purpose of the agreement and to render it inequitable to deprive such owner of the right to conform his property to that character. Korn v. Campbell, 52 Misc. 220, 102 N. Y. Supp. 108, reversed on other grounds in 119 App. Div. 401, 104 N. Y. Supp. 462, which is affirmed in 192 N. Y. 490, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 127 Am. St. Rep. 925, 85 N. E. 687.

A change in the character of the neighborhood which will warrant a court of equiproposed to be nearer than 15 feet from the dividing line between lots 2 and 3. The houses now constructed are rented and occupied by desirable tenants. The defendants have contracted for the beautifying of said premises by landscape architects, and are using every means to make the improvement attractive in appearance.

(8) The property of the defendants cannot now be profitably utilized in any manner except in the way intended to be used by the defendants, and this particular property and property in this neighborhood of lots of such large proportions are adapted to the use to which the defendants are putting it, and cannot be profitably used in any other manner, owing to the great depth of the lots and the requirements of property ty in declining to enforce a restrictive covenant need not extend to all the property affected by the agreement. Columbia College v. Thacher, 87 N. Y. 311, 41 Am. Rep. 365.

b. Under what circumstances a bar.

In Jackson v. Stevenson, 156 Mass. 496, 32 Am. St. Rep. 476, 31 N. E. 691, it was held that where it was evident that the purpose of the restrictions as a whole was to make the locality a suitable one for residences, and that, owing to the general growth of the city and the present use of the whole neighborhood for business, this purpose could no longer be accomplished, and that if all the restrictions imposed in the deeds should be rigidly enforced, it would not restore to the locality its residential character, but would merely lessen the value of the property for business purposes,—an injunction would not be granted against a threatened violation of such restrictions, since to enforce them could have no other effect than to harass and injure the defendant, without effecting the purpose for which the restrictions were originally made.

In Page v. Murray, 46 N. J. Eq. 325, 19 Atl. 11, where the purpose of a covenant fixing a minimum price that all buildings to be erected must cost, and restricting the purposes for which the premises might be used, was to protect the locality to which it applied from businesses that were likely to create a nuisance, and buildings of the cheapest grade, and thereby bring to it a better class of buildings and insure its occupation by quiet, orderly, and well-to-do people, and it appeared that immediately beyond the limits of the land subject to the covenant the character of the street had been determined by the erection of cheap houses, establishing that more expensive houses must ultimately be unmarketable and unprofitable in that street, that no buildings of the value contemplated had been built on the land affected by the covenant, that the term during which such restrictive covenant was to operate would expire in three years, and that enforcement of obedience to its requirements would pracgenerally in that neighborhood at the present time.

(9) On June 12, 1906, the date this suit was commenced, the defendants had constructed one of said residences, known as "No. 1," upon the rear of the said Huber lot, and had begun work upon the foundation of a second residence, known as "No. 2," upon the rear of said lot. Both of said residences have since been completed by defendants, each costing between $5,000 and $6,000.

Upon the foregoing facts the circuit court found and stated as its conclusion of law "that the plaintiff is not entitled to the injunction prayed for in her petition, and the improvement of lot No. 2 as intended by tically result in depriving the owners of the affected land of the use of their land as long as the covenant continued in force,—it was held that in this situation it manifestly would be inequitable to deprive the defendant of the privilege of conforming the building upon his property to the character of the buildings surrounding it, especially where the compliance of the complainant himself with the restriction was questionable; but that he should be left to his remedy at law.

In Columbia College v. Thacher, 87 N. Y. 311, 41 Am. Rep. 365, in which the question was whether there had been such an entire change in the character of the neighborhood of the premises as to render it inequitable to enforce a restrictive agreement the stated object of which was "to provide for the better improvement of the said lands and to secure their permanent value," which was to be accomplished by the erection by both parties of dwelling houses of a superior class, which were to be set back 8 feet and to be used exclusively as dwelling houses; and it appeared that the general current of business affairs had reached and covered the entire premises fronting on one of the streets bounding the land covered by the restriction, both above and below the lot in question, it was held that if this was all, the plaintiff would be entitled to enjoin the defendant's use of his premises for business purposes, it being apparent from the agreement that such encroachment was anticipated, and that the parties to it intended to secure the property in question from the disturbance which business would necessarily produce; but it further appearing that an elevated railroad had been built in said street and a station established in front of the premises, rendering privacy and quiet in the adjacent buildings impossible, and occasioning a large and permanent depreciation in their rental value for residential purposes, though not rendering their use for business purposes indispensable to their practicable and profitable use and occupation, it was further held that a condition of things had arisen which frustrated the scheme devised by the parties, and deprived the defendants should not be enjoined," and thereupon the court dismissed the plaintiff's petition at her costs. To obtain a reversal of this judgment of the circuit court, Frances A. Brown, who was plaintiff in the courts below, prosecutes the present proceeding in error.

Mr. Orville S. Brumback, for plaintiff in error:

The defendant had actual notice of the restrictive covenant, and injunction is the proper remedy.

The covenants run with the land.

The vital question is not whether there is a covenant running with the land, but whether the restriction was imposed upon the servient estate for the benefit of the land the property of the benefit which might otherwise accrue from its observance, so that its enforcement would work oppression, and not equity.

In Amerman v. Deane, 132 N. Y. 355, 28 Am. St. Rep. 584, 30 N. E. 741, where it appeared that the vicinity had been largely devoted to flat and tenement houses, and had for other reasons become undesirable as a first-class residential neighborhood, and that if enjoined from using her building for the purpose for which it was designed, the defendant must necessarily suffer damages greatly in excess of any likely or possible to be sustained by the plaintiff, it was held that a court of equity would not interpose to prevent the occupation of defendant's building as a tenement house in violation of a restrictive agreement against the erection of any tenement house upon the premises.

In McClure v. Leaycraft, 183 N. Y. 36, 75 N. E. 961, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 45, reversing 97 App. Div. 518, 90 N. Y. Supp. 233, where it appeared that in the immediate vicinity of the premises owned by the plaintiff and the defendant numerous flats and tenement houses had been built; that large apartment houses had been erected upon the three corners directly opposite defendant's premises, so that the covenant in question was no longer effective for the purpose in view of the parties when they made it; that enforcement thereof could not restore the neighborhood to its former condition by making it desirable for private residences; that nineteen of the twenty five years which bounded the life of the covenant in question had passed; and that the proposed erection would greatly increase the value of the plaintiff's premises, while the enforcement of the covenant, without benefiting anyone, would cause great damage to the defendant,—it was held that a permanent injunction against a breach of covenant not to erect any apartment house should be refused, and the complainant remitted to his remedy by action at law.

In Roth v. Jung, 79 App. Div. 1, 79 N. Y. Supp. 822, where the purpose of the restriction was to provide for the erection of semi-detached houses with 20 feet of yard space between them and the adjoining streets, and it appeared that the locality, instead of developing as a suburban residential quarter, contained a large orphan asylum having a stone and brick fence 15 feet high extending for an entire block, a brewery, shops, and flat and tenement houses, it was held that equity would not restrain the erection of a tenement house located on the building lines of the respective streets by which the defendant's premises were bounded.

In Deeves v. Constable, 87 App. Div. 352, 84 N. Y. Supp. 592, where it appeared that the purpose of the insertion of certain building restrictions in a deed was to protect the grantor in the enjoyment of his residence adjoining, that the conditions had been radically and entirely changed, and the whole street devoted exclusively to business uses, and that the grantor's residence had been replaced by a business block, it was held that the radical change and the cesser of use of property for residential purposes might be regarded as furnishing sufficient ground to deny an enforcement of the covenant.

In Schwarz v. Duhne, 118 App. Div. 105, 103 N. Y. Supp. 14, where it appeared that, at the time of the imposition of restrictions against buildings other than dwelling houses or stores, and noxious or offensive businesses, the locality was a residential one, but that since then the character of the locality has entirely changed, being filled with tenement houses of poor character, stables, sawdust and spaghetti factories, Chinese laundries, and various other industries incompatible with an ordinary residential district, it was held that an injunction would not issue at the instance of a complainant still occupying his premises as a dwelling, against the conversion of the adjoining premises into a stable and carriage house.

In Schefer v. Ball, 53 Misc. 448, 104 N. Y. Supp. 1028 (affirmed without opinion in 120 App. Div. 880, 105 N. Y. Supp. 1142), it was held that where it appeared that the locality, formerly used exclusively for residential purposes, had materially changed in character, and that the most valuable use to in behalf of which it is sought to be enforced.

which property could be put in that neighborhood was a business use, with large business buildings, and that its enforcement would confer no benefit upon the plaintiff, equity would not enjoin a violation of a building line restriction.

In Antes v. Manhattan R. Co. 116 N. Y. Supp. 697, it was held that to enforce, as against defendant's occupation of the premises by its elevated railway, a covenant against offensive establishments, was inequitable where the property in the immediate neighborhood had ceased to be used for residential purposes, and had become a factory section, and the railroad had been in operation for eighteen years.

In Orne v. Fridenberg, 143 Pa. 487, 24 Am. St. Rep. 567, 22 Atl. 832, it was held that where certain building restrictions were evidently imposed with the idea that the premises affected would continue to be used for residential purposes, and the locality had become devoted to business uses, the court would refuse an injunction to restrain the violation of such restrictions, leaving plaintiff to his remedy at law.

c. Under what circumstances not a bar.

1. Generally.

In Craig v. Greer [1899] 1 Ir. Ch. 258, it was held that the right of a sublessee to enforce a restrictive covenant contained in a long-term lease of lands for building purposes, against the erection or use of any house upon the premises save for a private dwelling house, or tea and refreshment house, without the written consent of the lessor, could not be defeated by a mere change in the character of the neighborhood, due to the growth of a neighboring city, and not to circumstances over which the complainant had any control.

28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

A restriction is presumed to be for the benefit of the land affected, and whoever succeeds to its title has full power to enforce it.

Stines v. Dorman, supra; High, Inj. §§ 1154, 1155; Cooke v. Chilcott, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 694; Hays v. St. Paul M. E. Church, 196 Ill. 635, 63 N. E. 1040; Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54; Gibert v. Peteler, 38 Barb. 488.

It is only where there is such a radical change in the character of the property and neighborhood as to defeat the object and purpose of the restriction, that a court of equity is justified in refusing relief and remitting the plaintiff to an action for damages.

In Star Brewery Co. v. Primas, 163 Ill. 652, 45 N. E. 145, it was held that equity would not refuse to enforce a covenant not to use the premises conveyed for saloon purposes so long as the grantor should own a certain saloon,—the object of the promisee being to eliminate possible competition,—on the ground that the number of saloons in the neighborhood had increased from two to eight, where the new saloons were not upon the promisees's land, nor was he nor anyone claiming under him responsible for the change of situation produced by their establishment, if the new saloons will not make the performance of the covenant any more injurious to the interests of the owner of the granted premises than was the case before their establishment.

In Tobey v. Moore, 130 Mass. 448, it was held that building line restriction has reference to the street line as existing at the date of the deed, and is intended to establish a uniform rule as of that date which cannot be affected by the subsequent widening or narrowing of the street by public authority, or by the fact whether a building is erected before or after such alteration of the line.

So also, in McDonald v. Spang, 55 Misc. 332, 105 N. Y. Supp. 617, it was held that a restriction against erecting a house nearer than 25 feet from the street line is not affected by a widening of the street under public authority, but such restriction will be taken as referring to the street line wherever located.

In Evans v. Foss, 194 Mass. 513, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1039, 80 N. E. 587, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 171, it is held that enforcement of a restriction upon the use of property for the purpose of preserving its residential character will not be refused in the absence of any material change in conditions directly affecting the character and use of the

2. Where restriction still beneficial.

Where a restriction, notwithstanding the change of use of land and buildings, still is of some substantial value to the dominant lot, equity will restrain its violation if relief is promptly sought. Landell v. Hamilton, 175 Pa. 327, 34 L.R.A. 227, 34 Atl. 663.

The simple fact that since the imposition of the restriction, the streets in the vicinity of the premises have ceased to a large extent to be occupied by genteel dwelling houses, interposes no obstacle to the relief sought by the plaintiff against a breach of a covenant that the grantee would not erect upon his lot any other building than a genteel dwelling house, to cover the whole front of said lot, but not to a greater depth than 50 feet, so long as his house is occupied as a dwelling house and the locality remains suitable for dwelling houses, and the covenant remains of substantial value to him and has in no way been released or extinguished by him. Lattimer v. Livermore, 72 N. Y. 174.

In Rowland v. Miller, 139 N. Y. 93, 22 L.R.A. 182, 34 N. E. 765, it was held that the fact that most of the premises in the locality were no longer kept for residences would not deprive a person still residing there, and who had done or omitted nothing which would defeat it, of the right to enforce a restriction against business "injurious or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants."

In Zipp v. Barker, 6 App. Div. 609, 40 N. Y. Supp. 325, and in Zipp v. Barker, 40 App. Div. 1, 57 N. Y. Supp. 569 (affirmed 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)) in error in this case, each and all of them, derive their title to the property here involved through Barnett T. Scott. The deed of said Barnett T. Scott and wife to Mary J. Kelley, under which, through various mesne conveyances the plaintiff in error, Frances A. Brown, acquired the title to lot three (3) in Barnett T. Scott's First Addition to the city of Toledo, contains the following covenant: "And the said B. T. Scott hereby covenants and agrees for himself, his heirs, assigns, executors, and administrators, that neither he, his heirs, or assigns will at any time erect upon lot 2 of said Scott's First Addition to the city of Toledo, thereon, any building nearer than 60 feet to the southwesterly line of Adams street, and that the only buildings put upon said lot shall be a residence and the necessary attachments, and that it shall be used for no other purposes than that of a family residence, and shall cost not less than $5,000 for the residence alone." The deed of conveyance executed by Barnett T. Scott and wife to Samuel B. Wood, for lot No. two (2) in said Scott's Addition to the city of Toledo, which lot, without opinion in 166 N. Y. 621, 59 N. E. 1133), it was held that the fact that a street had altered from a residential to a business street was no ground for refusing to enforce a covenant the effect of which was practically to widen a 50-foot street into an 80-foot street, since this may be as advantageous where the property fronting on the street is used for business purposes as where it is used for residences.

So, also, as to a 10-foot restriction which was not plainly imposed with the idea that the property would be devoted to private dwellings only, and which was not inconsistent with its use for business purposes. Vetter v. Flaherty, 4 Lack. Leg. News, 175.

A like conclusion was reached upon a state of facts which was similar, except that the building line was set back only 5 feet from the street, in Batchelor v. Hinkle, 132 App. Div. 620, 117 N. Y. Supp. 542.

In Holt v. Fleischman, 75 App. Div. 593, 78 N. Y. Supp. 647, reversing 37 Misc. 172, 74 N. Y. Supp. 894, it was held that the mere fact that most of the property in the locality was no longer used for residences was not of itself sufficient ground for declining to enforce a building line restriction for the benefit of one who still occupied her property as a residence and whose use thereof for such purpose would be injuriously affected.

In Landell v. Hamilton, 175 Pa. 327, 34 L.R.A. 227, 34 Atl. 663, where the owner of three lots imposed certain building restrictions upon the middle one of them for the benefit of the others, it was held that so long as such restrictions were of substantial value to the dominant lots, equity would restrain their violation, notwithstanding changes in the character of the neighborhood.

through mesne conveyances, was subsequently acquired, and is now owned, by the defendants in error, contains the express stipulation and agreement that the premises thereby granted and conveyed are to be "subject, however, to all the conditions as to location of building, etc., contained in the deed from said Scott to Mary I. Kelley, of lot 3 in said addition. And said Scott also hereby makes the same agreement for himself, his heirs, assigns, executors, and administrators, concerning so much of lot 1 as remains in him after this conveyance, as is contained in said last-mentioned deed." The only question presented by the record in this case is whether, upon the facts found by the circuit court, the plaintiff in error, Frances A. Brown, is entitled in equity to have enforced, for the protection of her property, the restrictive covenants and stipulations contained in the foregoing deeds of conveyance. While counsel for defendants in error concede the general rule to be that building restrictions and other limitations on the use of real property of a character which the law permits to be attached to land in such a sense as to restrict the use of one parcel thereof in favor of another will be enforced by courts of equity upon equitable grounds, in favor of the parcel designed to be benefited and against the parcel burdened by the restriction or limitation, they insist, first, that "the stipulation or covenant in the deed to Kelley is not such a one as is binding upon the defendants in this case, as it is not a covenant that runs with the land owned by the defendant."

We shall consider briefly this claim of counsel, although we are of opinion that it is not at all essential to the right of plaintiff to have such restrictive covenant enforced in equity, that the same should be, technically speaking, a covenant running with the land of the defendants. In Ashland v. Greiner, 58 Ohio St. 67, 50 N. E. 99, where a grant of land was made to be used for religious purposes only, and afterwards the owners of the land conveyed a strip of it to the village of Ashland, for the purposes of a street, it is said by Burket, J.: "When value is paid for the estate, such stipulation [a stipulation that the property granted should be used only for particular purposes] is construed to be a covenant running with the land in the nature of a trust, for the uses and purposes expressed in the deed of conveyance, and in case of a breach of the trust, a court of equity will, in a proper action, decree the performance of the trust by confining the uses of the estate to the uses and purposes expressed in the deed. In such cases the restricted use of the estate becomes a part of the consideration and is consented to by the grantee, and it is no hardship on him and his assigns to be compelled to observe the covenants contained in the deed." In Stines v. Dorman, 25 Ohio St. 580, it is said by White, J., in the opinion in that case: "It is unnecessary to determine whether the stipulation contained in the deed in question is to be regarded, technically, as a covenant running with the land. However this may be, it has, in equity, the effect of such covenant as against the grantee and his assigns. The stipulation relates to the mode in which the premises conveyed are to be enjoyed, and qualifies the estate. This limitation on the use enters into the consideration of the conveyance, and, if not unlawful, it ought, upon plain principles of justice, to be enforced. . . . If the effect of the stipulation is not to accomplish an illegal purpose, it is lawful; and, where it affects the land or the mode of its enjoyment, its effect is to bind all deriving title under the conveyance in which the restriction is found." In Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54, Thomson, J., in discussing the character and effect of a restrictive building covenant, says: "The question whether the covenant runs with the land seems to be material in equity only on the question of notice. If the covenant runs with the land, then it binds the owner of the land, whether he had knowledge of it or not, for he takes no greater title than his predecessors had to convey; but if the covenant does not run with the land, but the land is subject to what is sometimes called an 'equity,' and at other times a 'negative easement,' in favor of the adjoining land, then, in order to enforce this easement against the land, it is essential that the owner should have taken the land with notice of it. Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phill. Ch. 774. We understand, then, that it is a principle upon which all the courts unite that the right to equitable relief in these cases depends upon the following considerations: First. A precedent agreement, in some form, by which a restriction is imposed upon the lot owned or held by defendant for the benefit of the lot owned or held by the plaintiff. Second. In case the agreement is made by the defendant's predecessor in title, notice in some form to the defendant of the fact and nature of the agreement, either from the language of the title deed under which he holds or otherwise."

In Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phill. Ch. 775, a leading English case, the syllabus is as follows: "A covenant between vendor and purchaser, on the sale of land, that the purchaser and his assigns shall use or abstain from using the land in a particular way, will be enforced in equity against all subsequent purchasers with notice, independently of the question whether it be one which runs with the land, so as to be binding upon subsequent purchasers at law." In the course of his opinion in this case, the Lord Chancellor (Cottenham) observes: "It is said that, the covenant being one which does not run with the land, this court cannot enforce it; but the question is, not whether the covenant runs with the land, but whether a party shall be permitted to use the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract entered into by his vendor, and with notice of which he purchased. Of course, the price would be affected by the covenant, and nothing could be more inequitable than that the original purchaser should be able to sell the property the next day for a greater price, in consideration of the assignee being allowed to escape for the liability which he had himself undertaken."

We think the rule upon this subject, as clearly established by the authorities, is that, when the action is in equity to enforce a restrictive covenant controlling the use or enjoyment of land, the vital question is not whether there is a covenant running with the land, but whether the restriction asserted and relied on was one imposed upon the servient estate for the benefit of the land in behalf of which it is sought to be enforced. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 11. And we apprehend the rule is the same, whether the restriction imposed is charged upon the land conveyed, or upon land retained by the grantor.

Second. It is urged by counsel for defendants in error that "a fair interpretation and construction of the building restriction, so called, does not prohibit the improvement of this property as it is being done, even conceding that the covenant is one that runs with the land." When we consider that two dwelling houses have already been constructed by defendants on said lot two (2) and that it is their plan and purpose to construct thereon two more, this claim of counsel, we think, finds sufficient answer and refutation in the plain language of the covenant itself, by which it is provided: "That the only buildings put upon said lot shall be a residence and the necessary attachments, and that it shall be used for no other purpose than that of a family residence, and shall not cost less than $5,000 for the residence alone."

Obviously, this covenant was one made for the benefit and protection of lot three (3) now owned by plaintiff in error, and, as shown by its terms, its purpose was to restrict and limit the use and occupancy of lot two (2) to purposes of a family residence with the necessary appurtenances, and, if given effect at all, should be given effect according to its plain and positive provisions.

Third. The further contention is here made that the plaintiff, Frances A. Brown, is now without right to enforce said covenant because "even though the covenant is one running with the land, and therefore binding upon the defendants in favor of the plaintiff, the change in the character of the neighborhood has rendered the enforcement of such a covenant inequitable and oppressive upon the defendants, and would be of no material value to the plaintiff." This it would seem was the defense chiefly relied on in the court below, and, as appears from the opinion of the circuit court, was the ground upon which that court denied to plaintiff the relief she asked. In its opinion the circuit court says: "The important question in the case is whether there has been any substantial change in the drift of the population and character of the property as to its greater availability and value for use in the manner in which it is proposed to be improved by the defendants, or whether the character is not so substantially changed." And having found, as appears from the above statement of facts (paragraph 6), that, since the construction of the improvements of lot 3 (plaintiff's property), the character of the surrounding neighborhood had greatly changed in the particulars therein designated and pointed out, and having further found that by reason of such changed condition (paragraph 8) "the property of the defendants cannot now be profitably utilized in any manner except in the way intended to be used by the defendants, and this particular property and property in this neighborhood of lots of such larger proportions are adapted to the use to which the defendants are putting it, and cannot be profitably used in any other manner, owing to the great depth of the lots and the requirements of property generally in that neighborhood at the present time." The court held that therefore the defendants were absolved from the duty and obligation of longer observing and keeping said covenant, and refused to enforce it against them, predicated such judgment, it would seem, largely, if not wholly, upon a consideration of the injury and damage, by loss of profits, that would result to defendants from its enforcement.

It is important to note in the present case that the covenant which plaintiff is seeking to enforce is one made for the exclusive benefit of the property now owned and occupied by her as a residence, and therefore one which a court of equity will require to be specifically performed so long as said covenant remains of substantial value to her. The rule upon this subject, generally adopted and followed by the courts of this country, is, we think, correctly stated in Kerr on Injunctions, 2d ed. p. 356: "If the right at law under the covenant is clearly established, and the breach is clear, and the covenant is of such a nature that it can, consistently with the rules and principles of the court, be specifically enforced, the court will not, unless under very exceptional circumstances, take into consideration at the hearing the comparative injury to the parties from granting or withholding the injunction. There may be cases in which it is clear that the damage to arise from the breach would be inappreciable, and in which the court would refuse to interfere; but the case must be free from all possibility of doubt. It must be clear that there is no appreciable, or at all events no substantial, damage before the court will refuse, upon the ground of smallness of damage, to withhold its hand from enforcing the execution. The mere fact that there has been a breach of covenant is a sufficient ground for the interference of the court by injunction. A covenantee has the right to have the actual enjoyment of property modo et forma as stipulated for by him. It is no answer to say that the act complained of will inflict no injury on the plaintiff, or will be even beneficial to him. It is for the plaintiff to judge whether the agreement shall be preserved as far as he is concerned, or whether he shall permit it to be violated. It is not necessary that he should show that any damage has been done. It being established that the acts of the defendant are a violation of the contract entered into by him, the court will protect the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the right which he has purchased."

In the case at bar there is no express finding by the circuit court that the contemplated improvement of the defendants' property will not appreciably injure or damage the property of plaintiff, by impairing or diminishing the use and enjoyment of the same for residence purposes and as a home, thereby greatly depreciating its value. In its opinion the circuit court says: "The plaintiff may or may not have been damaged. The lot of the plaintiff may be more or less valuable by reason of the construction of these buildings by the Hubers; but there would seem to be no greater difficulty, if the plaintiff has been damaged by the depreciation of his property, in ascertaining the amount of such damage by an action, than there is in very many cases where damages are sought and where verdicts are rendered therefor, although the opinions of witnesses may differ as to the exact extent of such damages. I am not holding or indicating that the plaintiff has been damaged in any substantial way, or has not." In Lattimer v. Livermore, 72 N. Y. 174, which was an action to restrain defendant from infringing upon an alleged easement, Earl, J., says: "The simple fact that, since the deeds were given by Hurry, the streets in the vicinity of this block have ceased to a large extent to be occupied for genteel dwelling houses, interposes no obstacle to the relief sought by the plaintiff. If, by the change in the surrounding circumstances, this covenant had ceased to be of any substantial value to the plaintiff, she would not be permitted in equity to enforce it simply to annoy and damage other people; but so long as her house is occupied as a dwelling house, and the locality remains suitable for dwelling houses, and this covenant remains of substantial value to her, and she has in no way extinguished or released her easement, she must be permitted to enforce it." In Landell v. Hamilton, 175 Pa. 336, 337, 34 L.R.A. 227, 34 Atl. 663, 666, Mr. Justice Dean, in discussing the binding obligation of a restrictive building covenant similar to the one here in question, says: "As long as such restrictions are not unlawful, it is to no purpose to argue that they seriously retard the improvement of the city. We can no more strike down by decree a lawful restriction creating an easement, than we can compel the lot owner to erect buildings in accord with the best style of architecture. Contracts such as this, whether construed as covenants or conditions, since Spencer's Case, 5 Cope, 16, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. p. 174, have been enforced, both at law and in equity, between the immediate parties to them and their grantees, near and remote. . . . We concede some of the cases decided in other states are in apparent conflict with our decision; but what this court has uniformly held, and now holds, is that where the restriction, notwithstanding the change of use of the land and buildings, still is of substantial value to the dominant lot, equity will restrain its violation, if relief, as here, is promptly sought." Peck v. Conway, 119 Mass. 546; Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 286, 19 Atl. 190; McGuire v. Caskey, 62 Ohio St. 419, 57 N. E. 53; Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 440, 26 Am. Rep. 615; 5 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 281; 2 High, Inj. § 1158.

The English rule would seem to be that, in cases of the character of the one at bar, relief by injunction will be denied only on the ground of equitable estoppel. In Craig v. Greer [1899] 1 Ir. Ch. 278, the vice chancellor, after reviewing many English cases, says: "The principle to be deduced from these authorities seems to me to be that, in order to defeat the right of a person with whom a covenant has been entered into restricting the mode of user of lands sold or demised, it must be clearly established that there is a personal equity against him arising from his acts or conduct in sanctioning or knowingly permitting such a change in the character of the neighborhood as to render it unjust in him to seek to enforce his covenant by injunction. A change resulting from causes independent of him will not have such an operation." The court of appeal, affirming the decision of the vice chancellor, held: "That the right of a person to enforce a restrictive covenant by injunction could not be defeated by mere change in the character of the neighborhood, unless there was an equity against him arising from his acts or conduct in sanctioning or knowingly permitting such change as to render it unjust for him to seek relief by injunction."

We have examined the several cases cited and relied on by counsel for defendants in error, and find that in many, in fact in nearly all of them, the decision was governed by certain controlling facts which clearly distinguished them from the case at bar. Without reviewing in detail, or discussing at length, the finding of facts made by the circuit court, which is set out in full in the statement of this case, we think it enough to say that, in the light of the foregoing authorities, the facts found do not, in our judgment, show that there has been such a radical change in the character of the neighborhood in which the plaintiff's property is situated as can be held destructive of the covenant relied on, or such as would render its enforcement oppressive and inequitable. That the neighborhood continues to be a locality suitable for and devoted to residence purposes affirmatively appears through the fact found by the circuit court that defendants have recently erected on lot 2 two residence properties "of modern design and modern construction, each costing more than $5,000," and they are now threatening to construct thereon two more dwellings of like character, neither of which is to cost less than that sum. Before the defendants commenced to improve their property (lot 2), they had actual notice of the terms of the building restriction imposed on said lot, and they were advised that the same would be insisted upon and enforced by the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, it being established that the acts of defendants would be in clear violation of the covenant and the restriction thereby imposed, a court of equity will not deny to plaintiff the relief she asks, merely because the property of defendants can now be profitably utilized only in the manner contemplated by the proposed improvement.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and upon the facts found judgment 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

will be entered in favor of the plaintiff in error, Frances A. Brown, according to the prayer of her petition.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE T. HAMILTON et al.

v.

WILLIAM V. ALLEN et al.

(86 Neb. 401, 125 N. W. 610.)

Appeal — cross appeal — dismissal.

1. Where a full examination of the merits of an appeal shows that cross appellants are entitled to no relief except that already granted by the trial court, a motion by appellants to dismiss the cross appeal may be disregarded.

Same — misjoinder — harmless error.

2. On appeal from a decree in equity, failure of the trial court to dismiss the suit for misjoinder of plaintiffs and of causes of action does not require a reversal, where the record clearly shows appellants were in no wise prejudiced.

Evidence — attorney — purchase from client — burden of proof.

3. Where attorneys purchase from their clients and resell the subject-matter of their employment, the burden is on them, when sued by their clients for resulting profits, to prove the original purchase price was fair.

Same — resale by attorney — price realized — admissibility to show value.

4. In a suit to recover the profits made by attorneys out of an undivided half interest in land purchased from their clients, subject to a life estate, evidence of the prices realized, when the identical property was exchanged or resold at a large profit by the attorneys at various times within a few months, may be considered in determining whether the price paid by the attorneys was fair, where their witnesses testified to the changes in values in the meantime, and that the undivided interest had no market value at the time of the original purchase.

Rose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity to require defendants to account as fiduciaries for the profits made by them out of the interests of plaintiffs in 720 acres of land in Madison county, or as trustees holding title for the benefit of plaintiffs. The realty described was formerly owned by James B. Gibbs, who died intestate without issue June 5, 1901. It seems to be conceded that under the statutes then in force his widow, Nancy C. Gibbs, took a life estate in all the lands in controversy, and that subject thereto the title descended to six heirs, each inheriting an undivided one-sixth interest. These heirs and their relationship to intestate are as follows: George T. Hamilton, half-brother; Annie Minehart and Matilda Rodeck, half-sisters; Margaret A. Owens and Susan Beck, full sisters; Lizzie M. Mazurie, niece, the only child of a deceased sister of the full blood. The heirs named are plaintiffs, with the exception of Matilda Rodeck, who died after the death of James B. Gibbs. Her heirs are Ida McKee, Harry Rodeck, and William Rodeck, and they are plaintiffs also. William V. Allen and Willis E. Reed, who were formerly partners as Allen & Reed, and George W. Losey and wife are defendants. Losey was administrator of the Gibbs estate, and by mesne conveyances to which the heirs were not parties acquired title to 160 acres of the Gibbs land. The petition seeks to charge him and his wife as trustees holding title for the benefit of plaintiffs. John S. Robinson, now deceased, was attorney for the heirs of the full blood, and during the existence of that relation bought from his clients their undivided half interest, subject to the widow's life estate, taking title in the name of Thomas F. Memminger. The property thus acquired was sold by Robinson, and after his death his clients filed claims against his estate to re-years after the rendition of judgment therein would be sustained, as the relation of attorney and client had terminated, and the former could deal with the latter without any possibility of undue influence or advantage.

But where an attorney who obtained a judgment for $200 for a woman buys from her the defendant's interest in land worth $6,000, which had been purchased by her at execution sale, and induced her to convey it to him for $150, the difference between the amount of the judgment and his fee, the deed will be set aside, as the amount of 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the consideration was entirely out of proportion with the value of the property purchased, notwithstanding it is claimed that the attorney's employment ceased upon buying in the land for his client at a sheriff's sale, as a court will not enforce any contract between attorney and client made while the confidence engendered by that relation still continues, and it is manifest from all the circumstances that the parties were not dealing at arm's length and did not stand on an equal footing. Cline v. Charles (Ky.) 124 S. W. 347.

quire an accounting. The county court rejected the claims, and from the disallowance appeals were taken to the district court, where the cases were settled by stipulation. Allen & Reed were attorneys for the heirs of the half blood, and during the existence of that relation bought from their clients the latter's undivided half interest, subject to the widow's life estate. After the title of all the heirs had been purchased by their attorneys, the latter conveyed to the widow their interest in 160 acres occupied by her as a homestead in exchange for her life estate in the remainder of the 720 acres. Within a short time the property acquired by Allen & Reed from the heirs of the half blood was resold at a profit. In the petition the attorneys are charged with fraud in suppressing and misrepresenting facts affecting the interests of their clients and the value of their property. Any joint liability of defendants to plaintiffs seems to rest on the following averment of the petition: "Plaintiffs allege that said William V. Allen, Willis E. Reed, and John S. Robinson, not regarding their duties and obligations as such attorneys, as aforesaid, but contriving and intending to procure title to themselves from said heirs at grossly inadequate prices, they, the said William V. Allen, Willis E. Reed, John S. Robinson, and defendant George W. Losey, entered into an agreement to procure conveyances of and from said heirs of their interest in all of said lands, to the end and for the purpose of exchanging a part thereof with the said Nancy C. Gibbs, for a conveyance, satisfaction, and release of her life estate in the residue, and holding such residue for the common gain, profit, and advantage of them, the said William V. Allen, Willis E. Reed, John S. Robinson, and George W. Losey." All charges of fraud and the conspiracy to procure from the heirs their property at grossly inadequate prices and to divide the resulting profits are denied by defendants, and in separate answers by Allen & Reed faithful performance of their duties as attorneys is alleged. The district court upon a full hearing found, in substance, that there had been no conspiracy formed as pleaded in plaintiffs' petition; that in purchasing the interests of the heirs Allen & Reed and Robinson had no previous understanding among themselves or with the widow as to any future disposition of the property purchased; that there was no fraud or wrongdoing on the part of Losey, and that the conveyances to him were valid; that Allen & Reed were accountable for the profits made by them out of the property purchased from their clients. As to the heirs of the full blood and Losey and wife, the suit was dismissed. Judgment was entered against Allen & Reed in favor of their clients for $11,592.37. Allen & Reed appeal, and plaintiffs have filed a cross appeal.

Two preliminary matters are presented. The first is a motion by defendants to dismiss the cross appeal of plaintiffs. It is unnecessary to pass on this motion, since an examination of the entire record in considering the appeal of Allen & Reed has led to the conclusion that the averments upon which cross appellants seek redress are not established by the evidence. Their right to the relief denied by the trial court depends upon the truth of the allegation that defendants and John S. Robinson entered into and carried out an agreement to procure plaintiffs' title at grossly inadequate prices, or that plaintiffs were injured by the misconduct of Losey or other fiduciaries. The finding of the district court to the effect that the conspiracy pleaded had never been formed is clearly sustained by the evidence. Any claim which the heirs of the full blood may have had against the estate of John S. Robinson on account of his breach of duty as their attorney was settled in the district court for Madison county in the cases appealed from the county court, and plaintiffs' right of recovery for injuries growing out of the conspiracy pleaded was lost with their failure to prove that charge. Defendant Losey is not answerable in this suit to any of the plaintiffs, unless he was guilty of a breach of trust, or participated in some species of fraud through which they were injured. There was no direct conveyance from the heirs to him, and an examination of every transaction with which he was in any way connected results in the approval of the trial court's finding that he was guilty of no wrong or fraud which made him plaintiffs' trustee, or required him to answer to them for acquiring title with which they had parted. It follows that on the merits of the case the findings assailed by cross appellants must be approved. A ruling on defendants' motion is therefore unnecessary.

The other preliminary matter is also presented by defendants. They argue that there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff and of causes of action. Conceding this position to be well taken, when viewed from a technical standpoint, it does not necessarily follow that defendants were prejudiced by the action of the trial court in refusing to dismiss the suit, or in deciding the controversy between Allen & Reed and their clients, after it was found that the evidence disclosed no joint liability of defendants to plaintiffs. The suit was one in equity. The court had jurisdiction of the parties. A statute declares that "the court may determine any controversy between parties before it, when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others." Code, § 46. "Judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs," says the Code, "and for or against one or more of several defendants." Code, § 429. The record indicates clearly that in the adjudication of the controversy between Allen & Reed and their clients the trial court was not influenced in the slightest degree by testimony relating to other issues or to other parties. Allen & Reed understood the issues that resulted in the decree against them. In the petition their employment and professional relations were pleaded. The purchase of their clients' property, the prices paid, and what each received when the property was resold, were also stated. There was a specific prayer for relief as against them, and a prayer for general relief. The petition is held sufficient to require them to account. In separate answers they denied fraud, and pleaded the faithful performance of all their duties as attorneys. They accepted the real issue as to their accountability to their clients, and offered proof to show that they paid a fair price for the property purchased. On such a record it cannot be possible that they were prejudiced by the failure to dismiss the suit for the misjoinders challenged, or that the trial court erred to their prejudice in retaining for adjudication the controversy between them and their clients. In these respects the trial court will be sustained.

The important question for determination is: Shall Allen & Reed be required to account for the profits made by them out of the real estate purchased from their clients? The clients lived in Delaware, and what they knew about their inherited property and their rights during the time they held the title was, in a large measure at least, learned either directly or indirectly from their attorneys, Allen & Reed. The employment of counsel and the nature of their professional relations are not open to serious controversy. They had authority in writing from each of their clients, as follows: "I desire you, as attorneys, to look after my interests, whatever they may be, in the estate of James B. Gibbs, late of Madison county, Nebraska, deceased, for which I agree to pay you a reasonable attorneys' fee out of my share of the estate." They were authorized to sell their clients' interests in the subject-matter of their employment, and the relations continued until they became the purchasers thereof. After some correspondence the clients executed and delivered the following document:

Stanton, Delaware, April 21, 1902.
To Messrs. Allen & Reed,
Madison, Nebraska.

We and each of us do hereby authorize you to sell our interest in the estate of James B. Gibbs, deceased, for the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000) net to us, we to be at no expense, and the aforesaid sum of $3,000 to be paid us for our joint interests in the said estate. The purchaser at said sale is to take our interests in the said estate subject to the dower or other rights of the widow of the said James B. Gibbs, in the same, and also subject to the rights or claims of any and all creditors of the said James B. Gibbs in the said estate, and the amount of the above stated consideration shall not be subject to deduction on account of commissions or counsel fees or from any other cause whatsoever; provided that said sale shall be made within sixty days from this date. In witness whereof, we, Annie Meinhart, Matilda Rodeck, and George T. Hamilton have hereto set our hands the day and year aforesaid.

Annie M. Minehart,
Matilda R. Rodeck,
George T. Hamilton.

Witness: George Himsivorth.

June 14, 1902, Allen & Reed wrote to F. M. Walker, Wilmington, Delaware, a local attorney for the heirs of the half blood, as follows:

Inclosed herewith please find common form of deed to be signed and acknowledged and witnessed by Hamilton and wife and his two sisters. We expect a Mr. Douglass to take this deed, if he can raise the money; but as you will notice, we have left the grantee blank, and if he fails to produce $3,000 to send to pay for the deed, and also pay us our fees in addition, we will wish to let some other person take same, and if they fail, as a last resort, we will take it ourselves. So please have Hamilton and his sisters sign a letter or statement to the First National Bank of this place to fill into the inclosed deed such person or persons as our firm directs, and deliver deed to us, upon the payment of $3,000, and our firm signing a receipt releasing all claims for attorneys' fees, expense, etc. You draw such as we are to sign as you understand the same. Please attend to this at once as the writer [Reed] must leave for the West to be gone some time.

Following is the reply:

Wilmington, Del., June 26, 1902.

Messrs. Allen & Reed,
Madison, Nebraska.

Dear Sirs:—

I am sending you to-day through my bank here the executed deed of Hamilton and wife and his sisters to the First National Bank of Madison, with authority to the cashier of the First National Bank of Madison to fill in the name of the grantee or grantees and deliver on payment of $3,000, as requested by you in your letter of the 14th inst. As you have stated in the deed that the grantee takes subject to dower and creditors' rights of Mr. Gibbs, I do not think it worth while to take any release from them, and as you have stated that the amount to be paid Hamilton and his sisters is $3,000, without any deduction for your counsel fees or other expenses, I am satisfied with your statement in that matter.

Hoping that you may be able to close the matter soon, I remain,

Very truly yours,

F. M. Walker.

The deed, executed in blank by the clients, was received by the First National Bank of Madison during the latter part of June, 1902. June 30, 1902, Allen & Reed directed the bank to insert in the blanks their own names as grantees, and paid the purchase price. Within a few months the property was sold by them at a large profit. The record shows, and it is proper to say, that the senior member of the firm objected to taking the title of his clients, and only consented when informed that the firm obligation to do so had already been given. When the attorneys directed the bank to insert their names in the deed, they acted both for themselves and their clients. In that act they united their personal interests with those of their clients. Their conduct was dual in character. Upon these facts equity raises a presumption against the validity of the transaction, which can only be overcome, if at all, by clear evidence of good faith, of full knowledge, and of independent consent and action. Such is the rule of general acceptance, as applied to dealings between fiduciaries and their principals in which both parties knowingly and intentionally deal with each other. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 957. It is dictated by high considerations of public policy, and springs from the philosophy of the Galilean who declared that "no man can serve two masters," and who prayed, "Lead us not into temptation." It is founded on His divine knowledge of the human heart. The doctrine is firmly established in this state. In a different form it was made applicable to the conduct of executive state officers by a constitutional provision that they shall receive no compensation except their salaries, and that their fees for services shall be paid in advance into the state treasury. The legislature, by adopting that part of the common law not inconsistent with the Constitution and statutes, has adopted the same rule for the protection of confidential relations. The courts have steadfastly required of attorneys the same high standard of professional accountability, and have consistently enforced the doctrine in both actions at law and suits in equity. A late expression of this court, in an opinion by Judge Barnes, is as follows: "Where the attorney purchases the subject of the suit, the client may set aside the purchase at will, unless the attorney shows by clear and conclusive proof that no advantage was taken, that everything was explained to the client, and that the price was fair and reasonable." Levara v. McNeny, 73 Neb. 414, 420, 102 N. W. 1042, 1044. The power to enforce this rule does not depend upon proof of actual fraud. Its application is the same whether attorneys abuse their trust, or act on generous impulses to assume risks and burdens of clients who are poor. Its enforcement does not involve an inquiry into the motives which prompt clients to sue for profits, when viewed from an ethical standpoint. Solicitude for them on account of their improvident contracts is not the basis of relief. The doctrine is founded on public policy. It is demanded by the welfare of society. It arises from the necessity of protecting proper relations of trust and confidence wherever they exist. Adherence to a principle which deprives fiduciaries of undue profits lessens the temptation to violate confidential relations. The attorneys are familiar with the rule stated, and their answer to plaintiffs' demand for its enforcement is that it is shown by uncontradicted evidence that the price paid was the full value of the property purchased. On this issue some of the witnesses expressed opinions as to the value of an heir's undivided one-sixth interest, subject to the widow's life estate. The opinions were based on general knowledge of land values, but knowledge of the value of an undivided sixth or half interest in land subject to a life estate was very meager. Two witnesses, one a banker and the other a dealer in real estate, testified that the interest of each heir, or an undivided one-sixth interest, had no market value, and that its value was purely speculative. They did not state the value for speculative purposes. The testimony of defendant Reed was to the same effect, and in addition he said: "I considered that the undivided one-sixth interest in the 720 acres, which was embarrassed with the life estate of Mrs. Gibbs, considering her age and condition of health, was purely speculative, and that \$1,000 was really more than it was actually worth, but we figured we might get that amount out of it." It is insisted by the attorneys that this testimony, or testimony of like import, is the only competent proof of value at the time of the original purchase, and that it is uncontradicted, and must be accepted as conclusive evidence that the price paid was the fair value of the property. That this is the only alternative cannot be conceded. The property purchased by Allen & Reed was resold within a short time. Copies of their deeds appear in the evidence, and the consideration is correctly stated therein, according to one of the grantors. The prices were fixed by mutual understanding of the parties to the transfers. The trial court made these matters the subject of inquiry. Intestate's land is described in the petition as follows: The W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 6, the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 5, the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 7, all in township 22 N., range 2 W. of the sixth principal meridian, and the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 31 in township 23 N., range 2 W. of the sixth principal meridian, and containing, according to government survey, 720 acres, more or less. At the time of the death of Gibbs the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 6 was occupied by himself and wife as their home, and is described in the record as a homestead. An undivided half interest in this land, subject to the widow's life estate, is what Allen & Reed bought. How they disposed of it, including dates, description, prices, and grantees, is shown by the following findings of the district court:

"July 7, 1902, William V. Allen and Willis E. Reed and their wives conveyed an undivided one-half interest in the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 6, township 22 N., range 2 W. of the sixth principal meridian, to Nancy C. Gibbs, and on the same day Nancy C. Gibbs conveyed to said William V. Allen and Willis E. Reed her life estate in the rest of said land of which the said James B. Gibbs died seised, and paid them \$3,000. August 9, 1902, Thomas F. Memminger and wife conveyed the undivided one-half remainder in the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 6, township 22 N., range 2 W. of the sixth principal meridian, to Nancy C. Gibbs, for which she paid nothing, but the same was in part fulfilment of an agreement to vest the fee title thereof in her by the said Allen & Reed.

"August 9, 1902, William V. Allen and wife, Willis E. Reed and wife, and Thomas F. Memminger and wife, at the request of John S. Robinson, conveyed to John Prauner, Jr., the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 31, township 23 N., range 2 W. of the sixth principal meridian, for which Allen and Reed received \$3,600; about the same day said Allen and wife and said Reed and wife conveyed to George W. Losey the undivided $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 5, township 22 N., range 2 W. of the sixth principal meridian, for \$3,250; the same day Thomas F. Memminger and wife conveyed to said Losey the undivided one-half of the same premises for \$3,250; January 5, 1903, Memminger and wife for \$1 conveyed to John S. Robinson and George W. Losey the undivided $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 7, and the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 6, all in township 22 N., range 2 W. of the sixth principal meridian; and January 3, 1903, said Allen and said Reed and their wives, and John S. Robinson and his wife and George W. Losey and his wife conveyed to Vaclav Devorak, the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 7, township 22 N., range 2 W. of the sixth principal meridian, for \$7,500; and January 16, 1903, said Allen and wife and Reed and wife, Robinson and wife and George W. Losey and wife, conveyed the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 6, township 22 N., range 2 W. of the sixth principal meridian, to Ralph E. Simmons for \$3,500.

"That by the aforesaid several transfers and conveyances of said lands, and as consideration therefor, the said defendants Allen & Reed have received from the interests therein of their said clients George T. Hamilton, Matilda Rodeck, and Annie Minehart the several sums respectively set forth and at the dates as follows, to wit: August 9, 1902, of Nancy C. Gibbs, $3,000; of George W. Losey, $3,250; of John Prauner, Jr., $1,800; January 3, 1903, of W. M. Devorak, $3,750; February 16, 1903, of Ralph E. Simmons, $1,750; total $13,550; and that said Allen & Reed have paid out, on account of said sales and interests of their said clients in the aforesaid real estate, the several sums, at the dates set forth, as follows: June 30, 1902, to their said clients $3,000; August 9, 1902, to the said John S. Robinson, to procure a conveyance to the widow of said James B. Gibbs of the interest of his clients in the 240 acres conveyed to said widow, and to procure a settlement of the claim of Margaret A. Owens against said estate, $2,000; total $5,000."

It thus appears that on what amounted to an investment of $5,000 in the clients' property June 30, 1902, the attorneys realized, on exchanges and resales between that date and February 16, 1903, $13,550. May the prices on resale be considered as evidence that the price paid to the clients was unfair? The prices on resale are shown by deeds admitted in evidence. On cross-examination defendant Reed was asked: "And within six months from the time you made your purchase you sold all of this land, and none of it for less than $40 an acre?" This was answered without objection: "The respective deeds show the consideration." The considerations proved by deeds and oral testimony are not opinions based on knowledge of sales of other lands, but are positive proofs of the actual prices realized from mutual and voluntary exchanges and sales of the identical interests purchased. Subsequent changes in the prices are explained. Reed testified that in 1902 prices increased after the purchase $10 to $15 an acre, but a dealer in real estate made an estimate of $2.50 to $7 an acre. With this explanation of the rise in prices after the original purchase there is no good reason why realized prices amounting to $13,550 for an undivided half interest, when mutually and voluntarily agreed upon by the parties to the resales, should be wholly excluded as evidence of value at the time of the original purchase. The burden was on the attorneys to show by "clear and conclusive proof that no advantage was taken," and that "the price was fair and reasonable." The proof was directed to those questions. The purpose of the testimony is not to fix the precise sum which shall be paid for land taken from the owner without his consent. Proof of what the undivided half interest brought on resale should not be rejected in the present case, under the rule that in a proceeding to condemn land for railway purposes, the owner should not be required to state on cross-examination what he previously paid for land intersected by the right of way. Dietrichs v. Lincoln & N. W. R. Co. 12 Neb. 225, 10 N. W. 718; Omaha Southern R. Co. v. Todd, 39 Neb. 818, 58 N. W. 289; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Griffith, 44 Neb. 690, 62 N. W. 868. Testimony that an undivided sixth interest subject to the widow's life estate had no market value, and the meager general knowledge on which defendant Reed based his opinion that the estate mentioned was not worth $1,000, suggest a substantial reason for considering, in connection with proof of the rise in values, evidence that the undivided half interest purchased by the attorneys was exchanged or resold for $13,550, within a short time. In Rawson v. Prior, 57 Vt. 612, 615, the court said that "what property sells for, which has no regular market price, may be proper evidence tending to show its value."

Upon a showing of the fiduciary relation, and that the fiduciary purchased the property of his principal and sold it within a short time at a large advance, the fiduciary, under the rule in equity heretofore stated, is chargeable, prima facie, with the profits made upon the resale. The principal in such a case is not put to the burden of proving the actual market value at the date of conveyance to the fiduciary. That rule necessarily implies that the price actually received upon a resale by the fiduciary is provable against him. In view of the great disparity between the price paid by Allen & Reed and the prices received by them, proof that the actual increase in the market value of lands was not more than from $2.50 to $15 an acre certainly warrants a finding that the price paid by them was below the fair value, under the rule which makes the prices at which they conveyed competent proof against them.

Another consideration which leads to the conclusion that the proofs are not sufficient to warrant a denial of relief to the clients is that on July 7, 1902, seven days after the delivery of the deed by which the attorneys took title, they had entirely disencumbered their title of the embarrassment of the widow's life estate. This was accomplished by their obtaining her deed of conveyance of 480 acres and $3,000 in exchange for their own deed and the deed of their cotenant in the remainder, or fee estate in 240 acres, to the widow. This adjustment, which operated to make the title merchantable, was well-nigh contemporaneous with their own acquisition of title. Their previous employment as attorneys to safeguard the interests of their clients in these lands, enlarged by express written power to sell, obligated them to bestow their skill and judgment in their clients' cause, and to give full advice as to the most appropriate means of disentangling and disencumbering the title of the life estate of the widow, so that the property of the clients would become merchantable. Where this object is fairly within the purview of the retainer, so that completion of the service of the attorneys may be expected to make the title a merchantable one, equity will not regard as conclusive a showing of value based upon the hypothesis that the embarrassment of the title which gave rise to the retainer made the lands unmerchantable. Without disparaging the motives of the attorneys whose dealings are here in question, any other rule would permit attorneys, after having ascertained by their employment that there was a feasible and practicable method of terminating the life estate by conveying to the life tenant the fee of a fractional area of the lands, to justify their own acquisition of title at a depreciated valuation, when their knowledge derived by their employment in a confidential relationship assured them of their area of merchantable land. Equity does not sanction any rule which, in a situation so sensitive, affords a motive or temptation to profit by betrayal of fiduciary obligations. So, upon the undisputed facts disclosed by the record, the court is not bound or concluded by testimony that the value of an undivided one-sixth interest in the lands embarrassed by the life estate of the widow was of no market value, or that its market value was not in excess of $1,000, the sum paid. The proof of the attorneys as to value was directed principally to a one-sixth interest. In the present case the three heirs had previously authorized a sale of their entire interest, and they in fact joined in one deed. The latter fact, while material, is not the controlling consideration. The vital consideration is the confidential relationship. Under their employment the attorneys had opportunity to gain special knowledge of means to clear the title, and of the actual worth of the interests acquired, and of speedy means of disposal on the footing of a merchantable title. To permit them now to justify upon a showing of depreciated value of a small interest in an embarrassed title, as rated in the market in the estimation of dealers in real estate generally, would operate practically to relieve them of their just burdens of accountability as fiduciaries.

When evidence of the prices on resale is considered, the attorneys have not shown by clear and convincing proofs that the price paid to their clients was fair. On the contrary, the proper deduction from all the evidence is that the price was inadequate. The right of the clients to an accounting is therefore established. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to inquire into the correctness of the several findings of the trial court, or into its reasons for its decree. It was conceded in oral argument by counsel for plaintiffs, however, that the judgment was excessive, and permission will be given to the district court to correct any errors in the account as set out in the decree. It further appears from documents quoted herein that expenses incurred and fees earned by Allen & Reed were parts of the consideration for the interests purchased, and the circumstances are such that, upon proper evidence, they should be credited with these items; the amounts, as to reasonableness, to be determined by the trial court. To this end the attorneys will be permitted to make the necessary proof, if they so desire. For these purposes the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed.

v.

ÆTNA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(75 N. H. 375, 74 Atl. 1051.)

Accident insurance — alternative provisions — weekly indemnity and special loss.

1. An accident insurance company cannot escape liability on its contract for weekly indemnity during a certain period, for total disability caused by an accident which, among other things, results in loss of a limb, because provision for such indemnity is made subject to subsequent provisions, one of which is that, if injury results in loss of such limb, a specified sum less than the claim for total disability shall be paid, whereupon the policy shall be surrendered; and another of which provides that in no event will claim for weekly indemnity be valid, if a valid claim for any of the amounts provided for special injuries can be based upon the same accident and resulting injury,—at least where, among the provisions for special allowances, is one to the effect that, if the injuries result in total disability, the indem-

In Hart v. National Masonic Acci. Asso. 105 Iowa, 717, 75 N. W. 508, it was held under a policy insuring against loss of time and providing for an indemnity for the loss of a foot, that the weekly indemnity, as well as the indemnity for the loss of a foot, could be recovered, though resulting from the same accident, if the total amount recovered did not exceed the limit fixed by the terms of the contract.

In Cunningham v. Union Casualty & Surety Co. 82 Mo. App. 607, a recovery was allowed for the loss of sight, as provided for in the contract of insurance, though the insured had already been paid the indemnity for a continued disability from the same accident, and had released the insurer from all claims for indemnity resulting therefrom, and the policy itself provided that the payment for the loss of sight should terminate the policy and discharge the insurer.

Parsons, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The policy upon its face insures against loss of life, limbs, sight, or time, and states that the principal sum insured is $5,000, and that the weekly indemnity for total disability is $25. The plaintiff was injured during the life and within the terms of the policy, and offered evidence from which the court has drawn the inference that he was totally disabled, within the meaning of the policy, because of the results of the injuries proved. There is no contention that the evidence was not legally sufficient to authorize the finding of total disability. Why, then, should not the defendants pay the plaintiff the indemnity for total disability promised by the face of the policy? If the plaintiff's total disability is permanent, as it appears to be conceded it will be, he would, if he has any right to such indemnity, be entitled to weekly indemnity for 200 weeks, thus exhausting the full principal sum. But the engagements upon the face of the policy are made "subject to the conditions and benefits printed on the following pages."

The defendants, for the purpose of escaping their apparent liability for the principal sum insured, contend that one of the "benefits" to which the plaintiff is entitled is the payment to him of one fifth the principal sum, or $1,000, for the loss of his left hand, which was one of the injuries he received, and that a correct construction of the conditions of the contract releases them, upon payment of the fixed sum for the disability produced by this injury, from their engagement to indemnify the plaintiff for the total disability actually resulting from the injuries he received. The main controversy, therefore, is whether the plaintiff can recover the weekly indemnity of $25, stipulated in the policy, for the total disability resulting from an accident occurring during the life of the policy, or whether his recovery must be limited to the fixed sum which the policy provided should be paid for the removal of the left hand at or above the wrist. The plaintiff, standing on his policy, in this suit is necessarily bound by its provisions, and the defendants are liable only in accordance with the terms of the contract. Johnson v. Maryland Casualty Co. 73 N. H. 259-261, 111 Am. St. Rep. 609, 60 Atl. 1009, and cases cited. This does not mean that an insured who has been fraudulently induced to enter into an unconscionable contract, or deceitfully persuaded to accept as evidence of the contract a policy which misrepresents it, has no remedy, but merely that, in a suit on the policy, he must accept the contract proved by the evidence which he offers. The only question therefore is: What was the contract?

"In construing insurance policies, courts are governed by the same general rules which are applicable to other written contracts. That is to say, it is the duty of the court to adopt that construction of the policy which, in its judgment, shall best correspond with the intention of the parties." Stone v. Granite State F. Ins. Co. 69 N. H. 438, 45 Atl. 235. The intention of the parties, so found from competent evidence, is the contract the court in each case is called upon to enforce." Johnson v. Maryland Casualty Co. 73 N. H. 259, 262, 111 Am. St. Rep. 609, 60 Atl. 1009. The evidence from which such intention is to be found is the language of the written instrument, read in the light of the situation and general purpose of the parties. As men in general do not enter into contracts that are absurd or frivolous, or understandingly include in a written contract stipulations tending to defeat its main purpose, the inconvenience, hardship, or absurdity of one construction, or its contradiction of the general purpose of the contract, is weighty evidence that such meaning was not intended, when the language is open to a construction which is neither absurd nor frivolous, and is in agreement with the general purpose of the parties. Sanders v. Frankfort Marine & Plate Glass Ins. Co. 72 N. H. 485, 101 Am. St. Rep. 688, 57 Atl. 655; 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Kendall v. Green, 67 N. H. 557, 562, 563, 42 Atl. 178.

"Insurance, then, is a contract of indemnity," under which "satisfaction is to be made to the person insured for loss he may have sustained." Cummings v. Cheshire County M. F. Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 457-459. The general purpose of the contract under consideration was therefore to indemnify the insured for loss resulting from accidental personal injury. With such end in view, it would be natural to expect that the greater the loss, the larger would be the sum payable as indemnity. Such are the main provisions of the contract. For injuries producing a partial disability, disabling the insured from the performance of one or more of the duties of his occupation, payment at the rate of $10 per week for twenty-six weeks is stipulated. For a total disability, $25 per week is agreed to be paid during the continuance of such disability, for a time sufficient to exhaust the policy. The limit, therefore, of indemnity provided for partial disability, is $260, while for permanent total disability, the full face of the policy, or $5,000, is payable. The policy also prescribes the sums payable for certain specified results following an injury. For loss of life, death resulting within ninety days of the injury, the loss of both hands at or above the wrists, both feet at or above the ankles, one hand and one foot at those places, or the irrecoverable loss of the sight of both eyes, the full principal sum is payable; for the similar loss of the right hand, or of either leg at or above the knee, one half the principal sum is payable; for the similar removal of the left hand, or either foot at or above the ankle, one fifth that sum is payable; and for the loss of one eye, one eighth is promised. These provisions grade the payment according to the injury. The cases where the full sum is payable are cases which would ordinarily result in total permanent disability, and the policy provides for the payment of the same sum which would be called for by the stipulation as to weekly indemnity; while where a less sum is provided, the cases are of a disability not permanently total, and the effect of the provisions is to define the liability of the insurer for such disabilities, for all these provisions are "in lieu of weekly indemnity." An insured who is immediately, continuously, and wholly disabled from prosecuting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation for the term of 200 weeks (using the language of the policy defining a permanent total disability) has, it would be generally considered, suffered a more serious loss than one who has merely lost his left hand at the wrist; and one who suffers such permanent total disability, resulting from other injuries in the same accident, would incontrovertibly suffer greater loss if the removal of his left hand were added to his other injuries.

In view of the general purpose of insurance—the satisfaction of the loss—and the general provisions of this policy which have been mentioned, it would be expected that, for the greater loss, the policy would in all cases provide the greater recompense. But the defendants, while conceding that they would otherwise be liable to pay the plaintiff weekly indemnity for the total disability resulting to him from the injuries received, contend that, because he had the misfortune to lose his left hand, they are only liable to pay one fifth the amount insured. If he had been so unfortunate as to lose the sight of one eye, the same contention would reduce their liability to one eighth the principal sum. The contention is that an increase in the plaintiff's loss diminished the indemnity (called "benefit" in the policy) which the plaintiff was entitled to receive. There is no element of insurance in such a contract. Provisions in the policy by which an increase in injury should diminish the indemnity payable would not only be opposed to the general purpose of the contract of insurance, but to the general purpose of this contract, as evidenced by repeated provisions contained therein. No reason is suggested why the parties should have made such an agreement. The only ground of the claim is that it is so written in the bond. This requires an examination of the portion of the policy entitled "conditions and benefits," which are contained in twenty-four numbered paragraphs.

The first paragraph, as to which no question is made, prescribes the conditions under which the policy becomes a claim; the second provides for the payment of the full principal sum in case of death within ninety days after injury; the third stipulates that the full principal sum shall be paid if the injuries result in loss of sight or limbs within ninety days; and by the fourth, one half the principal sum is to be paid for certain other loss of limbs. Paragraph 5 is the particular provision involved, and is as follows: "If such injuries alone result within ninety days in loss by removal of the left hand at or above the wrist, or either foot at or above the ankle, the insured shall be paid one fifth the principal sum insured, in lieu of weekly indemnity as herein provided, and this policy shall thereupon cease, and be surrendered to the company;" or (6) if the injuries result in the same time in the irrecoverable loss of the sight of one eye, one eighth the principal sum is payable in the same way; or (7) if such injuries result in total disability, an indemnity of $25 per week is provided for 200 weeks, if total disability exists during that period. Paragraph 7 also provides for a weekly indemnity of $10 for a partial disability for a limited period.

There is nothing in these provisions as to "benefits" that supports the defendants' contention. It is to be observed that the prominent idea throughout the policy is the payment of weekly indemnity. Such is the promise on the face of the policy, and the fixed payments in paragraphs 3 to 6, inclusive, are all in lieu of weekly indemnity, to which the parties must have understood the insured would otherwise be entitled. Hence the company agreed to pay, and the insured to receive, for the losses respectively described in each paragraph, the sums named, in place of the weekly indemnity of $25 or $10 per week, to which he would otherwise be entitled. The provisions are each in the alternative. If the plaintiff's proof shows that his loss is described in any one of these paragraphs, he is entitled to the satisfaction therein provided. If in this case his proof had stopped with showing that the injuries had, within ninety days, resulted in the loss by removal of his left hand at the wrist, he could have recovered the sum named in paragraph 5; but he went further, and brought his case within the alternative promise contained in paragraph 7, by showing that the injuries received had resulted, not merely in the loss of his left hand, provided for by paragraph 5, but in a total disability. The total disability provided for by paragraph 7 is a separate and distinct loss from the loss of the left hand or foot, covered by paragraph 5, as that is from the loss of a right hand or a leg, covered by paragraph 4, and equally insured against.

No paragraph is found in the policy prescribing a fixed sum to be paid and received in lieu of weekly indemnity for the loss of memory and ability to figure contracts, loss of left arm and thumb and first two fingers of the right hand, fracture of nose and ribs, and scalding. The only complete description of the plaintiff's loss is found in paragraph 7, describing disability for which weekly indemnity is payable. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover the weekly indemnity which paragraph 7 provides, unless some other provision of the contract is found requiring an insured, who suffers any loss particularly described in paragraphs 3 to 6, inclusive, to waive all claim for compensation for other losses. The defendants claim such provision is contained in paragraph 21, the material part of which is as follows: "In no event will claim for weekly indemnity be valid, if a valid claim for any of the amounts herein provided for specified injuries can be based upon the same accident and resulting injuries." It is, of course, true that an insured who, as a result of an accident within the terms of the policy, had irrecoverably lost the use of his limbs and the sight of one eye, might waive all claim for the serious results of his injury, and maintain a valid claim for the amount provided for the loss of an eye, as the plaintiff might, as has been suggested, have in this case confined his evidence to the loss of his arm. In the same way one who had suffered the loss of the left hand and foot, for which he would be entitled to the principal sum under paragraph 3, might waive the loss of his foot, and, proving only the loss of his left hand, establish a valid claim under paragraph 5. It would be as logical to claim in such case that because, upon payment of one fifth of the total sum for the loss of a left hand, the defendants are entitled to have the policy surrendered to them under paragraph 5, therefore they are under no obligation to pay the principal sum promised for the loss sustained under paragraph 3, as it is to claim in this case that, upon like payment, no obligation exists for satisfaction of the loss specified in paragraph 7. It is not probable that paragraph 21 was intended to release the defendants from the liability of paragraph 7 for the injuries there specified. Such result can be reached only by construing the provision as requiring the plaintiff to limit his proof to a portion of his loss; for in this way only can his injury be brought within the list of specified injuries for which a definite amount is fixed. Such an interpretation produces a result so foreign to the general purpose of insurance, and the repeated prior provisions of the contract in suit, that it is not probable the parties, in entering into the contract, attached such meaning to the language. Neither does such meaning attend the literal construction of the language; for, while a valid claim could be made for an amount provided for a specified injury which was one of the results of the accident, the policy, as has already been seen, does not declare that any particular sum should be a satisfaction of all the loss from the injuries in this case. Consequently, no valid claim for a particular amount as compensation for the plaintiff's entire loss can be made, and the paragraph relied upon has no bearing in the case. Its manifest purpose is plainly to make clear that when an insured's loss is covered by paragraphs 3 to 6, he could recover only the amounts named therein. It cannot be construed as excusing the defendants from liability for losses not described in those paragraphs, without disregarding the purpose of the parties and the plain meaning of the language which they have used to express that purpose.

Paragraph 10 of the policy is: "If such injuries shall necessitate a surgical operation within ninety days from the date thereof, the insured shall be paid, in addition to the indemnity herein provided, the sum indicated for such operation in the schedule hereinafter contained, provided always that not more than one amount shall be payable for one or more operations performed as the result of one accident." The defendants contend that, under this paragraph, they agreed to pay only one of the sums named in the schedule for the different operations; or, in other words, for only one, if several of the different operations enumerated should be necessary as the result of one accident. If such had been the defendants' purpose in drafting the policy, they could have easily provided that payment should be made for only one operation following an accident; but the paragraph distinctly recognizes their liability for "one or more" operations, and provides not that they shall pay for only one operation, but only one amount for one or more operations. The schedule attached to the policy contains a long list of amounts payable for different operations. The amounts vary according to the nature of the operation; and, if payment for only one operation was intended to be promised when several were necessary, it is probable some method would have been provided by which to determine which one of the different amounts should be paid. If the defendants are liable for only one, the policy contains nothing which makes them liable to pay for the amputation of the arm, rather than for the reduction of the fracture of the nose or ribs. Which operation should be paid for could be determined only by invoking an arbitrary rule against one of the parties. But it is common knowledge that a surgical operation is not always successful in the first instance and may have to be repeated. In this case there is reference to reamputation of crushed limbs. For amputation of the arm the defendants promised to pay $50. They protected themselves by paragraph 10 from the payment of a second amount for reamputation. Similarly, they are liable to pay only once for the reduction of the fracture of the nose and ribs and for the amputation of the fingers. That is all that has been found against them. There is no error in the verdict. The defendants' refusal to pay on other grounds was a waiver of any defects in the proof of loss. Seely v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 72 N. H. 49, 54, 55 Atl. 425. The detailed statement of the injuries in the certificate of the attending physician accompanying the proof was notice to persons of ordinary intelligence of the necessity of surgical attention, even without the distinct reference to reamputation.

Whether the suit was commenced within one year after the accident, or within six months of the proof of loss, depended upon whether that was done which the law deems essential to the commencement of the suit. Under our practice, a suit is commenced when the writ is filled out with the intention of having it served. Buswell v. Babbitt, 65 N. H. 168, 169, 18 Atl. 748; Society for Propagating the Gospel v. Whitcomb, 2 N. H. 229, 230. There was evidence that this was done within the time limited. The fact that the writ was not served or delivered to the sheriff for service until afterward is evidence on the question when, and the purpose with which, the writ was filled out, but it is not conclusive. The verdict for the plaintiff involves a finding that the writ was made, when it was made, with the intention of having it served, from which it follows that the suit was commenced on the date of the writ.

Exceptions overruled.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

SHAW & HODGINS, Respts.,
v.

CITY OF SNOHOMISH et al.
and

C. W. WALDRON, Appt.

(55 Wash. 271, 104 Pac. 272.)

Tax—special assessment—limitation of action.

1. Owners of property against which a special assessment for local improvements is directed to be made by the court after an attempted levy has been set aside cannot avoid liability thereon on the ground that the limitation period has run since the first assessment became delinquent, if it has not run since the court ordered the new assessment.

Municipality—supplies—official interest—validity.

2. The entire claim of a contractor for work which he has performed for a municipality is not defeated by the fact that he purchased some of his supplies from the mayor, where the statute provides that any claim for materials furnished in which that officer is interested shall be void.

(Fullerton, J., dissents.)

(October 11, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant Waldron from a judgment of the Superior Court for Snohomish County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to restrain the City of Snohomish and its officers from collecting certain special assessments for improvements and from paying certain warrants held by defendant Waldron. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kerr & McCord, Frank D. Nash, and Merrick & Mills, for appellant:

The reassessment is not barred by the statute of limitations.

Note.—Effect of running of limitation since original assessment for local improvement upon a reassessment ordered because of invalidity of original.

In Murray v. Chicago, 175 Ill. 340, 51 N. E. 654, the court said in effect that even if the general statute of limitations applied to assessments, the running thereof was interrupted by the setting aside of the original assessment, and that the right to make a new assessment would not have been barred until the lapse of the statutory period of limitation which commenced to run upon vacation of the original assessment.

The Washington court said in Lewis v. Seattle, 28 Wash. 639, 69 Pac. 393, that no statute limited the time for making a reassessment after the original assessment had been declared void. Nevertheless it was held in Frye v. Mt. Vernon, 42 Wash. 268, 84 Pac. 864, that where the statutory period for the enforcement of an assessment had elapsed since the original was declared void, the right to make a new assessment was barred, as was the right of a holder of warrants to compel a reassessment by mandamus. Language employed in this case is quoted in SHAW v. SNOHOMISH. Likewise denying the right of the municipality to make a reassessment after the statutory period has elapsed since the vacation of the original assessment is Olympia v. Knox, 49 Wash. 537, 95 Pac. 1090.

The Washington court also holds that the statute limiting the right to enforce the assessment does not commence to run until the reassessment, where the original assessment has been set aside. Bowman v. Colfax, 17 Wash. 344, 49 Pac. 551; Fogg v. Hoquiam, 23 Wash. 340, 63 Pac. 234. A similar result was reached in the analogous case of state ex rel. Heman v. Ballard, 16 Wash. 418, 47 Pac. 970, where it was held that the statute of limitations did not begin to run against actions on improvement warrants of a town illegally incorporated until the subsequent legislative validation of its incorporation and prior contracts.

Defendant Waldron's warrants are void for the reason that the street contractor, in violation of the positive terms of the statute, purchased the material used in the street improvement from the mayor of the city.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1890 the city of Snohomish adopted ordinances creating improvement districts, made improvements, and issued warrants to cover the cost. In 1891 a special assessment was made upon the lands abutting on the streets which had been improved. In 1894 this assessment was adjudged by the court to be void, whereupon the city made another assessment which was also declared to be void. Thereafter, and from time to time, appellant, Waldron, who was the holder of most of the warrants, urged and demanded of the city council that they make a reassessment upon the property benefited. This might have been done under the act of 1895, chap. 79, p. 142, but no action was ever taken by the city authorities. In 1901 Waldron instituted a proceeding in the superior court for Snohomish county against the mayor and councilmen of the city of Snohomish to compel a reassessment. This proceeding was defended by the city, and, being brought on for trial in 1902, was taken under advisement by the court, who so held it until the 7th day of January, 1905, when he issued a writ of mandate compelling the city to proceed with the assessment as prayed for in the petition. Upon appeal (Waldron v. Snohomish, 41 Wash. 566, 83 Pac. 1106) this judgment was affirmed, and a reassessment was thereafter made by the city. After due notice given, this assessment was confirmed by the council early in the year 1907. Thereafter respondents and several others brought actions to restrain the city from proceeding further, or in any manner undertaking to collect any part of the assessments, and from paying any of the warrants held by appellant, Waldron. A demurrer to the complaint being overruled, defendants answered, defendant Waldron setting up as an affirmative defense the matters to which we have briefly referred and to all of which a demurrer was sustained. Certain facts were stipulated, after which the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and defendant Waldron has appealed.

There seem to be two grounds upon which respondents rest their case: (1) That the right to levy and collect this special assessment is barred by the statute of limitations; (2) that the original contract is void in that the then mayor of the city did in violation of the statute (Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 968 [Pierce's Code, § 3510]) contract with and furnish the original contractors with materials and supplies to be used in the prosecution of the work. The record indicates that the first is the only ground considered by the trial court. This court has held that special assessments are not charges against the general funds of the city. State ex rel. American Freehold-Land Mortg. Co. v. Tanner, 45 Wash. 348, 88 Pac. 321, where the authorities are collected and discussed; and also Dean v. Walla Walla, 48 Wash. 76, 92 Pac. 895; Soule v. Ocosta, 49 Wash. 518, 95 Pac. 1083; Jurey v. Seattle, 50 Wash. 272, 97 Pac. 107. Therefore, if the landowner can plead the statute, this action cannot be maintained under the authority of Frye v. Mt. Vernon, 42 Wash. 272, 84 Pac. 864, and Olympia v. Knox, 49 Wash. 537, 95 Pac. 1090. The exact date upon which the original assessment became delinquent is not made certain in the record, but it is admitted that it was in the year 1891; and, inasmuch as the defense of the statute was not set up in the case of Waldron v. Snohomish, we must assume that appellant Waldron instituted that action within the ten-year period of limitations, as provided in the act of 1895. At any rate, under the decision of this court rendered in that case, a peremptory writ issued to compel the reassessment which respondents now seek to defeat.

The remaining question then is: Was the statute of limitations arrested while appellant, Waldron, pursued his remedy against the city? It must be borne in mind that Waldron had no remedy against the property owners, and the city no direct interest in the result of the litigation. Waldron brought his action against the only party chargeable in the first instance. He pursued the only remedy he had, and the defense made by the city was for the benefit of the property owners. Had the city won, they would have had the benefit of the improvement with the property discharged of all liens. It lost, and they are bound by the judgment, and precluded from asserting any defense that might have been made in the principal action. An action begun within the period of limitation to compel an assessment is equivalent in law to a valid assessment.

In the cases relied on by respondents, no legal assessment was made within ten years after the work was done or the assessment became delinquent on the first attempted levy. In Frye v. Mt. Vernon, the court said: "It will thus appear that on December 22, 1904, when respondent, as relator herein, filed his original affidavit asking a writ of mandamus, a period of over thirteen years had expired since the original assessment now claimed to be invalid had become delinquent. . . . No question can arise but that a period of more than ten years has expired, not only since the original pretended assessment became delinquent, but also since, as claimed by respondent, it was adjudged to be void. . . . Assume that the town council of Mt. Vernon should, of its own motion, make a reassessment to pay these warrants, the original assessment having been delinquent for more than ten years, would it be contended that the owners of property assessed could not plead the statute of limitations when the municipality endeavored to enforce its lien? To say they could not plead the statute would be to hold that the council could delay making a reassessment for any indefinite period of time, and yet hold that, whenever any council at a later date might perchance be seized with an inclination or desire to reassess, they could and would be permitted to do so, without regard to lapse of time. We do not think this could be permitted. But if, after the lapse of ten years, the council could not make a valid reassessment of its own motion, it will not be required to do so by a peremptory writ of mandate." The necessary implication from this language is that, if the action had been instituted by Frye within the ten-year period of limitation, the decision in that case would have been different, and the city would have been compelled to levy an assessment to pay the improvement warrants. The logical sequence of this reasoning is that, if it be lawful to compel the city to levy an assessment, the courts will not restrain the collection of the tax. The remedy to which the court has said appellant is entitled is not so much the levy of the assessment as its collection; and the rights and liabilities of all parties, including the property owner, who was in law the party charged in the mandamus proceeding, although prosecuted against the city, related back to and are fixed as of the time the action was begun. The mandamus proceeding having been begun within the period of limitation, the property owner must be held to be bound by the acts and defenses made by the city council. Otherwise appellant would be without remedy. We concede the rule to be otherwise where the warrant holder allows the full limit of the statute to run before beginning an action to compel a valid assessment. Upon this principle this case is to be distinguished from the late case of State ex rel. Seymour v. Slater, 53 Wash. 608, 102 Pac. 651.

The following facts were stipulated, and, although probably not passed upon by the trial judge, are before us for legal construction: "It is stipulated that the books of Blackman Bros. show that between October 31, 1890, and December 31, 1890, Joseph Plaskett, the contractor, purchased from Blackman Bros. three bills of lumber aggregating two thousand eighty-eight dollars and ninety cents ($2,088.00), and that said books show that from January 8 to June 12, 1891, Blackman Bros. credited Plaskett's accounts with the sum of eighteen hundred and fifty-two ($1,852) dollars, which Mr. Blackman states was paid out by Plaskett to the men employed in his mill on their wage account upon the order of Blackman Bros., and that Mr. Blackman will also testify that this lumber was sold by his firm in the ordinary course of business. It is stipulated that the contractor, Mr. Plaskett, purchased lumber from other mills for said contract to the extent of at least ten thousand dollars ($10,000), and that, in purchasing the lumber from Blackman Bros., he acted in good faith, in the ordinary course of his business. It is admitted that Mr. Plaskett will testify that he purchased this timber in the ordinary course of his business, and that he had no agreement with Blackman Bros., or the mayor as a member of the firm of Blackman Bros., for a share of any of the profits that might inure to him in the prosecution of his contract with the city for these improvements, and that both Mr. Blackman and Mr. Plaskett will testify that the contract for the sale of the lumber above referred to was entered into subsequent to the time the contract for the improvement herein referred to had been let to Mr. Plaskett by the city of Snohomish, and that there was no understanding of any character whatsoever had at or prior to the time said contract was let that the firm of Blackman Bros. were to furnish any part of the lumber to be used in connection therewith. "That the said H. Blackman was at all of said times a member of a firm known as Blackman Bros., and owned a large and substantial interest in the business of said firm. That the said firm entered into a contract with the said J. H. Plaskett, the contractor for said work, whereby the said Blackman Bros. agreed to furnish all the lumber required for the planking of said street and the construction of the sidewalks on each side thereof, and agreed to accept in payment for said lumber warrants thereafter to be issued by the said defendant, city of Snohomish, to the said contractor for said work. That large quantities of lumber were used in planking said streets and constructing sidewalks and curbing thereon. That the said Blackman Bros. furnished all the lumber therefor pursuant to said agreement, and received from said contractor in payment therefor warrants issued by said city to said contractor for said work.'" The record shows that H. Blackman was the mayor of Snohomish at that time. The case of Northport v. Northport Townsite Co., 27 Wash. 543, 68 Pac. 204, is relied on by respondents to defeat a recovery. The concrete question presented is whether the whole claim of an independent contractor can be avoided because, in the execution of his contract, he has bought necessary supplies or materials from a member of the city council or the mayor. Although the construction put upon the Northport Case by respondents may seem warranted, yet we cannot think that it was ever the intention of the court to hold that a dealing on the part of the contractor with a city officer would do more than avoid a contract pro tanto. Section 968, Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes (P. C. § 3510), among other things provides: "And any claim for compensation for work done, or supplies or materials furnished, in which any such officer is interested, shall be void, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) and if audited and allowed, shall not be paid by the treasurer." It also provides for removal from office and for punishment in case of wilful violation. The statute is aimed at the officer, and intended to prevent a recovery on his part or to the extent of his interest when the claim is asserted by another. This object is attained when the amount of his interest is determined and rejected. Out of the whole amount due on the original contract the value of the material furnished and in which the mayor had an interest was inconsiderable. The record shows that an appeal is pending from the order of assessment. The correctness of the amount of the assessment is made a proper subject for the determination of the superior court upon such appeal, and we doubt not that the court will reject the warrants so unlawfully issued, as well as consider other irregularities, and give judgment accordingly.

This cause will be reversed, and remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

ELIZA UDEN et al., Appts.

(242 Ill. 434, 90 N. E. 298.)

Statute of frauds — contract by cotenant — authorization in writing.

1. A written contract or memorandum of sale is necessary to enforce against one tenant in common a contract for sale of real estate negotiated by his cotenant, although he authorizes the latter in writing to make the sale.

Note. — Written authority to agent to contract for sale of property as dispensing with necessity that contract of sale itself be in writing.

The conclusion reached in the above decision that written authority to an agent to sell property is insufficient to dispense with the requirement of the statute of Same — memorandum — sufficiency — draft of deed.

2. Neither a draft of a deed nor a written notice to execute the same is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute of frauds as to a memorandum of the sale of real estate, where they do not contain the terms of sale.

Contract — cotenants — compliance with authority.

3. A contract by one cotenant to sell the real estate belonging to both is not binding on the other where it does not comply with the terms of the written authority conferred upon him.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for La Salle County in complainants' favor in a suit to compel specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of certain lands. Reversed.

Statement by Dunn, J.:

William Patterson died intestate owning certain real estate in La Salle county, and on October 16, 1908, his heirs executed the following writing:

"This agreement, made and entered into this sixteenth day of October, A. D. 1908, by and between Sarah Trout and A. B. Trout, her husband, Elizabeth Marsh and Henry C. Marsh, her husband, T. H. Patterson and Ella Patterson, his wife, Jane Hurton and Ebenezer Hurton, her husband, Mary Gardner and Fred Gardner, her husband, John Patterson and Rose Patterson, his wife, Eliza Uden and B. S. Uden, her husband, and Noah Patterson and Elnora Patterson, his wife, Marion Patterson, wife of Benjamin A. Patterson, parties of the first part, and Benjamin A. Patterson, party of the second part (the said Sarah Trout, Elizabeth Marsh, T. H. Patterson, Jane Hurton, Mary Gardner, John Patterson, Eliza Uden, Noah Patterson, and Benjamin A. Patterson being all and the only heirs at law of William Patterson, deceased):

"Witnesseth, that the parties of the first part, for the purpose of saving the expense of a partition sale of the lands hereinafter described, agree with the said second party as follows:

"First—That said second party may and shall offer for public sale, at auction, for cash, not later than December 15, 1908, the following described real estate, to wit: The west half (W. $\frac{1}{2}$) of the north half (N. $\frac{1}{2}$) of the northeast quarter (N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) and the east half (E. $\frac{1}{2}$) of the northwest quarter (N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$), all in section twenty-seven (27), township thirty-two (32), north, range two (2), east of the third principal meridian, in the county of La Salle and state of Illinois.

"Second—That said parties of the first part will join with said party of the second part in the making, execution, and delivery of a good and sufficient warranty deed for said above described premises to the purchaser or purchasers thereof at said sale.

"Third—That out of the proceeds of said sale said party of the second part shall first retain and pay all necessary expenses of such sale, including auctioneer's fees, expenses of advertising, abstract of title, and a reasonable compensation to said second party for his time in advertising and making such sale; also that he shall retain out of the proceeds of such sale a sufficient sum to pay any and all unpaid claims allowed against the estate of William Patterson, deceased, as well as costs and expenses of administration of said estate.

"Fourth—That the purchaser or purchasers at said sale shall pay at least 10 per cent (10%) of the purchase price cash in hand on the day of sale, and the balance thereof as soon as warranty deed conveying a good and merchantable title to said premises shall be tendered to such purchaser or purchasers.

"Fifth—That said parties of the first part will join with said party of the second part in the execution of a good and sufficient bond to such purchaser or purchasers, in such a sum as will protect him or them against any unpaid claims which might be a lien against said premises, should such purchaser or purchasers require. Said party of the second part agrees that he will make distribution of the residue of the proceeds of such sale (after making the payments and deductions aforesaid) to the parties entitled thereto, according to their respective rights and interests within ——— after final payment has been made by such purchaser or purchasers."

On December 12, 1908, Benjamin A. Patterson offered the land at public auction. Henry F. Hartenbower was the highest bidder therefor, and the land was struck off to him, but no written contract or memorandum of sale was made. On January 25, 1909, Benjamin A. Patterson served on apfrauds, that the contract itself be written, was also reached in two other cases from the same jurisdiction: Lasher v. Gardner, 124 Ill. 441, 16 N. E. 919, and Fletcher v. Underwood, 240 Ill. 554, 88 N. E. 1030.

To the same effect is Haydock v. Stow, 40 N. Y. 363, in which it was held that a 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) written instrument authorizing an agent to sell land, across which an intending purchaser had written an agreement to purchase the land upon the terms therein stated, was not a compliance with the statute of frauds, though the owner subsequently gave his verbal assent thereto.

J. A. C.

pellants, Eliza Uden and Benjamin S. Uden, the following notice:

To Eliza Uden and B. S. Uden, her Husband:

You and each of you will please take notice that the certain warranty deed dated the 19th day of December 1908 to be executed by the heirs at law of William Patterson, deceased conveying to Henry F. Hartenbower, for the consideration of $12,720, the west half of the north half of the north-east quarter and the east half of the north-west quarter, all in section 27, township 32, north, range 2, east of the third P. M., in La Salle county, Illinois (said deed being the same one this day presented to you and each of you for your signature and acknowledgment), will be at the Tonica Exchange Bank, at Tonica, Ill., for a period of ten days from this date, for the purpose of giving you and each of you an opportunity of signing and acknowledging the same. If you fail to sign and acknowledge said deed within ten days from this date I shall commence a suit in the circuit court of La Salle county, Illinois, for the specific performance of the certain contract entered into on the 16th day of October, 1908, by and between said heirs at law of William Patterson, deceased (you and each of you having signed said contract), parties of the first part, and by myself, party of the second part, the costs of said suit and other damages to be recovered from you for your failure to execute said deed pursuant to said contract. Benjamin A. Patterson.

Dated this 25th day of January, A. D. 1909.

The deed mentioned in the notice was a statutory warranty deed from the heirs of William Patterson to Henry F. Hartenbower, conveying to him, for a consideration of $12,720, the land described in the notice. It was signed by all of the heirs except Eliza Uden. Benjamin A. Patterson asked her and her husband to sign it, before serving the notice on them. She did not sign the deed, and on February 15, 1909, the appellees, Henry F. Hartenbower and Benjamin A. Patterson, filed their bill against her and her husband in the circuit court of La Salle county, alleging the execution of the writing of October 16, 1908; the sale to Hartenbower; that Patterson presented to Hartenbower an abstract of title which was acceptable to him, and he is now ready and willing to pay the full purchase price on the presentation to him of a deed signed by all of the cotenants; that a deed was prepared and signed by all the heirs except appellants, but they refused to sign the same. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The prayer of the bill was that the appellants be required to join the other heirs of William Patterson in the execution of a proper deed of conveyance of said premises to said Hartenbower. The appellants filed a plea setting up that there was no contract of sale in writing, nor was there any note or memorandum thereof in writing, signed by the defendants or by any person by them lawfully authorized, and claiming the benefit of the statute of frauds. Replication was filed, and upon the hearing the court rendered a decree that the appellants join with the other heirs of William Patterson in the execution of a proper deed of conveyance of said premises, and deliver the same to Benjamin A. Patterson, who, upon receipt of the purchase money, shall deliver it to Hartenbower.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The statute of frauds having been pleaded, it was necessary for the complainants to produce a contract, or some note or memorandum thereof in writing, signed by the defendants, or some other person thereunto by them lawfully authorized in writing signed by them. The authority of Benjamin A. Patterson sufficiently appears from the writing of October 16, 1908. It was not, however, a contract of sale. The statute further requires that the contract entered into for the sale of the land, or some note or memorandum thereof, shall also be in writing. Fletcher v. Underwood, 240 Ill. 554, 88 N. E. 1030; Lasher v. Gardner, 124 Ill. 441, 16 N. E. 919. No particular form is necessary to constitute the memorandum required by the statute. An admission in writing of the making of the contract is sufficient, and the writing need not all be on one piece of paper. It is essential, however, that the writings contain everything necessary to show the contract between the parties, so that there be no need of parol proof of any of the terms or conditions of the sale or the intention of the parties. The contract cannot rest partly in writing and partly in parol, but the written memorandum must disclose all the terms. Doty v. Wilder, 15 Ill. 407, 60 Am. Dec. 756; McConnell v. Brillhart, 17 Ill. 354, 65 Am. Dec. 661; Farwell v. Lowther, 18 Ill. 252; Esmay v. Gorton, 18 Ill. 483; Lasher v. Gardner, supra. The undelivered deed to Hartenbower, executed by the heirs of William Patterson other than the defendants, contains no conditions whatever, and makes no mention of the terms of the contract under which it was made. It purports to be simply a conveyance of the land. It is no memorandum or note of the contract. Kopp v. Reiter, 146 Ill. 437, 22 L.R.A. 273, 37 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Am. St. Rep. 156, 34 N. E. 942; Shovers v. Warrick, 152 Ill. 355, 38 N. E. 792.

Neither is the notice that was served on appellants any memorandum or note of a contract of sale. That notice merely informed appellants that a deed which had been presented to them for execution, conveying the land in question to Henry F. Hartenbower for the consideration of $12,720, would be at the bank in Tonica for ten days, to give them an opportunity to execute it, and that if they did not do so, Benjamin A. Patterson would commence suit for the specific performance of the agreement of October 16, 1908, for costs and damages, for their failure to execute said deed pursuant to said contract. They had not agreed to execute this deed by the contract referred to. This notice did not state that Benjamin A. Patterson had made a contract for the sale of the lands, or that Hartenbower had bought it. It does not, on its face, purport to relate to any contract of sale. The mere demand that the heirs execute a deed did not amount to evidence of a contract for the sale of the land. To satisfy the requirements of the statute it is essential that all the material terms and conditions of the contract appear in writing, without the necessity of resorting to parol evidence. Leave out the parol evidence of the auction sale, and there is no evidence in this record of any sale to Hartenbower.

If the notice were otherwise sufficient as a memorandum of a contract of sale to Hartenbower, it is defective because it does not require the payment of 10 per cent of the purchase money in cash on the day of sale. An owner of land has the right to prescribe the terms on which he will sell, and his agent has no authority to make a contract of sale on different terms from those prescribed. If the written authority to the agent to sell fixes the amount of the cash payment and the amount and date of the deferred payments, he has no authority to make a contract for a different cash payment, or for deferred payments of different dates or amounts. Oliver v. Sattler, 233 Ill. 536, 84 N. E. 652; Monson v. Kill, 144 Ill. 248, 33 N. E. 43; Hoyt v. Shipherd, 70 Ill. 309. The deed shows that one of the heirs lived in Missouri and another in Oklahoma. The conveyance could not be made until after the sale was made and the name of the purchaser known. The authority was to sell for 10 per cent cash and the balance on the delivery of a warranty deed. This authorized the making of a contract for sale for 10 per cent cash and the balance in such reasonable time as might be required for the execution of the deed by all the parties. The notice contains no allusion to any such terms, and nothing from which it can be inferred that any cash payment was to be made before the delivery of the deed. It is said by appellees that the evidence shows that a cash payment of 10 per cent was made. It is not a question, however, of what may be proved by parol to have been done, but what the written contract shows. The statute of frauds being pleaded, a contract or memorandum in writing must be shown. The writing authorized the agent to make a certain contract, and the contract shown must be in conformity with the authority conferred. If it is not, then it is unauthorized, and there is no contract or memorandum signed by any person lawfully authorized thereto.

The decree of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Death is not disability.

Rosenberry v. Fidelity & C. Co.; Burnett v. Railway Officials & E. Acci. Asso.; and Hall v. American Employers' Liability Ins. Co.,—supra.

Sherwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 8th day of April, 1907, the defendant issued to George H. Craine a policy of insurance, denominated a "limited health policy," agreeing to pay him the sum of $25 a week for temporary disability, for a period not in excess of twenty-six consecutive weeks' duration, and agreeing to pay him for permanent disability in the following language: "(2) In a sum equal to one hundred weeks' indemnity for temporary disability as aforesaid; to be paid

Note. — Liability for death under policy insuring against permanent or total disability.

That death is not the kind of disability contemplated by a policy providing for indemnity to insured in case of his total disability was also the conclusion reached in Hall v. American Employers' Liability Ins. Co. 96 Ga. 413, 23 S. E. 310; Rosenberry v. Fidelity & C. Co. 14 Ind. App. 625, 43 N. E. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

317; Dawson v. Accident Ins. Co. 38 Mo. App. 355; Shaw v. Equitable Mut. Acci. Asso. 5 Neb. (Unof.) 584, 99 N. W. 672; Burnett v. Railway Official & E. Acci. Asso. 107 Tenn. 185, 64 S. W. 18.

For a discussion of the general question as to what constitutes disability within the meaning of an accident or health policy, see the notes to Turner v. Fidelity & C. Co. 38 L.R.A. 529, and Keith v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352. J. A. C.

to him upon satisfactory proof at the company's home office, in Hartford, Connecticut, that he has, as the result of disease contracted during the term of his policy, entirely and irrecoverably lost the sight of both eyes, or by incurable paralysis permanently and entirely lost the use of both hands or both feet, or of one hand and one foot, and also that on account of either of said conditions he has been for one year, and will be thereafter and during life, permanently disabled from engaging in any work or occupation for wages or profit." The insured died on July 6, 1907, as the result of cerebral apoplexy, and in January, 1909, this suit was commenced to recover the full indemnity provided for in the second clause of the policy. The petition alleged that as the result of apoplexy the insured had "entirely and irrecoverably lost the sight of both eyes, and by incurable paralysis permanently and entirely lost the use of both hands and both feet; and that on account of said conditions he has been for one year and will be thereafter and forever permanently disabled from engaging in any work or occupation for wages or profit." A demurrer to the petition, which raised the question of the right of the plaintiff to recover $2,500 under the policy, was sustained, and the plaintiff's appeal brings the question to us for review.

The entire contract clearly shows that it is not one insuring the life of Craine. It insures against loss on account of temporary and permanent disability, as the terms are ordinarily used and understood. The word "disability" does not express the same meaning as the word "death;" nor is it ordinarily used as signifying the same thing. "Disability" is defined as a want of competent power, strength, or physical ability; weakness; incapacity; impotence. Century Dict. None of the lexicographers, so far as we are advised, give it any broader meaning, and the appellant has cited no case in which it is held to mean death. It is a rule that the language of contracts shall be given its ordinary and usual meaning, unless it is clear that some other meaning was intended by both parties. Here nothing appears that indicated an exception to the rule. Indeed, the very language used negatives any such thought. The indemnity was to be paid to the insured, and then, only upon proof that he had been disabled for a year, and "that he will be thereafter and during life" permanently disabled. The words "temporary or permanent disability" are used in many places in the policy, and there is not a word therein indicating that liability was to be incurred for death. The back of the policy has in print on the folder the following: "The Travelers' Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut. Limited Health Policy of Life of George H. Craine;" and the appellant contends that the statement that it was a "limited health policy on the life" of the insured is sufficient warrant for holding the defendant liable in this case. It is sufficient answer to say that the indorsement was no part of the contract, and it is not to be presumed that the insured relied thereon rather than upon his contract. Where an accident insurance policy provided for a weekly indemnity, not exceeding a certain number of weeks, for total "disability," and the insured died within twenty-four hours after the accident, it was held that his estate could not recover for the full period, as death cannot be said to be disability. Rosenberry v. Fidelity & C. Co. 14 Ind. App. 625, 43 N. E. 317. A weekly indemnity insurance policy agreed to indemnify the insured against injury resulting in disability caused by external means, etc., and provided that the death of the insured would immediately terminate all liability under the policy. There was no provision in express terms as to the death of the insured and providing a payment therefor. Held, that the death of the insured, caused by accidental means, was not a disability within the meaning of the policy. Burnett v. Railway Officials & E. Acci. Asso. 107 Tenn. 185, 64 S. W. 18. See also Hall v. American Employers' Liability Ins. Co. 96 Ga. 413, 23 S. E. 310; Brown v. United States Casualty Co. (C. C.) 95 Fed. 935. The demurrer was rightly sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal — decree adjusting rights — prematurity.

2. A bill in equity will not lie in behalf of a receiver of a club against its members to recover from them due owing under its by-law, and the purchase money of supplies received from it, since the claims are cognizable at law, and are not common in such sense that they can be joined to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

tion over proceedings to enforce the liability of stockholders of an insolvent corporation, but only the question whether such jurisdiction may rest upon the ground that a multiplicity may therefore be avoided.

Equity will not assume jurisdiction over a proceeding to enforce the liability of the stockholders in an insolvent corporation, whether such liability is based upon a statutory provision, is for unpaid stock, or arises from some other transaction or dealing with the corporation, where such liability is fixed in amount and is due from different stockholders by reason of their individual liability, if the sole ground for equitable intervention is that a multiplicity of suits will thereby be avoided, even though to some extent there is a community of interest and a similarity of questions of law and fact involved in the controversy. Hale v. Allison, 188 U. S. 56, 47 L. ed. 380, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244; People's Nat. Bank v. Saville, 25 App. D. C. 139; Fidelity Trust & S. D. Co. v. Archer, 179 Fed. 32; Marsh v. Kaye, 168 N. Y. 196, 61 N. E. 177; Miller v. Willett, 71 N. J. Eq. 741, 65 Atl. 981. This is also the doctrine of ROGERS v. BOSTON CLUB.

The doctrine of equitable jurisdiction to avoid a multiplicity of suits is based on the ground that the convenience of the parties will be thereby promoted and more exact justice accomplished without substantially affecting the material interests of any of the parties. As said by the court in Hale v. Allison: "It is easy to say it rests upon the prevention of multiplicity of suits, but to say whether a particular case comes within the principle is sometimes a much more difficult task. Each case, if not brought directly within the principle of some preceding case, must, as we think, be decided upon its own merits and upon a survey of the real and substantial convenience of all parties, the adequacy of the legal remedy, the situations of the different parties, the points to be contested, and the result which would follow if jurisdiction should be assumed or denied; these various matters being factors to be taken into consideration upon the question of equitable jurisdiction 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) on this ground, and whether within reasonable and fair grounds the suit is calculated to be in truth one which will practically prevent a multiplicity of litigation, and will be an actual convenience to all parties, and will not unreasonably overlook or obstruct the material interests of any. The single fact that a multiplicity of suits may be prevented by this assumption of jurisdiction is not in all cases enough to sustain it. It might be that the exercise of equitable jurisdiction on this ground, while preventing a formal multiplicity of suits, would nevertheless be attended with more and deeper inconvenience to the defendants than would be compensated for by the convenience of a single plaintiff; and where the case is not covered by any controlling precedent the inconvenience might constitute good ground for denying jurisdiction."

Applying this doctrine to the facts in that case the court said that "even if the ground of diminished trouble and expense may sometimes be sufficient, I should still be much inclined to hesitate before I conceded the superiority of the equitable remedy in the present case. Such a bill as is now before the court is certain to be the beginning of a long and expensive litigation. The hearings are sure to be protracted. Several, perhaps many, counsel will no doubt be concerned, whose convenience must be consulted. The testimony will soon grow to be voluminous. The expense of printing will be large. The costs of witnesses will not in any degree be diminished, and, if some docket costs may be escaped, this is probably the only pecuniary advantage to be enjoyed by this one cumbersome bill over separate actions at law."

In People's Nat. Bank v. Saville, equitable jurisdiction was sought to enforce the liability of stockholders in an insolvent corporation for unpaid stock subscriptions. The court said that the liability was several, and not joint and it was not competent for the creditors, or any person who became subrogated by operation of law to the place of the creditors, to bring a joint action against several or all the stockholders to enforce such a liability, and added that such a proceeding could not be sustained in equity on the ground that a multiplicity of suits could thereby be avoided. On this point it was said "there is no common interest in such a case such as the law would recognize as a good ground for the prevention of a multiplicity of suits; on the contrary, there is great danger that such a combination of independent suits in one proceeding may entail far greater vexation, expense, and annoyance than it could possibly prevent."

In Miller v. Willett, where the only ground urged for equitable jurisdiction of a bill to enforce the statutory liability of a number of stockholders in a corporation was that a multiplicity of actions at law would thereby be avoided, jurisdiction was denied; the court saying that there must be something more than the mere fact that two or more parties are jointly and severally indebted to a large number of creditors whose claims are entirely independent of each other, to justify a court of equity in assuming jurisdiction to try and determine rights which are purely legal in their character.

This distinction was also pointed out in Marsh v. Kaye, which held that a suit in equity would not lie, to enforce the liability of the directors of a charitable corporation, by one creditor on behalf of himself and all others, where there was no fund to be distributed among the creditors except such as might proceed from the conversion of the assets of the corporation, and there had already been a receiver appointed for the corporation, in which action a distribution of the assets could be had, and the only relief sought was to reach the personal liability of the directors, which was absolute and unlimited. In denying equitable jurisdiction the court said that, while, undoubtedly, resort may often be had to equity to enforce legal obligations, "still it is the rule that a court of law is primarily the proper form for such litigation, and that resort to equity can be had only where the remedy at law is inadequate or will lead to inequitable results. It is therefore incumbent on the plaintiff to show why an equitable action is necessary to secure his rights, where the liability of the stockholders or directors is limited in amount, and the fund to accrue from such liability may be inadequate to satisfy all the claims against the corporation. An action in equity on behalf of all the creditors in which the fund can be applied ratably on all claims is absolutely necessary to secure equality."

To the same effect is Fidelity Trust & S. D. Co. v. Archer, wherein equitable jurisdiction was invoked to enforce from the stockholders the payment of an assessment of a fixed sum per share on the stock of an insolvent corporation. The proceeding did not involve an accounting or contribution, but the relief sought was simply the recovery of separate and independent legal pecuniary demands.

Where, however, equitable aid is invoked to enforce the payment, by the stockholders of an insolvent corporation, of their liability for the debts of the corporation, whether such liability is statutory or otherwise, equity will assume jurisdiction of a multiplicity of suits is thereby avoided and, because of the nature of the relief sought, the remedy afforded will be more adequate than that which can be obtained in actions at law. Hayden v. Thompson, 17 C. C. A. 592, 36 U. S. App. 361, 71 Fed. 60; Bailey v. Tillinghast, 40 C. C. A. 93, 99 Fed. 801; Wyman v. Bowman, 62 C. C. A. 189, 127 Fed. 257; *Allen v. Montgomery R. Messrs. J. J. Feely and Roger Clapp for appellees Shepard-Norwell Company, et al.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Boston Club, a corporation organized under Rev. Laws, chap. 125, for social and other kindred purposes, became deeply indebted to many persons. It had small assets, and it made a voluntary assignment for the benefit of its creditors. Subsequent-equitable jurisdiction the proceeding was in the nature of a creditor's bill, and the relief sought was the ascertainment of the amount required to be contributed by the stockholders in order to liquidate the debts of the corporation, the payment of such amount, and the distribution of same among the creditors. Under such circumstances the right to invoke equitable interposition is clear. Thus, in Pickering v. Townsend, it is said that when a corporation becomes insolvent and a judgment creditor has exhausted his legal remedies, he may resort to a court of equity to compel stockholders to pay their subscriptions for stock in satisfaction of the corporate debts; such jurisdiction is supported on the ground of preventing a multiplicity of suits, by enforcing an equal distribution between the corporate creditors and equal contribution among the stockholders.

And in Maine Trust & Bkg. Co. v. Southern Loan & T. Co. the doctrine was asserted that a creditor's bill to compel the stockholders of an insolvent corporation ratably to contribute to the corporate debts under a liability provided by statute is the more appropriate, if not the exclusive remedy, as the rights of all the creditors can be ascertained and adjusted and the ratable liability of the stockholders determined in one suit without the vexation and expense of multiplied suits.

So, in Barton Nat. Bank v. Atkins, it is said that the interference of a court of equity to enforce the statutory liability of 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

by this bill in equity was brought in behalf of a judgment creditor for the benefit of herself and other creditors, against the corporation and the assignee, praying that a receiver might be appointed to collect and receive from the assignee and from all other persons, including the members of the corporation, all the corporation's assets, and to distribute them ratably among all such creditors as should prove their debts before the court, and to dispose of any balance, if any there should be, in such manner as the court should direct.

Inasmuch as the statutes of this commonwealth relative to proceedings in insolvency by or against insolvent corporations (Rev. Laws, chap. 163, §§ 143-149), are suspended by the bankrupt law of the United States, and as this class of corporations is not included in those whose estates may be settled under this law (bankr. act U. S. [act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418] § 4b), we may assume that, upon its averments, the plaintiff's bill was within the jurisdiction of the court. Upon this bill a receiver was appointed, who was directed to collect all the assets of the corporation and all moneys and debts due it from the members thereof.

The receiver filed a petition setting forth the names of all the alleged members of the stockholders of an insolvent corporation was justified upon the ground that a comprehensive decree covering the whole controversy could there be made, thus avoiding the multiplicity of suits that would otherwise arise.

And in Cook v. Carpenter the court said that the numerous actions that would be required at law, together with the fact that the remedy in equity was of greater certainty, uniformity, and convenience, was sufficient to sustain equitable jurisdiction of an action by an assignee for the benefit of the creditors of an insolvent corporation, to collect and administer as a trust fund the unpaid stock subscriptions of the stockholders of such corporation.

This was also the reasoning of Dalton & M. R. Co. v. McDaniel, wherein it was said that, "with its power to appoint an auditor or master in chancery to audit the amount of the debts of the corporation in gross and the debt due to each creditor, to ascertain the number of stockholders solvent and insolvent, the per cent necessary to be paid by each stockholder in proportion to his stock, it is perfectly clear that complete justice can be better administered to every creditor and to each solvent stockholder by a court of equity, than by any other form of procedure. It will prevent a multiplicity of suits, save costs, and give speedy and effectual relief. Principle, therefore, and sound reason accord with authority that equity will grant relief in all such cases as this at bar."

In Queenan v. Palmer, it was asserted in Boston Club, more than 300 in number, in which petition, as it was amended, he averred that these members were indebted to the club in the sum of $25 each for the half of the annual dues to June 1, 1908, under a by-law of the club, and in the same sum, under the same by-law, for dues to December 1, 1908, and that forty-one of these alleged members were indebted to the club in various sums for ordinary charges for food and other refreshments which they had received, and praying that an account might be taken of the several amounts due from the several respondents, and for a decree requiring payment to the receiver of such sums as should be found due from each of them. Upon this petition there was an order of notice, the notice to be given by sending by mail a printed copy to counsel of record, and to twelve of the respondents "designated by the court, upon whom service of this order shall be made in lieu of serving upon all the persons mentioned in this petition." After this service upon these designated persons, most of them appeared and filed demurrers and answers to the petition. The demurrers having been overruled, an appeal was taken to this court. Afterwards, upon a hearing, there was an interlocutory decree, or order for a final decree, in which it was adjudged that, under the by-laws of the corporation, each resident member was bound to pay an annual assessment of $50, and each nonresident member an annual assessment of $25; that these designated respondents and other respondents, 343 in all, were members of the club who had neglected and refused to pay the amount of this annual assessment for the half year ending December 1, 1908, although 153 of them had paid the installment for the half year ending June 1, 1908, and that forty-one members of the club, including six of these designated members, were indebted to the club in various stated sums for ordinary charges for food and other refreshments. It was also decreed that, to save expense of service of the petition upon all of the 343 members, the twelve respondents were designated as persons upon whom service of process should be made as representatives of a class; that the payment of the assessment was necessary in order that the indebtedness of the club might be paid, and that the designated respondents, respectively, should pay to the receiver the amounts found due from each of them, as stated in the decree, being in part for the annual assessments, and in part for the charges for food and refreshments. Subsequently a final decree against these respondents was made, directing payment of these sums, and general terms that the jurisdiction of a court of equity to entertain a bill against all the stockholders of an insolvent corporation to enforce their statutory liability exists upon the ground that the remedy at law was totally inadequate to afford the full measure of relief without bringing a multiplicity of suits. To the same effect is German Nat. Bank v. Farmers' & M. Bank.

Equity jurisdiction was sustained in Wyman v. Bowman on the ground that there was a community of interest of the stockholders in an insolvent corporation in every question of law and of fact involved in the proceeding to enforce their statutory liability for unpaid stock subscriptions, an inadequacy of separate actions at law against each stockholder, and a greater convenience and less expense to all parties in the determination of the questions involved by the one suit in equity.

And in Bailey v. Tillinghast the receiver of a national bank was held entitled to invoke equitable aid to enforce an assessment against stockholders, where such an assessment was less than the full amount of their liability and the question of law involved in the proceeding was common to all the defendants and rested upon substantially the same state of facts. The court said that these circumstances, namely, "the great number of the parties on one side or the other, the identity of the question of law, and the similarity of the facts in the several controversies between the respective parties, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) are the basis on which the jurisdiction rests."

Equity jurisdiction was sustained in Hayden v. Thompson, in an action by a receiver of an insolvent national bank to recover dividends that had been unlawfully paid the stockholders, on the ground that the purpose of the suit was to execute a trust, undo a fraud, and avoid a multiplicity of suits.

In Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. 498, 19 L. ed. 476, the doctrine was asserted that equity had jurisdiction of such a proceeding where a multiplicity of suits would be avoided, if the amount to be paid was less than the entire liability of each stockholder, but did not have jurisdiction on these grounds where the amount to be paid was the full liability of each stockholder. The question presented to the court did not require the consideration of this question, and the opinion has been criticized in later cases. (See Hale v. Allinson, 188 U. S. 56, 47 L. ed. 380, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244, and Fidelity Trust & S. D. Co. v. Archer.) What the court in that case evidently had in mind was that equity would assume jurisdiction, to avoid a multiplicity of suits, where the amount to be paid by each stockholder was not fixed, but had to be determined and was less than the entire liability, while equity would not assume jurisdiction where the amount to be paid was fixed and was for the full liability of each stockholder.

A. G. S.

that executions should issue against them severally to enforce payment. From this decree an appeal was taken to this court.

A second petition, similar in form, was presented to the court, to recover the amount of a special assessment made under a by-law by the executive committee. Upon this petition, after similar proceedings, the judge found that the assessment was invalid because the by-law authorized it to be made only by a majority of the committee present at the time of making it, and a decree was entered dismissing the petition. From this decree the receiver appealed.

An appeal was also taken by some of the defendants from the decree of the court allowing claims against the corporation, and especially the claims of Shepard-Norwell Company, Smith-Patterson Company, and McKenney & Waterbury Company.

A question has been raised as to whether these appeals are ripe for hearing, or whether they must await a final decree ordering distribution of the property of the corporation among the creditors. The decree for payment to the receiver by the members of the corporation, and awarding execution against them, purports to be a final decree; and it is in fact a final decree in the separate and independent proceeding to which it relates. Not only is payment decreed, but executions are ordered for the enforcement of payment. This appeal is plainly ripe for hearing. The rights of the appealing parties could not be protected if the hearing were postponed to any later time. For similar, although not quite so strong reasons, we are of the opinion that the appeal of the receiver from the disallowance of his claims for special assessments should be heard at this time. The determination of the amount of the claims against the estate and the appeal from the allowance of certain claims should not await a decree for the final distribution of the assets. It is so far independent, and it comprises such substantive elements in the litigation, that in the peculiar circumstances of this case the appeal may well be heard now with the others.

The demurring respondents assigned six causes of demurrer, among which were want of equity, misjoinder of respondents, and multifariousness. The first petition was to recover a large number of legal claims from debtors of the corporation. Upon the facts found by the judge, as appears in his order for a decree, the members of the corporation were indebted under a by-law of the corporation by which they had agreed to be bound. Many of them were also indebted for goods sold and delivered by the corporation. The case is quite unlike the summary proceedings which the receiver may take by application to the court to protect his right of possession to tangible property of a corporation which is transferred to him by the action of the court under his appointment. Such property is in the control of the court whose representative he is. The collection of a debt stands differently. Smith v. Johnson, 57 Ohio St. 486, 49 N. E. 693; State Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 34 N. J. Eq. 450; Andrews v. Paschen, 67 Wis. 413, 30 N. W. 712; Wheaton v. Daily Teleg. Co. 59 C. C. A. 427, 124 Fed. 61; Horn v. Pere Marquette R. Co. (C. C.) 151 Fed. 626-629. As to these claims the receiver had no greater rights than the corporation. The respondents were severally liable in an action of contract, each for the amount of his debt. Against each the receiver had a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law. The only question as to this last proposition is whether his remedy at law would be inadequate because separate actions would involve a multiplicity of suits. The only branch of jurisdiction in equity to which the receiver can appeal for the maintenance of his petition is that which is exercised to avoid a multiplicity of suits.

Upon this subject there have been a great many decisions, with considerable conflict among them. The subject is very ably and fully discussed, with a citation of a large number of cases, in 1 Pomeroy on Equity Jurisprudence, 3d ed. §§ 251-274. It seems now to be settled by a great weight of authority that jurisdiction may sometimes be exercised on behalf of a single party against a numerous body, although there is no common title nor community of right or interest in the subject-matter among those individuals, and where there is and because there is merely a community of interest among them in the questions of law and fact involved in the general controversy, or in the kind and form of relief demanded and obtained by or against each individual member of the numerous body. On the other hand, as was said by Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for the court in Hale v. Allinson, 188 U. S. 56-77, 47 L. ed. 380-392, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244, 252: "The single fact that a multiplicity of suits may be prevented by this assumption of jurisdiction, is not in all cases enough to sustain it. It might be that the exercise of equitable jurisdiction on this ground, while preventing a formal multiplicity of suits, would nevertheless, be attended with more and deeper inconveniences to the defendants than would be compensated for by the convenience of a single plaintiff, and where the case is not covered by any controlling precedent, the inconvenience might constitute good ground for denying jurisdiction." It seems too plain for doubt that the receiver's first petition in this case, which joined legal claims for annual dues against all the different members of the corporation, and included charges against a large number of them for food and refreshments, cannot be sustained on any principle of equity jurisprudence. As to these charges, there was no community of interest among the respondents in any question of law or fact involved, or in the kind or form of relief demanded. The petition included claims for a large number of separate debts which had no relation to one another. They had no more in common than the bills of a grocer against the customers to whom he has sold goods. It follows that the decree overruling the demurrers and the final decree directing payment and awarding execution must be reversed.

A question of more difficulty, which was included in the appeal and has been argued by counsel, and which may arise again in subsequent proceedings in the case, is whether the claims against all the members for the annual dues can be joined in a petition in equity. Similar questions have been passed upon by the courts. A bill was brought by a receiver of a state banking corporation in Iowa, to recover from stockholders assessments levied to enforce a personal liability for debts under a law of that state. It was held that the suit could not be maintained, and that the remedy was at law. Tompkins v. Craig (C. C.) 93 Fed. 885. In Hale v. Allinson (C. C.) 102 Fed. 790, there was an attempt by a receiver to enforce in equity a personal liability imposed by statute upon stockholders in a corporation, and it was held that there was no jurisdiction in equity. Judge McPherson in giving the opinion said: "Two classes of questions remain to be decided: The first is whether a given stockholder was ever liable as such; and the second is whether, if he were originally liable, his liability has ceased either in whole or in part. Manifestly, as it seems to me, the defendants have no common interest in these questions, or in the relief sought by the receiver against each defendant. The receiver's cause of action against each defendant is no doubt similar to his cause of action against every other. But this is only part of the matter. The real issue—the actual dispute—can only be known after each defendant has set up his defense; and defenses may vary so widely that no two controversies may be exactly or even nearly alike. If, as is sure to happen, different defenses are put in by different defendants, the bill evidently becomes a single proceeding only in name. In reality it is a congeries of suits with little relation to each other, except that there is a common plaintiff who has similar claims against many persons. But as each of these persons became liable, if at all, by reason of a contract entered into by himself alone, with the making of which his codefendants had nothing whatever to do, so he continues to be liable, if at all, because he himself, and not they, has done nothing to discharge the liability." This decree was affirmed in 45 C. C. A. 270, 106 Fed. 258, by the unanimous decision of the circuit court of appeals, which adopted the opinion given in the circuit court. The same question arose under the same statute in Hale v. Allinson, 188 U. S. 56, 77, 78, 47 L. ed. 380, 392, 393, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244, and the same result was reached by the Supreme Court of the United States, which quoted at length from the opinion of Judge McPherson and adopted it as a statement of the law. In this case, too, on page 78 of 188 U. S., Mr. Justice Peckham reaffirmed the rule stated in Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. 498-505, 19 L. ed. 476-479, and followed in Bailey v. Tillinghast, 40 C. C. A. 93, 99 Fed. 801, and in several other cases, as to the enforcement of the statutory liability of stockholders for debts in a national bank, that "where the whole amount is to be recovered, the proceeding must be at law; where less is required, the proceeding may be in equity, and in such a case an interlocutory decree may be taken for contribution."

The considerations which led to the decision in Hale v. Allinson apply with almost equal force to the present case. There is one question presented by the receiver in which the respondents all have a common interest, namely, whether there was a by-law and a liability of members under it, as he avers. There are other questions which pertain to each individual respondent, namely, whether he became a member of the corporation so as to be subject to the liabilities of members, and if so, whether he ceased to be a member before this particular liability attached, and whether, if it attached, it was ever discharged. In none of these questions has any other member any interest. As to them there must be a separate trial against each respondent.

This is not a case in which a decree for payment can be made against a particular respondent without service upon him. As to questions of the kind above stated, he is not a member of a class who can be represented by other members. Before he can be found liable as for a debt, he must be given notice of the claim against him, and an opportunity to make his defense. Inasmuch as there must be a service of process upon each defendant, it would seem to be a more simple and orderly method to bring an action at law against each member, and almost if not quite as economical a way for the receiver.

We are inclined to the view that this case should be governed by the decision above stated, and that it should be treated as presenting nothing but separate claims for the payment of debts in which different questions may arise, such that they cannot properly be joined in equity for the purpose of preventing a multiplicity of suits.

The respondents contend that there can be no liability for these annual dues, because a receiver has been appointed for the property of the corporation, and the respondents have not enjoyed the expected benefits of membership. From what appears upon this record, we must assume that the liability for the dues for the year ending December 1, 1908, accrued on December 1, 1907, and that nothing had occurred at that time to relieve the respondents from liability for this annual assessment. We have no report of evidence, nor anything on the subject but the pleadings and the decrees. Dealing with the case only upon the facts before us, we hold that this defense is not made out.

Nor is there any good ground for the appeal of the respondents as to the allowance of the claims of creditors against the corporation, including the claims of Shepard-Norwell Company, Smith-Patterson Company, and McKenney & Waterbury Company. The decree as to these is founded upon findings of fact by the trial judge, which are well sustained by the evidence.

The appeal of the receiver from the dismissal of the second petition rests upon the fact that a quorum of the executive committee were present when the special assessment was made, and the vote was passed by a majority of the quorum. The by-law under which action was taken provides that an assessment may be made by a majority of the executive committee. The committee consisted of twenty members, fifteen chosen specially, and five other officers who were members of the committee ex officio. By article 3, § 10, five members of the committee constitute a quorum. The question is whether the by-law authorizing a special assessment to be made by a majority of the committee means by a majority of the quorum, or a majority of the whole committee. We are of opinion that the judge was right in holding that it means a majority of the whole committee. It gives an unusual and important power. It uses words which naturally signify more than half of the whole number of the committee. It is hardly to be expected that this power would be given to a majority of a quorum of five, which is so small a part of the whole committee.

Decree dismissing receiver's second petition affirmed.

28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

EX PARTE HOMER M. SULLIVAN.

RE GEORGE LOOMIS et al.

(84 Neb. 493, 121 N. W. 450.)

Receiving stolen property — nature of offense.

1. In this state the receiving or buying of stolen goods with intent to defraud the owner is not an accessory, but a substantive offense, and a conviction may be had without regard to the person who stole the goods, or from whom they were received.

Same — property stolen in other state — effect.

2. The charge of buying stolen horses in this state, knowing the same to have been stolen, with intent by such buying to defraud the owner, states an offense, even though the charge further recites that the horses were stolen in South Dakota.

Note. — Prosecution for receiving stolen property where property in question was stolen in foreign state or country.

The cases are agreed, in states where by common law or statute it is held to be larceny to bring property into the state which has been stolen in another state or country, that one who receives such property knowing it to have been stolen is guilty of receiving stolen property.

Thus, in the following cases, where the property in question had been stolen in one state, those who received it in another state with knowledge of the fact that it had been stolen were held guilty of receiving stolen property: State v. Suppe, 60 Kan. 566, 57 Pac. 106; State v. Stimpson, 45 Me. 608; Com. v. Andrews, 2 Mass. 14, 3 Am. Dec. 17; United States v. Mortimer, 1 Hayw. & H. 215, Fed. Cas. No. 15,821; Curran v. State, 12 Wyo. 553, 76 Pac. 577.

Dana, Ch. J., in Com. v. Andrews, supra, said: "The offense charged on the defendant is the receiving the goods in Boston knowing them to have been stolen. If the principal could be tried and convicted in this county, the accessory may be tried and convicted here also. The same reason which authorizes a conviction in the case of stealing goods in one county and bringing them into another applies, in my mind, to the case of stealing in one state and bringing them into another,—viz., that every moment's felonious possession is, in contemplation of the law, a new taking, stealing, and carrying away."

And one who received goods from an agent of the thief was held guilty of receiving stolen property, where the goods were stolen in New York and sent to an agent in Massa-

APPPLICATION by Homer M. Sullivan for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of George C. Loomis et al. from custody in which they were held under warrants which were alleged to be void. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sullivan & Squires, for relator:

One cannot be held for receiving and buying stolen property where the same was stolen in another state, in the absence of a special statute, or in the absence of judicial determination that the bringing from one state into another of stolen property renders the thief guilty in the state to which it is brought.
